ELOQUENCE OF THE AMERICAN SENATE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN ARGUMENT FOR THE INTEGRITY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

[This speech, to which we have assigned the first place in a miscellany, whose object is to preserve, as a memorial, certain facts and reasonings, connected with the history of parties in our republic, deserves to be hailed by the District of Maine, by New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New-Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina, as an intrepid assertion of their rights, and a serious monition of their danger. The resolution, which gave rise to the following argument, is justly viewed as a pernicious project of the larger states, availing themselves of the present crisis of political enthusiasm, to obtain the dangerous power of electing the President and Vice-President! This kind of political monopoly would essentially infringe the rights of the minor states of the union; and would confer on several of the Southern, Middle, and Western states the dangerous, oppressive, and odious privilege of securing themselves the election of the two highest officers of our government. We understand that no question hitherto agitated in Congress, has fomented such jealousy, and excited such anxiety, particularly among the northern states, whose title to a most valuable privilege, guaranteed to them by the Federal Constitution, is thus to be vacated, by a daring act of democratic power.]

MR. TRACY'S SPEECH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 2, 1803.

On the passage of the following amendment to the Constitution:

"RESOLVED by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of the members concurring, that in lieu of the third section of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the legislatures of the several states, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said constitution, to wit:—
"The electors shall meet in the respective states, and vote, by ballot, for president, and vice-president, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name, in their ballots, the person voted for as president, and the person voted for as vice-president, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as president, and of all persons voted for as vice-president, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and seal, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, separately, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for president, shall be president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, the list of those voted for as president, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the president. But, in choosing the president, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a president, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March, then next following, then the vice-president shall act as president, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the president.

"The person having the greatest number of votes, as vice-president, shall be the vice-president, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then, from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the vice-president—a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person, constitutionally ineligible to the office of president, shall be eligible to that of vice-president of the United States."

At three o'clock Mr. Tracy moved an adjournment, and the motion was negatived. He then addressed the President:

MR. PRESIDENT,

I moved an adjournment, because I thought a more full and fair discussion was due to this important question, than could be had after this hour.

The merits have never, until now, been before us, for although considerable time has been consumed in debate, it has chiefly been directed to the subordinate amendments, and not to the main resolution. But since the Senate have refused to adjourn, I will now offer some observations on the merits, in doing which, I will be as brief as possible, as much as the importance of the subject will permit.

I shall attempt to prove, sir, that the resolution before us, contains principles which have a manifest tendency to deprive the small states of an important right, secured to them by a solemn and constitutional compact, and to vest an overwhelming power in the great states. And, further, I shall attempt to show, that in many other points the resolution is objectionable, and, for a variety of causes, ought not to be adopted.

As I shall be obliged, in delineating the main features of this resolution, to mention the great states in the union as objects of jealousy, I wish it to be understood, that no state is intended. 'Man is man,' was the maxim expressed, in an early part of this debate, by the gentleman from South-Carolina, (Mr. Butler) and, in application to the subject of government, the maxim is worthy to be written in letters of gold. Yes, sir, 'man is man,' and the melancholy truth, that he is always imperfect and frequently wicked, induces us to fear his power, and guard against his rapacity, by the establishment and preservation of laws, and well-regulated constitutions of government. Man, when connected with very many of his fellow-men, in a great state, derives power from the circumstance of this numerous combination; and from every circumstance which clothes him with additional power, he will generally derive some additional force to his passions.

Having premised this, I shall not deem it requisite to make any apology when I attempt to excite the attention, the vigilance, and even the jealousy of the small, in reference to the conduct of the great states. The caution is meant to apply against the imperfections and passions of man, generally, and not against any state, or description of men, particularly.

It may be proper in this place to explain my meaning when I make use of the words small and great, as applicable to states.

Massachusetts has been usually called a great state; but, in respect to all the operations of this resolution, she must, I think, be ranked among the small states. The district of Maine is increasing rapidly, and must, in the nature of things, soon become a state. To which event, its location, being divided from what was the ancient colony of Massachusetts, by the intervention of New-Hampshire, will very much contribute. I believe there is a legislative provision of some years standing, authorizing a division, at the option of Maine. When this event shall occur, Massachusetts, although in comparison with Connecticut or Rhode-Island, will not be a small state; yet in comparison with many others, must be so considered. I think myself justifiable then, for my present purposes, in calling Maine, New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode-Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New-Jersey, Delaware, Maryland and South-Carolina, small states. They are all limited in point of territory, and cannot reasonably expect any great increase of population for many years, not indeed, until the other states shall become so populous as to discourage emigration, with agricultural views; which may retain the population of the small states as seamen or manufacturers. This event, if it ever arrives, must be distant. A possible exception only, may exist in favour of Maine; but when we consider its climate, and a variety of other circumstances, it is believed to form no solid exception to this statement.

By the same rule of deciding, the states must be called great; for Georgia and several others are not so populous, at this time, to be considered great states; yet their prospect of increase, with other circumstances, fairly brings with the description, in respect to the operation of the measure now under consideration.

It will be recollected, that, in the various turns which this debate has taken, gentlemen have repeatedly said that the constitution was formed for the people, that the good of the whole was its object, that nothing was discernible in it like a contest of states, nothing like jealousy of small states against the great; and although such distinctions and jealousies might have existed under the first confederation; yet they could have no existence under the last. And one gentleman (Mr. Maryland) has said that he has been in the government ten years, and has seen nothing of great and small states, as interfering with the operations of government, or the feelings of those who administered it.

Propriety, therefore, requires that we attentively examine the constitution itself, not only to obtain correct ideas upon these observations, so repeatedly urged; but to place in the proper light the operations and effects of the resolution in debate.

If we attend to the constitution, we shall immediately find evident marks of concession and compromise, and that the parties to these concessions were the great and small states. And the members of the convention who formed the instrument have, in private information and public communications, united in the declaration, that the constitution was the result of concession and compromise between the great and small states. In this examination of the constitution it will be impossible to keep out of view our political relations under the first confederation. We primarily united upon the footing of complete state equality, each state had one, and no state had more than one vote in the federal council or congress. With such a confederation we successfully waged war, and became an independent nation. When we were relieved from the pressure of war, that confederation, both in structure and power, was found inadequate to the purposes for which it was established. Under these circumstances, the states, by their convention, entered into a new agreement upon principles better adapted to promote their mutual security and happiness. But this last agreement or constitution, under which we are now united, was manifestly carved out of the first confederation. The small states adhered tenaciously to the principle of state equality; and gave up only a part of this federative principle, complete state equality, and that, with evident caution and reluctance. To this federative principle they were attached by habit; and their attachment was sanctioned and corroborated by the example of most, if not all the ancient, and the modern confederacies. And when the great states claimed a weight in the counsels of the nation proportionate to their numbers and wealth, the novelty of the claim, as well as its obvious tendency to reduce the sovereignty of the small states, must have produced serious obstacles to its admission. Hence it is, that we find in the constitution but one entire departure from the federative principle. The house of representatives is established upon the popular principle, and given to numbers and wealth, or to the great states, which in this view of the subject are synonymous. It was thought by the convention, that a consolidation of the states into one simple republic, would be improper. And the local feelings and jealousies of all, but more especially of the small states, rendered a consolidation impracticable.

The Senate, who have the power of a legislative veto upon the house of representatives, possess another extensive and important power, conferred as an entire federative feature of government as it was enjoyed by the states, under the first confederation.

In the article which obliges the President to vote for one person not an inhabitant of the same state with themselves, is secured state jealousy. In the majority of two-thirds required for many purposes of the constitution; although there were other motives for the regulations; yet the jealousy of the small states is clearly discernible. Indeed, sir, we peruse the constitution with attention, and shall find the small states are perpetually guarding the federative principle, that is, state equality. And this, in every part of it, except in the choice of the house of representatives, and in the ordinary legislative proceedings. They go so far as to prohibit any amendment, which may affect the equality of states in the Senate.

This is guarding against almost an impossibility; because the Senators of the small states must be criminally remiss in their attendance, and the legislatures extremely off their guard, if they permit such alterations, which aim at their own existence. But lest some accident, some unaccountable blindness or perfidy should put in jeopardy the federative principle in the Senate, they totally and forever prohibit all attempts at such a measure.

In the choice of President, the mutual caution and concession of great and small states is, if possible, more conspicuous than in any other part of the constitution.

He is to be chosen by electors appointed by the state legislatures shall direct, not according to numbers entirely, but adding two electors to each state as representatives of state sovereignty. Thus Delaware obtains three votes for President, whereas she could have but one in right of numbers. Yet mixed as this mode of choice is, with both popular and federative principles; we see the small states watching its motions and circumscribing it to one attempt only, and on failure of an electoral choice they instantly seize upon the right of a federal election, and select from the candidates a President, by states, and not by numbers. In confirmation of my assertion, that this part of the constitution was peculiarly the effect of compromise between the great and small states; permit me to quote an authority which will certainly have great weight, not only in the Senate, but through the union. I mean that of the present secretary of state (Mr. Madison) who was a leading member of the federal convention who formed, and of the Virginia convention who adopted the constitution. In the debates of the Virginia convention, vol. 3, page 77, he says, (speaking of the mode of electing the President,) 'As to the eventual voting by states it has my approbation. The lesser states and some larger states will be generally pleased by that mode. The deputies from the small states argued, and there is some force in their reasoning, that when the people voted, the large states evidently had the advantage over the rest, and without varying the mode, the interests of the little states might be neglected or sacrificed. Here is a compromise. For in the eventual election, the small states will have the advantage.'

After this view of the constitution, let us inquire what is the direct object of the proposed alteration in the choice of President?

To render more practicable and certain the choice by electors—and for this reason; that the people at large, or in other words, that the great states ought to have more weight and influence in the choice. That it should be brought nearer to the popular and carried further from the federative principle. This claim we find was made at the formation of the constitution. The great states naturally wished for a popula-choice of first magistrate: This mode was sanctioned by the example of many of the states in the choice of governor. The small states claimed a choice on the federative principle, by the legislatures, and to vote by states; analogies and examples were not wanting to sanction this mode of election. A consideration of the weight and influence of a President of this union, must have multiplied the difficulties of agreeing upon the mode of choice. But, as I have before said, by mutual concession, they agreed upon the present mode, combining both principles, and dividing between the two parties, thus mutually jealous, as equally as they could, this important privilege of electing a chief magistrate.

This mode then became established, and the right of the small states, to elect, upon the federative principle, or by states, in case of the contingency of electoral failure of choice, cannot, with reason and fairness, be taken from them, without their consent, and on a full understanding of its operation; since it was meant to be secured to them by the constitution, and was one of the terms upon which they became members of the present confederacy; and for which privilege, they gave an equivalent to the great states, in sacrificing so much of the federative principle, or state equality.

The constitution is nicely balanced, with the federative and popular principles; the Senate are the guardians of the former, and the house of representatives of the latter; and any attempts to destroy this balance, under whatever specious names or pretences they may be presented, should be watched with a jealous eye. Perhaps a fair definition of the constitutional power of amending is, that you may, upon experiment, so modify the constitution in its practice and operation, as to give it, upon its own principles, a more complete effect. But this is an attack upon a fundamental principle established after long deliberation, and by mutual concession, a principle of essential importance to the instrument itself, and an attempt to wrest from the small states, a vested right; and, by it, to increase the power and influence of the large states. I shall not pretend, sir, that the parties to this constitutional compact, cannot alter its original and essential principles; and that such alterations may not be effected, under the name of amendment; but, let a proposal of that kind come forward in its own proper and undisguised shape; let it be fairly stated to congress, to the state legislatures, to the people at large, that the intention is to change an important federative feature in the constitution, which change in itself and all its consequences, will tend to a consolidation of this union, into a simple republic; let it be fairly stated that the small states have too much agency in the important article of electing a chief magistrate; and that the great states claim the choice; and we shall then have a fair decision. If the Senators of the small states, and if their state legislatures will then quietly part with the right they have, no person can reasonably complain.

It may be more obvious, than the intention of the amendment adopted by our constitution for the choice of President. The electors are to nominate persons, of whom they cannot know who will be President; this circumstance not only prevents them to select both from the best men, but gives a direct advantage into the hands of the small states even in the electoral choice. The electors always select from the two candidates proposed by the electors of large states, by giving their votes upon their favourite; and by thus giving him a majority, or, if the electors of large states should, to prevent this, they give their votes, for one candidate, then the electors of the small states would have it in their power to elect a Vice-President. So that in any event, the small states will have a considerable agency in the election. But if the discriminating or designating principle is carried, as contained in this resolution, the whole, or nearly the whole right and agency of the small states, in the electoral choice of chief magistrate is destroyed, and their chance of obtaining a federative choice by states, if not destroyed, is very much diminished.

For this identical purpose is the principle of electoral discrimination and designation, introduced into the resolution before you; for the same purpose is the number of candidates reduced from five to three, from whom the house of representatives may elect, in case of electoral failure of choice; that is, to destroy, or diminish the agency of the small states, in the choice of President.

For what purpose else, are we perpetually told, and from all parts of the Senate, that the public will is opposed, by the present mode, and the public will cannot be gratified, without the introduction of the discriminating principle?

By the public will, thus mentioned, the gentlemen mean, the will of a popular majority, or, the will of the great states, which, in this case, I repeat it, are the same. How is it possible for the gentlemen to increase the chances of gratifying this description of the public will; without decreasing the agency of the small states!

The whole power of election, is now vested in the two parties; numbers and states, or, great and small states, and it is demonstration itself, that if you increase the power of the one, in just such proportion, you diminish that of the other. Do the gentlemen suppose that the public will, when constitutionally expressed by a majority of states, in pursuance of the federative principle of our government, is of less validity, or less binding upon the community at large, than the public will expressed by a popular majority? The framers of your constitution, the people who adopted it, meant, that the public will, in the choice of a President, should be expressed by electors, if they could agree, and if not, that the public will should be expressed, by a majority of the states, acting in their federative capacity, and that in both cases the expression of the public will should be equally binding.

It is pretended that the public will can never, properly or constitutionally be expressed, but by a majority of numbers, of the people, or of the house of representatives? This may be a pleasing doctrine enough to great states; but it is certainly incorrect. Our constitution has given the public will, in a variety of instances, other than that of the choice of President, into very different hands from either the house of representatives or the people at large. The President and Senate, and in many cases the President alone, can express the public will, in appointments of high trust and responsibility, and it cannot be forgotten that the President sometimes expresses the public will, by removals. Treaties, highly important expressions of the public will, are made by the President and Senate; and they are the supreme law of the land. In the several states, many great offices are filled, and even the chief magistracy, by various modes of election. The public will is sometimes expressed by pluralities, instead of majorities, sometimes by both branches of the legislatures, and sometimes by one, and in certain contingencies, elections are settled by lot. The people have adopted constitutions containing such regulations, and experience has proved that they are well calculated to preserve their liberties and promote their happiness. From what good, or even pardonable motive then, can it be urged, that the present mode of electing our President, has a tendency to counteract the public will? Do gentlemen intend to destroy every federal feature in this constitution?

And is this resolution a precursor to a complete consolidation of the union, and to the establishment of a simple republic?—Or will it suffice to break down every federative feature which secures to one portion of the union, to the small states, their rights?

I am not without my fears, Mr. President, that this is but the beginning of evils, and that this constitution, the bulwark of the feeble members of the confederacy; the protection of the weak against the strong; the security of the small against the great; the last, best hope of man, with a view to stability in a free government, and to the preservation of liberty in a republic; is destined to undergo changes, and suffer innovations, till there shall be no residue worth preserving, and nothing left, which ambition will condescend to overturn.

Time will not permit me to dwell any longer on this part of my argument. But I am deceived sir, if the view I have now taken of the constitution does not show most obviously, that in its formation there was a struggle between the great and small states, with respect to many of its principles and leading features. And that the participation of the small states in the election of a chief magistrate, clearly secured to them by the constitution, will receive a deadly blow by the adoption of the proposed amendment.

It can be no contradiction to my ideas upon the subject, if we have heard nothing of state conflicts, in the administration of this government. The great states have never, till now, directly attempted to violate the sanctuary of the small, and despoil them of their rights; had this been earlier attempted, we should have heard and seen the same jealousy awakened, and the same opposition exerted.

The conflict could happen in no other way, than by an attack from the large states. We had neither the desire nor ability to injure them, and we now ask no favours, but their permission to enjoy, in peace and safety, the rights conceded to us by themselves, and secured by a solemn constitutional compact.

We have been told, by a gentleman from Virginia, that it would be impolitic in us to rouse the great states. I shall, at present, take no further notice of this warning, given to us, no doubt, in the full exercise of benevolence; but to request the small states to preserve it in constant recollection. It may induce them not hastily to part with constitutional security.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[It is so uncommon for the Editor to receive an original article for our Biographical department, that the following is like certain medals, valuable for rarity as well as splendor. The history of an individual, so renowned for learning, acuteness, and piety, as the celebrated Pascal, will be perused with additional pleasure, when the reader is apprized that he is indebted to an American Biographer for the entertainment to be derived from this article. The fame of Pascal, as a good man and an eloquent writer, is perennial; and it is a very curious and memorable fact, that one of the most insidious of the sceptics has paid an involuntary act of homage to one of the most celebrated Christians. Gibbon, in the memoirs of his own life, enumerating three particular books as having remotely contributed to form the historian of the Roman Empire, gives the first place to our author. From the Provincial Letters of Pascal, says Mr. Gibbon, which almost every year I have perused with new pleasure, I learned to manage the weapon of grave and temperate irony, even on subjects of ecclesiastical solemnity.]

LIFE OF PASCAL.

Blaise Pascal was born at Clermont, in the province of Auvergne, on the 19th of June, 1623.

He was descended from an ancient family, and the son of Stephen Pascal, and Antoinette Begon. His mother died in 1626.

He was one of the most remarkable examples of genius discovered in early infancy, and his father, who was himself a man of learning, and particularly skilled in the mathematics, in the year 1631, sold his office of president of the court of aids, and went to reside at Paris, for the purpose of devoting himself entirely to the education of his children.

Duly sensible of the value and importance of the ancient languages, he was desirous of confining the attention of his son to them alone, until he should become a complete master of them. But young Pascal, when in his 12th year, having heard some mention of the mathematics, manifested a wish to enter upon the study of them. The reluctance of the father to comply with this wish, served but to inflame his curiosity. He renewed his intreaties, and finding them still unsuccessful, could obtain, finally, nothing more than a mere definition of the science, with a positive injunction neither to say, nor think any more upon the subject. The definition, given by the old gentleman, was, that the mathematics were the science of drawing exact figures, and of finding their relative proportions.

Upon the strength of this definition alone, we are told, that young Pascal went to work, without the assistance of any book, and, by the mere force of his own genius, during his hours of leisure from other studies, pushed his discoveries as far as the 32d proposition of the first book of Euclid; when his father, detecting him in his clandestine exercises, and filled with astonishment at the progress he had made, was at once convinced of the impossibility of shackling his transcendent genius, and immediately put an Euclid into his hands, which young Pascal mastered with a facility almost intuitive.

The authenticity of this anecdote has never been called in question. Yet, in the manner it is related by all the biographers of Pascal, it borders too much upon the marvellous to obtain implicit belief. The propositions of Euclid are not connected together by such a chain of necessary dependence upon one another, that the operations of a mind, acting by its own energies, could possibly follow them by a course of mathematical deduction. The thirty-second proposition of the first book, is itself a complicated theorem, containing two distinct though connected demonstrations; and if we can assent to the possibility that Pascal should have made the discovery that the three internal angles of a triangle, are always equal to two right angles, we must at least reject, as fabulous, the remainder of the story. The powers of genius might unveil to the youthful student some of the propositions, of which the demonstration was contained in the first book of Euclid; but they never could have given him the key to the artificial and in some sort arbitrary method of that author.

It is at least certain that this extraordinary story was not told of an ordinary man. From the time when his father discovered his secret studies, and took off the restraint, which perhaps had made them his darling pursuit, he continued his application to the mathematics, with a passion unabated even by indulgence, and at the age of sixteen, composed a treatise upon Conic Sections, which was considered as a master-piece; but which he esteemed himself of so little importance, that it never was published. This work was seen and examined by Descartes, and appeared to that great mathematician, so much beyond the possible powers of sixteen, that he never would believe young Pascal was the real author, and always supposed it the production of the father himself.

In 1638, the father was sent into Normandy, with the office of intendant in that Province, where he resided about ten years. There, young Pascal continued his indefatigable application, with a success proportioned to the uncommon promise of his infancy, though at the usual expense of intense study, disease, and infirmity. At nineteen, he invented, a machine, ever since well known in France by the name of the Pascaline machine, by means of which every sort of arithmetical calculation can be mechanically performed without any knowledge of arithmetic. For this machine he obtained a patent, or exclusive privilege from the King of France, in 1649.

In 1643, Torricelli made his famous experiments, ascertaining that mercury in a tube, hermetically sealed, will not rise beyond a certain height. An observation, which, with respect to water, had before that time been made by Galileo. The Torricellian experiments were communicated to Pascal in 1646, he immediately repeated them, and after fully meditating the subject, published in 1647, a short treatise, which was soon circulated among all scientific men, in every part of Europe, and first ascertained the possibility of a vacuum, which until then had been universally considered in the schools of natural philosophy, as the abhorrence of nature. During several years, Pascal continued his researches on this subject, repeating and multiplying his experiments, the result of which he published in two successive treatises, on the equilibrium of fluids, and on the weight of the air. Works which entitle him to the honour of having first demonstrated to the satisfaction of the learned world, that all the phenomena, till then attributed to the horror of a vacuum, are imputable only to the weight of the atmosphere.

Unfortunately for the fame of this illustrious man, and for the improvement of mankind, in science; to which he was so richly qualified to contribute, an accident which happened to his father, about this time, led to circumstances which withdrew his ardent, and indefatigable mind, from any further application to worldly science, and plunged him headlong into the abyss of metaphysical theology and frantic superstition. It happened that the too famous controversies between the Jansenists and the Jesuits, on the subject of grace, free-will, predestination, and all those interminable questions, which according to Milton, perplex the intellect of the devils in Pandemonium, as they torture the understanding of man, here on earth, were at that period, just kindling to a flame in France; the curate of a village near Rouen, whose head was filled with the doctrines of Jansenius, and the Commentaries of the Abbot of St. Cyran, and of Arnauld, had persuaded two gentlemen of his parish, that these disputes were the most important of all human concerns, and those two disciples communicated their own convictions, to both the Pascals, father and son. From the moment when the mind of the latter was turned into this course, he abandoned all his former objects of inquiry, and devoted himself exclusively to what he thought the one thing needful, the study of religion, or rather, a religious disputation.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. THE LAY PREACHER.

"On the first day of the first month—set in order the things that are to be set in order."

It has been remarked by ingenious moralists, that although the negligence of mankind suffers minute divisions of time to pass unregarded, yet at the close of centuries or years, it is common to pause, and compute in what manner they have been employed. To justify the truth of this observation, most of my parishioners, who have toyed with time, days and months, begin now to grieve, that another idle year is gone, and resolve that the next shall be more busy. While all around him are repeating the compliments of the season, and, with jocund voices, wishing each other a happy new-year, the Lay Preacher, with affectionate zeal, will suggest plans by which these annual wishes for felicity may be realized.

Most men are, criminally idle. I confess, with candour, that I loiter and slumber much, and, while I preach industry to others, am myself a cast-away. But the sun, who darts his reproachful rays through the curtain, undrawn at nine o'clock, seems to upbraid my sluggishness, and to wish that I would announce to the lazy of my flock that they will not, like him, at once shine and be of use, unless like him they rise seasonably. My readers are, therefore, vehemently exhorted early to extinguish their candles, and to use the day-lamp, which neither sputters nor flares, whose wick never burns out, and whose oil never fails. All who wish that the year may be happy, must rigorously observe this injunction. No complaints must be heard of the chill of winter mornings, or the shortness of summer nights, but as soon as the above lamp begins to glimmer, let them rise and work. They will soon be convinced that it is so ingeniously contrived, its radiance will not offend the eyes, nor its exhalations taint the lungs, like the vulgar tapers of midnight. If the Lay Preacher himself, contrary, to his own doctrine, should be found snoring in his study, while his neighbours are walking in their vocation, he gives them full permission to summon a synod, and dismiss him from his office.

Instead of employing the usual expression a happy new-year, it would, perhaps, be an improvement to vary the phrase, and adapt it to the character of the person who is addressed.

If I meant that a sluggard should enjoy a happy year, I would wish him an active and laborious one. I would apply to some clamorous carman, or some importunate client to bellow at his window at the dawn of day. I would even advance a dollar from my small salary, to purchase a couple of cocks to crow him up to exertion. The year of the idler would then undoubtedly be happy. You would hear from him no complaints of spleen or nervous disorders. He would have no bill to pay the apothecary for pills to cure indigestion. You would scarcely hear a yawn from him during the prolixity of a winter's eve. His mind would be agreeably engaged. His hands would be employed by Utility, his heart would throb with Pleasure, and his eye be brightened by Hope. He would not only 'set things in order on the first day of the month,' but habit would cause order to regulate his occupation during the year.

Were I to compliment a man 'of feeble knees,' whose eyes are red, whose hands are paralytic, whose perceptions are disturbed, and whose purse is impoverished by 'tarrying late at the wine,' I should wish him a sober year. I should wish, when he bellowed for the third bottle of Burgundy, that his landlord might be sleepy, and that the waiter might stumble; that all the liquor he swallowed instead of raising would depress his spirits; and that he might peruse seriously that chapter of the prophet, which denounces 'woe to the drunkards of Ephraim.'

Suppose that in my pilgrimage through the streets, or the market-place, through the liberties of Philadelphia, or the thickets of Monticello, I should meet that animal, more hateful than the hyena, and more restless than a monkey, and called a Democrat or a Jacobin. If I wished him a happy new-year, he would instantly conclude that I meant a revolutionary one, such an epoch, as the first year of the French Republic, or the cut and thrust commencement of the commonwealth of Cromwell. Guarding against a meaning so mischievous, I would express my annual compliment differently, and wish him a loyal year. I would wish that from January to December he might be well governed. I would interdict him from reading the speeches of a club, or the sermons of a conventicle. I would forbid his pronouncing the word Robespierre, or repeating any of the reveries of Jefferson. I would wish that he might hearken to the oracle of experience, and be deaf as an adder to the voice of theory. The creature would then gradually become a good subject, and his year would be happy.

The wish for gamblers must be expressed in a very extraordinary and enigmatical manner. Instead of a happy new-year, it would be the duty of their real friends, to pray that it might be an unlucky one. An unlucky year would be a year of jubilee to the gamester. It would produce a thorough reformation. Should the friendly wish for ill luck be realized, and the gamester neither hold four by honours, nor the odd trick, what a clear saving to his purse, his health, and his time! He would soon consider cards as the emissaries of misfortune, he would endeavour to grow rich by surer calculations, he would not only endeavour to discard the knave from his hand, but from his conduct, and be more anxious to turn the penny, than a trump.

The wish for the shy bachelor and the coy maiden, is, that, tired of a cold and comfortable celibacy, they may agree during the present frosty, or approaching vernal season, to make vows to Matrimony and keep them with the purest good faith. May their wedding ring be always bright, and may their honey moon, with genial radiance, glow intensely not merely for a month, but cheer and gild many a blissful year.

The wish for myself shall be concise and moderate. My romantic expectations have vanished with the effervescence of youth, and were the wishing cap of Fortunatus mine, my desires would be tempered by philosophy. With the fifth Henry of England, and of Shakspeare, I can declare that 'I am not covetous of gold,' but there is a glittering prize in honour's hand, to which the honest love of fame urges to aspire. In the eager race for renown, may health and industry invigorate my speed.

Finally; to use the Pagan's immemorial adverb, finally, brethren, the Lay Preacher, with the fervent kindness of St. Paul, 'sendeth greeting to many,' and wishes that this, and every future year may prove eminently happy to all the deserving. A lyric bard of antiquity, in a strain of affectionate encomium upon his friend, the beautiful and benignant Tibullus, inquires for what the fondest nurse would pray for her darling? The poet answers this with a terseness, which it were vain for a translator to emulate. But wisdom, eloquence, fame, health, comfort and competency are the sum of her comprehensive desire. May these gracious powers be propitious to every ingenious and virtuous individual, among my readers; and, to add fervency to my warm wishes for their welfare, and to avail myself of the pomp and beauty of oriental metaphor, may they be like a cedar in Libanus, and as a cyprus tree upon the mountains of Hermon, like a palm in Engaddi, and as a rose plant in Jericho, as a fair olive tree in a pleasant field, and as a plane tree by the water; as Phison and Tigris in the time of the new fruits, as Jordan in the time of the harvest, and as Geon in the time of vintage.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
OBITUARY.

Died at his seat in Cawbridge, Eastern Shore of Maryland, on the eleventh of December, in the forty-second year of his age, WILLIAM VANS MURRAY, Esq. late Minister of the United States, to the Batavian Republic, and one of the Envoys extraordinary to the French Republic.

Mr. Murray was one of those characters, whose decease ought not to be passed over, with the mere ordinary notice of a newspaper paragraph. At an early age, he had risen high in the honors, and shared largely in the confidence of his country. He had filled various offices of the most important trust, and had executed their duties with great ability and success. He had rendered to the United States services, the importance of which will be more and more appreciated the more they are known, and the more extensively their consequences, which are still operating, shall be spread. He was a virtuous citizen. He was a faithful, able and indefatigable public servant. He was an accomplished and an amiable man. His memory is an object not uninteresting to his nation. To the heart of friendship which guides the pen at this moment, it is precious, it is inestimable.

During the period of the American revolution, Mr. Murray was passing from that of infancy to manhood. At the peace of 1783, he was about twenty-two years of age, and had received an education preparatory to the practice of the law. Immediately after that event he went to London, for the benefit of improvement by travel and foreign instruction, and resided during a period of three years as a student in the temple. Here he became acquainted with, and enjoyed the society of several English gentlemen, then upon the same establishment, and who have since become very eminent characters in that nation as statesmen, and in the republic of letters as men of genius and science. At an age, when the passions usually riot in their most unlicensed range; with a natural constitution by its exquisite sensibility, peculiarly exposed to the seductions of dissipation, and in the midst of a luxurious and splendid metropolis, where all the energies and powers of man, are combined to vary the scenes of delight, and multiply enjoyments, where sloth allures to beds of down, and pleasure beckons with swimming eye, and enehanting smiles, he retained the firmness and resolution of devoting his time and attention to those objects, which were to mark the usefulness of his future life. The observations of Doctor Price, of Mr. Turgot, and of the Abbe de Mably upon the constitutions and laws of the United States, were published, during this residence of Mr. Murray in England. He felt the importance of the subject, and meditated these writings of those great men, with that ardour of research and that integrity of purpose, which were strongly marked features of his mind and heart. He published the result of his reflections, in a pamphlet which was favourably received by the public, and which may still be consulted with advantage by any person curious of our constitutional history.

In the summer of 1784, while a student in the Temple, Mr. Murray took advantage of a vacation, to make an excursion of about six weeks to Holland. He travelled over that country with the pleasure which during that season of the year, it cannot fail to give a man of lively imagination; of accurate observation and of judicious reflection. Enjoying the novelty and beauties of its scenery, remarking the manners, characters and usages of the inhabitants, inquiring into their laws, constitutions, and government, he committed to paper the result of all, as he went along; at the inns, in the travelling barks, at every resting place of the stage, he was assiduous in the use of his pen, and thus improved to valuable purpose every moment of that time, which he had considered as indulged to relaxation and amusement. The mass of information which he thus collected, and preserved in minutes made on the spot, he afterwards digested and methodized into a regular work; which has never been published, and which the writer of this article has never seen, but which he hopes is not lost, and wishes may one day be published.

Before the expiration of the term which Mr. Murray had allotted to his residence in England, he lost his father. The death of a distant friend, is almost always to the survivor the same in effect as if it were sudden death. Mr. Murray had no intimation of his father's illness. The first intelligence he received, after a letter from him indicating perfect health, was an abrupt notification of his decease. To that father, his attachment was unbounded. It was the gratitude of a generous soul united to the sentiment of filial affection. The shock was too violent for a constitution always feeble, and that at time in precarious health. The day after receiving the information, he took to his bed from which for six weeks he did not rise; a languid and tedious convalescence of several months succeeded this illness, shortly after which he returned to his native country.

In the course of his abode in England he formed an attachment to the lady, to whom he was afterwards united, and who survives to lament his loss.

Immediately after his return he engaged in the practice of the law; but the voice of his country very soon called him to her councils. He was elected first a member of the Legislature of Maryland, and at three successive elections, from 1791 to 1797, to a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States. This station he filled with distinguished honour to himself, and with entire satisfaction to his constituents. His fortune however, which was not affluent, had suffered, by the devotion of his time to the public service, and so loudly called for some of his attention in its turn, that in 1797, he had declined standing a candidate for re-election. But his merit and talents had not escaped the discerning eye of a WASHINGTON. He was unwilling that they should be buried in retirement, and one of the last acts of his administration, was the appointment of Mr. Murray, as Minister of the United States to the Batavian Republic.

He arrived at the Hague, at a very critical period of affairs. The misunderstandings and disputes between the United States and France, were festering to a rupture. The influence of France over the Batavian councils was untroubled, and her disposition to involve Holland in opposition to her most unquestionable and urgent interest in the quarrel, was not equivocal. By a judicious mixture of firmness, of address, and of conciliation, he not only succeeded in preserving uninterrupted harmony between the American and Batavian nations, but when the French government, listening to wiser suggestions than those, which had almost precipitated them into a war with America, became sensible that the true interests of both nations, dictated peace and reconciliation, their first step was to send to the Hague a negotiator calculated by his personal character, by his patriotism as a Frenchman, and by his friendly disposition towards the Americans, to second the congenial views and intentions of the American Minister at that place. The first advances towards a restoration of harmony were thus made, by conferences between Mr. Murray, and Mr. Pichon, then chargé des affaires of France at the Hague; these led to certain propositions for a renewal of direct negotiation, made by France, which Mr. Murray transmitted to his government.

When the dispatches, containing the account of these interviews, and the propositions of the French government were received, and had been fully considered by the then President of the U. States, he thought them sufficient to lay the foundation for that direct negotiation which was desired by France; he nominated Mr. Murray as Envoy extraordinary to the French Republic, for that purpose. This was undoubtedly, under the circumstances of that time, no ordinary testimony of confidence in the abilities, as well as the integrity of the Minister. It was even thought by those who had less experience, and knowledge of his talents and character, confidence too extensive. In compliance with these opinions, two other gentlemen, of the highest respectability, were afterwards joined in the nomination and commission with him. He had justly estimated the proof of the Presidents' personal trust, exhibited in the first and sole nomination; and he felt it as an additional mark of the same esteem, when he had colleagues given him, with whom it was an honour to be associated.

The issue of this negotiation, which terminated in the treaty concluded at Paris, the 30th of September 1800, is too recent, not to be within the recollection of every one. Immediately after the signature of that instrument, Mr. Murray returned to his station, as Minister resident at the Hague, where he remained until after the commencement of the present administration. He was then sent again to Paris, to make the exchange of the ratifications, which he accordingly effected. But, as it was judged unnecessary to continue the expense of maintaining a public Minister at the Hague, he was immediately afterwards recalled from that mission, and returned to the United States in December, 1801. From that period, until his decease, he had lived in retirement at his seat in Cambridge. His health had always been infirm, and, for the last eighteen months, had been in a continual decline.

In private life, Mr. Murray was remarkably pleasing in his manners, and at once amusing and instructive in his conversation. With a mind, of incessant activity, and observation ever upon the watch, he united the all enlivening fancy of a poet, and with the most inoffensive good nature, a peculiar turn of original humour. He had a strong and genuine relish for the fine arts, a refined and delicate taste for literature, and a persevering and patient fondness for the pursuits of science. The compass of his conversation therefore was very extensive, and concurred with a temper social in the highest degree, to make him the delight of his friends, and intimates. The keenness of his sensibility, and the rapidity of his conceptions, had given him a sense of decorum and propriety, which seemed almost intuitive. He perceived instantaneously, and felt deeply every departure from it. But his wit and temper, always led him to consider it with good humour, and to represent it with pleasantry. He had therefore, a powerful talent at ridicule, and though, both from principle and disposition he kept it under a well disciplined controul, yet it could not always avoid those resentments, which are the only defence of dulness and folly against it.

His facility in writing, was proportioned to the vivacity of his mind: His letters were strongly marked with the characteristic features of conversation, and, by their elegance, their plicity, their poignant wit, and unbounded variety of style might serve as models of epistolary correspondence.

As a public speaker, he also ranked high. During the six years of his service in the Congress of the United States, he took an active part in the measures and debates of the time, and as a test of his talents in this capacity, it may suffice to say, that in legislative assemblies accustomed to the eloquence of a Madison, and an Ames, of a Giles and a Dexter, Mr. Murray's station was 'if not first, on the very first line.' It may also serve to confirm the truth of this observation, that this was the place, where his situation and conduct attracted the notice, and engaged the esteem and confidence of the first President of the United States.

In giving to the public, this feeble and imperfect sketch, of one of the brightest characters, which has arisen in the American Union, since the establishment of its independence, the writer must lament that the shortness of time, has not allowed him to make it more worthy of the subject, and while indulging the private tear, at the earthly dissolution by the hand of death, of long-trying and affectionate friendship, he may confidently call upon the sorrows of his country, to mingle with his own, at the loss of a citizen, whose career, cut short, at little more than half the ordinary period of human life, had already been signalized by attainments thus extraordinary, and by services thus pre-eminent. How few among mankind, of any time or nation, at the age of forty-two, have ever given such decisive and important pledges of the patriots' virtue, and the statesmans' wisdom, as the man to whom this tribute of attachment and respect is paid? If the love and veneration of United America be justly due to those exalted characters, under whose conduct she rose to independence, and adorned her rank among the nations, she will never be unmindful of the departed worth, which emerging at a later date into life has toiled with equal ardour, and aimed with equal devotion, to strengthen her independence with the pillars of security, and to adorn her temples with the wreath of national glory.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, GUILDHALL.
BEFORE LORD ELLENBOROUGH.
Ewing v. Ward.

This was an action for assault and battery, and false imprisonment, brought by the plaintiff, who was an attorney at law, to recover damages of the defendant, the proprietor of a very celebrated public house, called the Cock, at Temple Bar. The case, as stated on the part of the plaintiff's counsel, was a very violent one. It was supposed that the plaintiff, after having soberly and moderately finished his porter and brandy and water, had peaceably retired, giving three pence to the waiter, and civilly wishing the landlord good night, and that in return for this orderly and good conduct, the landlord had, without any provocation, rushed out of his bar, beat the pacific attorney, dragged him out of the house by the collar, delivered him over to the watch, and finally had him committed to the Compter upon an unjust allegation, that he had committed a riot in the defendant's house; all this was inferred, and the injury the plaintiff had received was stated by Mr. Erskine in the most glowing colours.

The defendant had pleaded, first, that the plaintiff had assaulted him; and secondly, that he had conducted himself in a riotous manner, which rendered it necessary to turn him out of the house.

Upon the cross examination of the plaintiff's own witnesses, the real plain fact appeared to be nothing more or less than this:—the plaintiff had been keeping it up till the watchful bird, from which the house derived its name, had twice done saluting the morn; it was between two and three o'clock; and what added to the impropriety of the plaintiff's intemperance was, that it was a Sunday morning. At such an hour it was not at all surprising that the plaintiff should have forgot precisely the number of glasses of brandy and water he had drank, and he insisted he had drank less by one than the waiter had charged him with. The waiter maintained the accuracy of his reckoning, upon which the plaintiff persisted he was mistaken, and attempted to beat it into him by those manual and practical arguments, which few Englishmen, however low their situation, chuse to endure with patience. An appeal was made to the landlord, who said, he would as soon believe his waiter as he would the plaintiff, at the same time not meaning to make any reflection on him for being an attorney.

The plaintiff, irritated at his veracity being put at issue with that of a common tapster, declared it was only the defendant's being at the bar protected him, and that, if he would not demur to coming out, he would treat him as he deserved. He then proceeded to make a noise and disturbance, upon which the defendant was compelled, for the sake of preserving the peace of the house and family, to proceed to an ejection: and for that purpose having gently laid his hands upon the plaintiff, he succeeded in getting the attorney on the outside of the house, and then very wisely fastened his door to prevent his re-admittance, and delivered him into the custody of a faithful guardian of the night, denominated a watchman, who carried him before a constable of the watch, by whom, after hearing the charge, he was committed to the Poultry Compter, where he laid perdue till the next day at noon, when, upon depositing certain symbols, as a security for his appearance before the Magistrate the next morning, he was delivered from incarceration.

This appeared to be the whole of the case.

Mr. Garrow, who was counsel for the defendant, proposed, in consideration of the confinement the plaintiff had suffered, to withdraw a juror.

Lord Ellenborough was of opinion, that the plaintiff's riotous conduct, at such an hour of a Sunday morning, was a justification of what the defendant had done. His lordship also thought, that the plaintiff's threat to the defendant, in case he came out of his bar, amounted to a challenge.

Mr. Garrow, though he clearly might have had a verdict, adhered to his first proposition, and a juror was withdrawn.

The defendant and his party, elated at their victory, proceeded to the Cock in triumph, where no doubt there was plenty of crowing in the course of the evening.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. NUPTIAL.

Married, on the twenty-ninth of December, by the Right Reverend Dr. White, THOMAS MANNERS, Esq. Captain in his BRITANNICK Majesty's 49th regiment of foot, to Miss MARY RUSH, daughter of Dr. Benjamin Rush of this city.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

Mess. Conrad have published, from the neat press of Mess. Palmer, an edition of 'the Maid of Bristol,' a play, in three acts, by J. Boaden. To this popular performance is appended, by way of epilogue, from G. Colman, the younger, a very spirited address to the patriotism of the British people.

Mr. S. F. Bradford's fine edition of HERON'S JUNIUS is in a state of very great forwardness. This work is impatiently expected by the curious, not only from a wish to possess an English Classic, in an elegant form, but from the reputation of Mr. Heron, as an ingenious and well principled commentator. All who are inquisitive respecting any of the political occurrences in England, during the administration of the Earl of Bute, and the Duke of Grafton, will find much information and amusement in this curious volume.

Mess. Conrad have just published a very portable and neat edition of Smollett's translation of Don Quixote. It is ornamented with engravings, and deserves to be mentioned as the first American edition of a romance, which will be read and remembered as long as Spain vaunts of her Cervantes, and as long as Good Sense, benignant Wit, and grave Irony have an admirer.

Mr. THOMAS DOBSON has in the press the Abbe Clavigero's History of Mexico. This useful, accurate, and elegant work, is derived both from Mexican and Spanish documents, and from the ancient hieroglyphics of the Indians. It is illustrated by charts, and ornamented with engravings, and to the whole are appended critical dissertations on the land, the animals, and the inhabitants of Mexico.

This work is to be elegantly printed, and the plates are to be engraved, in a beautiful style, by Lawson, an artist of celebrity.

Mr. Dobson offers this work, to subscribers, at the moderate price of seven dollars and fifty cents for three large volumes in 8vo. It will be speedily published, and we wish the enterprising bookseller, who has undertaken the publication, and who is distinguished for his good taste, judgment, and industry, in the business of literature, may be amply requited, by a quick sale of this history. We remember, at its first appearance, that the accuracy of its details, and the vividness of its descriptions, arrested the attention, and elicited the notice of EDMUND BURKE.

It will interest both the American booksellers and the public, to apprise them, that, late in November last, a third volume of the life and writings of WILLIAM COWPER, Esq. consisting of Original Letters, edited by William Hayley, was preparing for the London press.

A new edition of the works of ADDISON, as collected by Mr. Tickell, with some additions, is in the press, in six volumes, 8vo. printed uniformly with the works of Bacon, Locke, &c.

ADDISONIANA; a work relative to the life, times, and contemporaries of Mr. ADDISON, on the same plan as the Walpoliana, embellished with portraits, &c. and with seven letters of Mr. Addison never before published, neatly engraved, from the originals, in two elegant volumes, price 10s. 6d. in boards.

SWIFTIANA; on the plan of the preceding, with portraits, and with fac similes of Dr. Swift, Bolingbroke, Voltaire, and a great number of his contemporaries, in two elegant volumes, price 10s. 6d. in boards.

The English Editors consider it a duty which they owe to themselves, to state that these works do not consist of mere selections, or of 'the beauties' of their respective authors, but are an attempt towards the production of a limited series of genuine English Anas.

The celebrated Abbe Levizac, who has distinguished himself among the emigrant French

Literati in London, by publishing various grammatical treatises of celebrity, and by editing several of the French Classics, has, in conjunction with Mons. Moisant, published 'Bibliothèque Portative' of the French writers, or French Elegant Extracts, a new edition on a new plan, four volumes of prose, and two of verse.

This collection is said to be the most extensive, useful and varied, now existing in the language. It unites all that is perfect in the French Classics, from the most emphatic eloquence, to the most familiar letter. It contains something to please all ages and tastes; and as it is intended as a companion to the English Elegant Extracts, it has been printed in the same size on a similar type and paper.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

While our modern patriots are daily howling about the natural rights of the people—republican principles—representative government, &c. it is humbly asked, how the friends of the Mammoth reconcile their doctrines to the purchase of the people of Louisiana, with all their political rights, without their privity or consent, or by what authority they have imposed on the people, who, it is 'self-evident, are, by nature our equals,' a government 'as despotic as it is wicked?' It was once contended, that the people of America could not be bound by laws passed in the British Parliament, in which they were not represented. Four colonists, hearing this example, should also rebel, who could blame them?

The serene President neve obtained a more absolute domination over his numerous negro slaves, whom nature has created his equals, and toward whom he obeys the dictates of nature, than he has acquired over this new colony, by his purchase from the French.

Died at Turnham Green, September the 28th 1803, in the eighty-third year of his age, Ralph Griffiths, Esq. LL. D. long known as the Editor and proprietor of the Monthly Review. He was a native of Shropshire; and came young to the Metropolis, where his love of literature induced him to commence his career as a bookseller; which situation afforded him the opportunities which he so much desired, of connecting himself with most of the principal characters of the time. Very shortly afterward, he laid the plan of a Literary Journal, of which the first number, under the title of 'The Monthly Review,' appeared in May, 1749. The success of this work was for a time slow, but at length it fairly established itself; and it has been uniformly continued from that period to the present time, at the rate of two volumes yearly, to 1789, and three volumes yearly ever since, standing the first in sale and reputation among English works of the kind, and probably the sole example in the history of letters of a publication continued during fifty-four years under one title, and Editorship. Its services to the cause of free inquiry and liberal sentiment have been great; and it may be considered as having materially contributed to form the prevalent character of British Literature for the last half century. The Editor long ago retired from other business, and devoted himself entirely to the conduct of this undertaking, which repaid his attention by its fame and emolument. Dr. Griffiths was an amiable man in private life, cheerful and instructive in conversation, abounding in anecdote, well informed on a variety of subjects, and much beloved by his friends and acquaintance. He was twice married, but has left only one surviving son, who has, for many years, assisted him in the management of his Review, and in whom the property is vested.

In vol. II. of that learned work, the Asiatic Register, the ingenious contributors to that Miscellany, after stiling Sir W. Jones, an 'universal scholar' thus conclude their review of his works.

Of the wonderful attainments of Sir W. Jones it is difficult to speak in qualified terms. His comprehensive mind, seems to have embraced the whole circle of science in its ample grasp; and his works prove, that, in most branches of human knowledge, he had reached a high degree of excellence. His latin odes are classical and elegant; his versions of Hafiz are the only real specimens in our language, of the rich and copious strains of the Persian bard; the Institutes of Menu, Hetopadesa, and Sacontala throw more light on the manners, and civil and religious institutions of the Hindus than can be derived from all other sources collectively, if we except the agreeable translations of Mr. Wilkins, and his anniversary discourses communicate an infinite variety of curious and useful information, in a style at once elegant and impressive. His indefatigable application, exhibits a useful example to literary men; but the extent and variety of his attainments who can hope to reach? By his premature death, literature has met with one of the severest losses, it has sustained in the eighteenth century; for highly as we value the performances, we have just analyzed, we are confident, that if his life had been protracted, his future productions would have supplied the most important desiderata for the elucidation of ancient history, and thrown an entirely new light on the origin and progress of civil society. The oriental muses may now exclaim. 'Tecum una tota est nostra sepulta domus.'

The ensuing brief but pointed remarks of an English gentleman, who has lately visited Paris, and, after being an indignant spectator of the atrocious crimes and childish folly of an execrable-republic, has gladly returned to England, his native country, 'the sole great refuge of mankind against the opposite mischiefs of despotism and democracy,' are entitled to particular attention. It should be remembered, that the writer was once an enthusiast of Democracy, and that after visiting two republics, and witnessing their weaknesses, has abjured all the heresies of a popular form of government.

I assure you no individual ever rejoiced more at returning from transportation, than I did, when I revisited the 'divisos orbe Britannos.' I was thoroughly sick of republican insolence, and republican despotism; and, under the dominion of the Corsican cut-throat, I felt constantly as if I were in a large dungeon. I am confident that no one, who has not been in France, can have the least conception of the system of tyranny and espionage which prevails there. Even during the short period of my residence in Paris, I felt the chain drawing tighter and tighter every day. If my sentiments had not previously undergone a complete change, my residence in France would have brought me to my senses. Apropos, I find the same change seems generally to have taken place in this country. We are united heart and hand; and I am confident that if the upstart usurper or any of his myrmidons effect a landing here, they will never return. John Bull never since he was created, felt for the French or their master more perfect detestation and contempt.

The Rev. W. L. Bowles, whose elegant pen has already commanded such general applause, has finished, and will speedily publish, a Poem, entitled 'The Spirit of Discovery, by Sea.'

The Spanish Literati continue to spread illumination among their countrymen, by publishing translations of the best French and German works that have lately appeared upon agriculture, natural history, medicine, and other arts, and sciences.

Dr. Bisset has just finished a Novel, under the title of Modern Literature.

Mr. Holcroft's travels in France, Holland, and Germany, in the year 1801, and 1802, form, say the conductors of the London Monthly Magazine, the most splendid book in the whole compass of English literature. To meet the views of various purchasers, there will be copies at two prices, one at eight guineas, in which the magnificent plates will be bound in an atlas by themselves, and another at five guineas, in which, after a necessary reduction of the breadth of the skies, the plates will be folded into the volumes. The engravings are large, by the first artists representing the principal objects and buildings in Paris, from beautiful drawings made under the direction of the author.

On a festal day, lately celebrated at Boston, the following toasts were given among many others, in the same spirit; they are preserved in the Port Folio, because they are perfectly to the taste of the Editor; because distinctly, boldly, and nervously they express, the just, the useful and true.

The President of the United States—Let history take care of his fame, and conscience of his recompense.

Louisiana—a country without patriots—May our Patriots without a country occupy what they have bought, and leave us to enjoy what we have inherited.

The Navy—May it be so augmented that it may protect our exposed commerce; and so employed that it will raise our degraded national spirit.

Let those who buy right and sell honour, have contempt gratis.

Such soundness in public opinion, that if our great men will not speak the truth they shall hear it.

RUFUS KING—An ornament to his country at home and abroad.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.—The gentleman—the statesman—the soldier.—Sound in his politics and correct in his views

FISHER AMES—His country 'will take charge of his fame, and conscience of his recompense.'

Old England—May she shew her best face to her worst enemy.

Our Subscribers and Agents are very respectfully apprized, that, henceforth, the price of the Port Folio is fixed at SIX DOLLARS. This augmentation is but an act of justice to the Editor, who, for three years, has published this paper, with an expense so large, and an income so small, that prudence requires a small addition to the premium of labour. The price of workmanship and materials are so high, that the Port Folio cannot be afforded for less than six dollars; and the most captious, or most sceptical Subscriber, may, on a fair examination, satisfy himself, that the price of this Miscellany, far from being exorbitantly dear, forms an annual volume, cheaper than any contemporary work of a similar description, published either at home or abroad.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The well reasoned speech of Mr. Tracy, one of the most distinguished politicians in the American Senate, will be very seriously meditated by every man, jealous of an invasion of his political rights, and solicitous for the existence of the Federal Constitution.

The Biography of Pascal we strongly recommend to the attention of every student and man of letters. It must instruct the first, and amuse the second.

When we consider how much care, delicacy, and taste are required in choosing the topics of panegyric, the character of Mr. Murray, delineated by a moral painter, of acknowledged skill, will be regarded with complacency by every man of letters, and every man of feeling. The Editor has good reason to believe that the Biographer of the late Mr. Murray knew him well, and that, high and important as the public stations were to which he had attained, the extent and solidity of his merit, were far from being sufficiently known and recognized, therefore the testimonial in our Obituary is not the language of exaggerated eulogy, or even partial friendship. It is the voice of honest and unadulterated truth.

The blank verse of 'Asmodeo' has been perused with entire approbation. We regret that he, at any time, denies himself the company of the Muse, for, during the past six months, we have been losers, in consequence of the resolution of our ingenious correspondent. We shall always be happy to hear from him, and his prose, his rhymes, or his blank verse, shall always have a ready insertion. Our opinion of his literary powers is high, and the public have not yet forgotten the ingenuity and spirit of his 'Bob Buntline.'

The Editor must again inform his correspondents, that it is very seldom he has either room or inclination for the insertion of political or other essays, which have already been made familiar to the public by the daily papers. The office of the Port Folio is not a retail shop for the receipt or sale of faded articles. The Editor must insist that those gentlemen, who adopt this paper as the vehicle of their sentiments, would send him their original manuscripts.

The author of an elaborate and elegant criticism upon 'As you like it,' is requested, by his friend, to select, as a subject for his ingenious analysis, the 'Midsummer Night's Dream.' A play so romantic in its incidents, so sweet and voluble in its dialogue, so warm with youthful affection, and so brilliant with all the gems of SHAKESPEARE, will afford a captivating theme to a man of letters and sensibility.

FROM PHAEDRUS.

ASINUS AD PASTOREM.

Pauper dominum, non sortem, mutat.

When mighty tumults vex the state,
Think not, ye little, to be great,
Ye only change your master;
From gentle sway of Kings restor'd,
France stoops beneath a Consul's sword,
And is but bound the faster.

Some time, last war, it came to pass,
A dotard fed his little ass
On dainty tops of thistle;
When sudden sounds the hostile trumpet,
Zounds! Jack! the foe! let's quickly stump it,
We're nab'd else in a whistle.

Quoth Jack, the while most coolly munching,
'Old gem'man, ere I leave my luncheon,
Solve me a point or two:
If made a pris'ner, will my back
Be hamper'd with a heavier pack,
Than what I bear for you?'

Cries old one 'no!' 'then go your ways,'
Said Jack, 'and leave me here to graze,
I gain not shame nor glory;
Mine ancient, wherefore should I fly?
What side I toil for care not I,
I'm neither whig nor tory.'

SKETCHES No. IX.

FAREWELL TO THE SCENES OF THE PRECEDING SKETCHES, ON RETURNING HOME.

How throbs my heart, while now I sing,
Ye much lov'd scenes, a fond farewell,
To each lone spot, each chrystal spring,
Each fragrant bower and bloomy dell.

No more amid your pleasing shade,
The solitary bard shall roam,
But, every care with joy repaid,
He seeks again his native home.

Health, blue-ey'd nymph, with port sublime,
Comes rising on the northern blast,
And now once more revolving time
Proclaims the tyrants reign is past.

Terror no more, with ghastly mien,
Presides o'er every social dome,
But welcome Peace, with smile serene,
Recalls us to our native home.

Father of light, whose dread command
Can still the raging whirlwind's force,
Spread desolation o'er the land,
Or stay the avenging angel's course.

To thee the grateful knee shall bend,
That now no more compell'd to roam,
We see the cherub Health descend
To bless our much lov'd native home.

Ye winding streams, whose murmur sound
Oft sooth'd my sorrows to repose;
Ye fragrant bowers, that vines surround,
Where bloom'd the lily and the rose—

To all your native charms farewell,
Amid your sweets no more I'll roam,
The daisied mead, the sylvan cell,
Seem joyless to the thoughts of home.

Yet oft in scenes of pleasing care,
Remembrance shall your charms renew,
That hush'd the sigh of fell despair,
And bade me brighter prospects view;

Though fancy to my sight recal
The busy street, the friendly dome,
One grateful tear for you will fall,
Ere I shall hail my native home.

ADDRESS TO AN OPPRESSOR OF THE ENSLAVED AFRICANS.

Cease, unfeeling monster, cease,
Let thy cruelty repose,
Let a transient gleam of peace,
Smile on wretched Afric's woes.

Let thy stern unfeeling soul
Yield to pity's pleading strain;
And humanity controul,
Thy insatiate thirst of gain.

See on Georgia's fatal plains,
Groan the victims of thy power,
While oppressions' various pains,
Every joy of life devour.

Sinking 'neath the scourge severe,
Hear the tortur'd wretches groan;
While the slowly streaming tear,
Mingles with the sullen moan.

Haste thee, miscreant, haste and ease,
Yonder sufferer from his doom,
Lest unheeded thou shall crave,
Mercy in a state to come.

When thy impious soul has fled,
To a dread eternal state;
And the awful page is read,
Pregnant with thy future fate.

There shall Afric's groans arise,
By her wretched sons prefer'd;
Aura's voice shall pierce the skies,
And Aswego's plaint be heard.

Daughters of the mystic dame,
From oblivion who can free;
Haste, and at the poet's flame,
Light the torch of infamy.

Bear it to the cursed shade,
Where the dust of Brotan lies,
Where in stygian garb array'd,
Brotans' restless spirit sighs.

Place it on the sculptur'd urn,
Where his chissell'd name appears;
Let it there forever burn,
A beacon to succeeding years.

Then posterity shall know,
Brotans' ignominious fame;
Africs' wretched sons shall throw,
Curses on his odious name.

SONNET.

Oh! Weisa, stream belov'd, once more I stray
On thy green banks, and court the cooling breeze,
Soft as it whispers through the bending trees,
Which o'er thy waters wave their quiv'ring spray,
And thus in broken murmurs seem to say:
'Leave, loitering youth, in indolence and ease
To waste thine hours; tho' much these scenes may please,
Yet here no longer may'st thou lingering stay.
Where other streams their limpid treasures pour,
Where other groves their cooling shades supply.
'Tis thine to rove; yet haply this fair bower,
This wand'ring stream may rise to fancy's eye.
Yes, yes, where'er I rove this wand'ring stream,
And this fair bower shall be my fav'rite theme.'

ELOQUENCE OF THE AMERICAN SENATE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CONTINUATION OF MR. TRACY'S SPEECH,

On the amendment of the Constitution,
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, December 2, 1803,

There are some other points of light, in which I wish to place the subject before us.

The constitution is of recent date; it was formed by the mutual concessions of conflicting parties, and balanced with a view to the security of all. Experience alone can test its utility, and time and practice discover its faults. It is a sound position that you should never attempt an alteration in an instrument so complicated, and calculated to serve so many various and opposite interests, without being able, by the test of experiment, to discern clearly the necessity of alteration, and without a moral certainty, that the change shall not only remove an existing evil, but that it shall not produce any itself. The article in the constitution establishing the mode of electing a chief magistrate; and which is now proposed to be altered, was undoubtedly one of the most difficult parts of the whole, at its formation. I am convinced, sir, that the public mind is not sufficiently impressed with the difficulty of adopting, not only an unexceptionable, but even a tolerable and practicable mode of electing a chief magistrate; possessing such important and extensive powers, as are constitutionally vested in the President of the United States. An attempt to detail the number and magnitude of his powers, to this Senate, would be impertinent: But it must and will be acknowledged by all, that the President is vested with powers vastly extensive and important, and that he will bring with him into the government more or less of state politics and state prejudices, and these facts, to which may be added the probability that he will be taken from a large state, must have increased the difficulties of the convention, in fixing on a mode of choice.

How often have contests, wars and bloodshed, the destruction of confederacies, of liberty, and of vast portions of the human race, arisen from the election of chief magistrates? When we consider that the powers vested in a President of this union, are sufficiently important to excite the avarice and ambition of the human heart, its two most active principles, to gain possession of the office; when we consider the difference of sentiment, habit and interest in this country; state pride, and state jealousy, which could never be laid asleep; the difficulties of fixing upon a proper mode of election, must be almost infinitely multiplied. And yet this article is now selected for alteration. All the amendments which have been hitherto adopted, went to some general explanation, upon very general principles, not changing, but rather expounding the constitution.

This, as I have before said, is taking up the most difficult and the most important article in the constitution, both in relation to rights and principles. But it is said that experience has shown us the necessity of an alteration in this article; that an evil has been found in practice to grow out of the constitutional provision, which calls imperiously for a remedy.

At the last election of President, two persons had an equal number of votes, and that number was a majority of the votes of all the electors appointed, which circumstance gave the house of representatives a constitutional right to select one of them for President. In exercising this constitutional right, they voted by states, and there was at first a division, no choice being made until the sixth day; when an election was effected, of the very man whom the great states, and the advocates of this resolution, wished.

It ought to be noted here, that although they voted by states, yet it happened, in this division, that a majority, in point of numbers, voted for the person President, who eventually became Vice-President. As to intrigue, by either of the candidates, or by their friends, I know of none; the sentiments and conduct of the Vice-President, as published, were perfectly fair and honourable, containing a declaration of his wishes not to stand in the way of the other candidate.

After the view of the constitution which we have taken, and comparing this fact, or set of facts, with the provisions for electing a President, we shall really be at a loss to find out the mighty evil, which the experience of this election has discovered, and which is said to call so imperiously for a remedy. But the advocates of this resolution have had the goodness to put their finger on the spot. They say, that in the certificates of the electors, Mr. Jefferson's name stood first; this is called a sort of record testimony, and in addition, some, if not all the electors, said they meant to elect Mr. Jefferson President, and Mr. Burr Vice-President; and this is declared to be the public will, expressed by the constitutional organ, the electors. Notwithstanding this expression of the public will, say the gentlemen, a large portion of the house of representatives withstood and opposed the public will, for the space of six days, and wilfully voted for the man to be President, who, they knew by the evidence just mentioned, was meant to be Vice-President only. One gentleman (Mr. Wright) has said, that if he had been then a member of that house, possessing such sentiments upon the subject, as he now does; such voting would in him have amounted to the crime of perjury, or words to the same effect; I mean to quote his ideas, as expressed, and believe I have given nearly his very words.

And it is added, that thus there was imminent danger of a person being imposed upon the United States as chief magistrate, who was not originally intended for that high office, and that civil war must have been the consequence. And, as is common in such cases, the picture is filled, in the back ground, with brother raising his murderous hand against brother, father against son, and with an afflicting group of et ceteras: and to avoid a repetition of this tremendous crisis, as it is called, the present resolution, it is said, must pass.

Let this statement of facts be kept in view, while we examine the duties assigned by the constitution to the several agents concerned. The duty of the electors is precisely defined. They are each to bring forward two candidates fully qualified for President, because they cannot know at the time of giving their ballots, upon which the choice will fall. The circumstance of two having a majority, and both being equal in number of votes, is an expression of the public will, through the only constitutional organ, by which, in this case, the public will can be expressed, that both had the requisite qualifications. The public will, then, was in this instance clearly and unequivocally expressed, by a constitutional, and a numerical majority, that both candidates were worthy of the office; but here the expression of the public will ceased, and which of these two should be the President, was now to be decided by another constitutional organ, that is by the house of representatives voting by states.

The framers of the constitution so intended, and the people who adopted it have so ordained, that their will in this case should be expressed by a majority of the states, acting by their representation in the house of representatives. This right of selection, is a right complete in itself, to be exercised by these second electors; uninfluenced by any extraneous consideration, and governed only by their own sense of propriety and rectitude. The opinion of the people had been expressed, by the electors, but it only reached a certain point, and then was totally silent as to which of the two should be President, and their sense upon this point could only be collected, through their constitutional organ, the house of representatives, voting by states. Any interference of the first electors, or of an individual or individuals, must be informal and improper. The advice of sensible and candid men, as in every other case, might be useful; but could have no binding force whatever. The first electors had no right to choose a Vice-President. To claim it was overstepping their duty, and arrogating to themselves a power, not given, nor meant to be given to them by the constitution.

If there is any thing in this whole transaction, which has the most distant appearance of a breach of duty, it was in the electors, by attempting to designate, and by exercising the important office of an elector, under the influence of improper motives; that is, by officiously attempting to decide the question, which of the two persons was proper for Vice-President, which they were constitutionally incompetent to decide. By this conduct they attempted to break down an important guard provided by the constitution, improperly to release themselves from tions, which made it their duty to select two men qualified to be President. But if there can be a shadow of reason in this claim of the electors, to designate under the present constitutional regulations, of which, to doubt, seems to be so heinous, what necessity can there be for this amendment? The object of the amendment, or certainly its chief object is to establish the designating principle; but why this, if it can already be effected by the simple mode of placing one name first on the ballot, which is so easy to be done, that it can scarcely be avoided? And if done, by the doctrine of gentlemen, it is so far binding on the house of representatives that if they even doubt, they are damned?

The fact certainly was, that at the last election, the great states brought forward the two candidates; they were both of the same political sentiments; this, they had a constitutional right to do; but it now seems that their language to the small states was; 'because you will not give up your constitutional rights to us, and let us go on and designate, we will stir up a civil war, and lay the blame to you. And of this improper conduct of ours we will take the advantage, and obtain an alteration of the constitution, which will hereafter gratify us in every respect.' A gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Smith.) has said that he heard, though he could not prove it, that the federal majority at the time of the last election, contemplated making a law, authorizing or appointing some person to act as President, in case no choice had been made by the house of representatives. I was then, sir, a member of the government, and know nothing of such a project, it might have been so, but supposing it was, what then? Why says the gentleman, the person thus appointed could not have kept his head on his shoulders 24 hours; and this would have made a civil war. If the majority now should contemplate a measure, which the constitution does not authorize, as it clearly did not authorize the measure suspected by the gentleman, though he cannot prove it; the best thing in the world for them to do, would be to give it up, without any attempt to effect it, as it seems the federal majority did. But what argument all this can afford in favour of the amendment, or why it was mentioned, in this debate, is beyond my comprehension. In the result of the last election, the great states and the ruling political party, were certainly gratified, and there does not appear the least reasonable ground of complaint against the small states, in the use of their constitutional rights on the occasion. All support therefore to the amendment, drawn from that transaction, must fail.

I have said, that the article fixing the mode of electing a chief magistrate was, from its nature, attended with many difficulties. A more strict inquiry into the constitutional mode, and a comparison of it, in some other and more particular points, with the proposed alteration, will be useful in forming an opinion of their relative merits.

As the constitution stands, each elector is to write the names of two persons on a piece of paper, called a ballot. Either of the two persons thus voted for may be the President, and the elector cannot know which; this affords the most powerful inducement to vote for two, both of whom are qualified for the very important office. For it is not only uncertain upon whom the choice will fall at first, but the one remaining, will certainly be President, upon any contingency which shall remove or incapacitate the first. The convention seem to have selected a mode of proceeding the most simple, the least liable to accident, and the best calculated to insure the main object, that is, that both should be really worthy of the trust. If one candidate wishes to make interest with the electors, as each must vote for two, it will be impossible for bribery or intrigue to succeed; for, without corrupting the whole or certainly many more than half, he may be defeated by the other candidate on the ballot. This is, perhaps, the most effectual bar to intrigue, that was ever contrived; for, unless all, or a great proportion of the electors are corrupted, an extreme case of depravity not probable in any country, intrigue can have no assurance of success. The danger and difficulty, which must always attend such an important election, as that of chief magistrate of the United States, was meant to be avoided, by diminishing the chances of its frequent recurrence. So two persons are placed in a condition to act as President in succession, to prevent both the evils, of a vacancy, and of a recurrence of choice more frequently than once in four years. And it seems merely incidental to this second person, to be called Vice-President, and neither the first nor second description of electors can have any right to vote for him as such, indeed he can have no existence till the first character is designated and then seems to be discovered, not elected. The Senate, in case of an equal number of votes for two or more remaining persons, after the President is elected, are vested with authority to choose a Vice-President, for as such he is to preside over this body, and this body therefore seems to be the only constitutional organ to designate him. Both the other descriptions of electors have nothing to do with such a character or office; but are confined to act with a single reference to the character and office of President; and are trusted with no power to give any opinion of the character or qualifications of a Vice-President. And it is remarkable, that there are no appropriate qualifications made necessary by the constitution, for a Vice President; but every qualification has reference to President. There is another important feature in this part of the constitution. 'It was known by the convention, that in this country, in common with all others, where there is freedom of opinion and of speech, there would be parties. They likewise knew, that the intolerance of the major, or ruling sect and political party, was frequently exercised upon the minor party; and that the rights of the minority ought to be protected to them.'

As well then, to secure the rights of the minority, as to check the intolerance of the majority, they placed the majority in jeopardy if they should attempt at grasping all the benefits of a President and Vice-President within themselves, to the total exclusion of the minority. This very case which happened at the last election was contemplated, in which the majority attempted totally to exclude the minority from any participation. The language of the constitution to such majorities is, 'take care that you aim not at too much, for if you do, it is put into the power of the minority to check you, and by a judicious disposition of their few votes, determine the choice of President.' To avoid this event the majority will probably be cautious in the exercise of power; and thus the rights, the proper weight and influence of a minority are secured against the conduct of the majority, which is certainly liable to be intolerant and oppressive. In this respect the spirit of the constitution is, political moderation. And it is clear to my mind, that the experience of the last election has taught a lesson to all majorities, which will in future completely secure them from again incurring a similar risk. I recollect well, that it was thought probable, when the electoral votes were given, that Mr. Burr would have a vote or two, in some of the eastern states. If he had received but one, he would have been by an electoral choice, the constitutional President. If the majority in future have the powers of recollection, they will undoubtedly avoid the evil, if it is one, which happened at the last election, with such unfailing certainty, that there will be no need of the remedy proposed by the amendment. But the majority say, if their votes are so scattered for one candidate as to avoid this danger, that another will be incurred; and that is, the minority will elect a Vice-President. The language of the constitution to them, is again, 'that this was meant as a security for the minority against the majority.' But the majority exclaim against both these provisions, as very unreasonable indeed: 'what,' say they, 'are minorities to govern majorities?' The answer of the constitution is 'no, but their due weight and influence shall be secured to them, and the danger of your intolerance guarded against.' For the security of small states and minorities, there is, in the constitution a mixture of the federative with the popular principles. And as it is well known that, when popular majorities alone prevail, and exercise power uncontrolled by constitutional checks, the minorities, who generally possess their proportion of integrity and virtue, are overwhelmed, and liberty itself, by the same means, destroyed; so it is in kindness to both parties, to the country and to humanity, that these wholesome checks are constitutionally provided. Had the majority, or the great states, been willing, fairly to have submitted to the constitutional checks in the last election, no evil could have happened. And it is remarkable that the constitution completely protects them, as long as they obey its precepts, in the creation of which they had an agency, and to which they have solemnly agreed. To prove that I am correct in these ideas, I not only refer to the constitution but to the secretary of state (Mr. Madison). In the Virginia debates, vol. I. page 96, he says, 'But on a candid examination of history, we shall find that turbulence, violence and abuse of power, by the majority trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions which, in republics, have more frequently than any other cause produced despotism. If we go over the whole history of ancient and modern republics, we shall find their destruction to have generally resulted from those causes. If we consider the peculiar situation of the United States, and what are the resources of that diversity of sentiments which pervades its inhabitants, we shall find great danger that the same causes may terminate here, in the same fatal effects, which they produced in those republics. This danger ought to be wisely guarded against: Perhaps, in the progress of this discussion it will appear, that the only possible remedy for those evils, and means of preserving and protecting the principles of republicanism, will be found in that very system, which is now exclaimed against as the parent of oppression.'

Mr. President, it has often been said by the discerning and judicious of this and other countries, that our constitution, for its brevity, its comprehensiveness, its perspicuity, and the political skill contained in it, was the best state paper extant. I believe all this, and even more is a tribute justly due to its merits; and I am persuaded that the article which fixes a mode for the choice of a chief magistrate, stands most prominent among its excellencies.

Let us now, sir, examine and compare the merits of the amendment with a special reference to this last view we have taken of the constitutional provision.

The amendment authorizes the electors to vote for a President, and for a Vice-President by specific designation. Is ambition in your country? Here is a direct and inviting object for its operations.

Is the integrity of your electors assailable? You place it here in the most encouraging attitude for an assault. A fear of detection, and a sense of shame, upon the exposure of an improper action, has been, perhaps, a better security against political errors or crimes, than all the moral virtues united, when the temptation has been attended with an impossibility of detection. An intrigue with an elector, can be carried on without much danger of detection; but when your election is carried into the house of representatives, besides the ordinary weight of character in favour of the members of that house, a detection of an intrigue with a candidate is almost certain. It will be recollected, that at the last election, two or three members held the choice perfectly in their own hands. If I mistake not, three gentlemen, that is, a member from New-Jersey, a member from Vermont, and one from either Maryland, Delaware, or Tennessee, could have given a President to the United States. The particular gentlemen mentioned were above suspicion of bribery; but in addition to this circumstance, if they had in the contest, gone over, from improper motives, or under the influence of bribery, a detection was certain.

This will remain forever, the criterion, as it respects the relative danger of intrigue and bribery, in the two modes of choice. And the amendment is avowedly intended to secure a choice by electors, and to prevent a resort to the house; because says the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Taylor,) 'If you permit the election to go into the house, there, are small states, and minorities, and all the evils of a diet election; meaning, that corruption must be the consequence. But he says, 'let there be a divided election, by the electors, meeting by states separately, and you lessen the tendency to corruption.' This may look plausible in theory, but I think practice will show its fallacy.

It may be better for the electors to meet by states, than for all to be together, but this can never prove that they are less liable to corruption than the house of representatives; which is the only point in question.

The manner of electing the Vice-President, as proposed by the amendment, not only invites ambition to an unchecked operation; but exposes us to the selection of a less important, and more unfit person, than the constitutional provision. In addition to his importance in the government arising from his incidental succession to the chief magistracy, the Vice-President is ex officio, President of the Senate, and gives a direct influence, to the state from which he is chosen, of a third vote in this body, in all cases of equal division, which are usually the cases of most importance. Besides, his influence as presiding officer is, perhaps, more than equal to the right of a vote. It becomes therefore peculiarly important to the small states, and to minorities, whose security rests in this body, not only that their influence in the election of Vice-President should not be diminished; but that no measure be adopted, which may tend to bestow the office upon an unworthy character. By the proposed amendment, this character must necessarily become a sort of make-weight, and stepping-stone for the Presidency.—As in recruiting for an army, a man, active, and of a particular cast of character, but not very proper for a commander in chief, is employed to obtain recruits, and upon condition that he obtains a given number, is to be rewarded with a sergeant's warrant; so in this case, the man who can procure a given number of votes for President, will be encouraged to hope for the Vice-Presidency; and where will such characters be sought after? In Delaware or Rhode-Island? No sir, but in the great states; there the recruiting talents will be put in operation, because the number of recruits, or votes, will be sufficient to test his active and recruiting merits. And thus the office of Vice-President will be sent to market, with hardly a possible chance to meet an honest purchaser.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.

CONTINUATION OF THE LIFE OF PASCAL.

[We resume the very interesting biography of Pascal, and call the attention of every curious reader to the history of the origin and character of the celebrated Provincial Letters. We understand that this admirable work, like many other transcendent productions of the old school, in France, is very scarce in America. This is to be lamented, both as it respects good taste and pure morals. While we are overloaded, and oppressed, and smothered with an enormous load of the infamous productions of the French revolution; while our heads are insulted, and our ears deafened, with the vile doctrines, and Vandal jargon of the jacobins and atheists of an accursed republic, we lack much of the wisdom and wit of the fairest epochs in Gallic history. The style and sentiment of Pascal are as apples of gold set in pictures of silver. The idiom of the traitors and mountebanks of 1792 is corrupt, like their principles, and base as their origin.]

The school, in which he had received his instructions, on the contested topics, naturally connected him with the monastery of Port-Royal, the focus of Jansenism, and of opposition to the Jesuits. It was in defence of the Port Royal doctors, and their opinions that he wrote the Provincial Letters, which have sustained to this day their rank as the most elegant and accomplished models of fine writing, in the French language. They are eighteen in number, and were successively published, from the 23d of January 1654, to the 24th of March 1657. The occasion upon which they were written was this.

Dr. Arnauld, in one of his controversial writings, on the subject of Jansenism, had advanced two propositions, which the Jesuits had denounced, in Sorbonne, as incompatible with the orthodox faith, and as implicitly calling in question the infallibility of the Pope. The assembly consisted of about two hundred doctors, divided almost equally between the two parties, but where the Jesuits had a small majority. Arnauld's two propositions, therefore, were censured, and he was formally expelled from the faculty. This censure of the Sorbonne, and their proceedings upon which it was founded, were, however, so entirely dictated and guided by the spirit of party, that the common forms of proceeding were not even observed, and Arnauld found himself reduced to the necessity of entering a protest against the whole process. A few days before the sentence was passed, Pascal, at the request of Arnauld, wrote, in the form of a letter to a friend in the country, a statement of the case, shewing that the questions upon which the controversy turned were trivial in their nature; that Arnauld's opinion was supported by that of the most eminent fathers of the church. That his adversaries differed much more widely from one another, upon the very points in dispute, than from him, and that their prosecution of his opinions was influenced more by personal enmity and rancour, than by sincere objections against his doctrines. This letter was published a few days before the condemnation of Arnauld's propositions, and, perhaps, rather provoked than averted it. The style of the letter, however, as well as the subject and the time of its publication, secured to it a rapid and extensive circulation. Encouraged by this success, and exasperated by the sentence against his friend, Pascal followed up the first publication by three other letters, successively published in the course of a month. They exposed to public contempt the proceedings of the Jesuits, in the condemnation of Arnauld, and they were written with so much correctness and elegance of language, with such clearness and perspicuity, with such force of reasoning, with such gentleness of manner, and such pungency of satire in substance, that they were universally read, and admired by all but those against whom they were pointed. Their party, however, continued to be the most powerful, and Pascal, after having concluded, in these first four letters, the defence of his friend Arnauld, determined to carry the war into the territories of the enemy, and put the Jesuits themselves upon the defensive. At the close of the fourth letter, he alluded slightly to the looseness of their system of morality, and promised to give some account of it from their own writers. This he accordingly did in six letters, published in about as many months; for his extraordinary success had stimulated instead of relaxing his labours, and he took much more time, and pains in the composition of these, than he had of the first letters. The last eight were addressed to the Jesuits themselves, and principally consist of replies to the answers published by them, or in their behalf. The whole eighteen were soon collected and published under the fictitious name of Louis de Montalte, and with the title of Provincial Letters, by which they have ever since been known. They were so called from their purporting to have been addressed to a provincial friend, or gentleman in the country.

These letters are considered, by all the most illustrious names in the French literature, as having formed a memorable era in the history of the language. It may, perhaps, be said that they formed one in the history of mankind. Bossuet upon being asked what work he should prefer to have written, rather than any other in the language, answered, the Provincial Letters. Boileau, the most discerning critic that France ever produced, and whose admiration of the ancient classics is well known, always acknowledged, that this work was without a model or a rival, in the treasures of antiquity. Voltaire, in his Age of Louis XIV, says, that, from the publication of these letters, must be dated the period when the French language became fixed. In the course of an hundred and fifty years not a word in them has become obsolete, and they are still considered as uniting every species of eloquence, with all the sober usefulness of a moral treatise, and all the lively graces of a comedy. The only performances in English literature, which can bear any comparison with them are the Letters of Junius. A parallel between these two master-pieces might be drawn, at once instructive and amusing, but would not here be in its place. The result would, in almost every respect, be to the honour of Pascal.

The influence of this extraordinary book upon the history of the world, is by its effect in giving the stroke of death to one of the most formidable institutions that ever was formed among men: the society of the Jesuits. This effect was not, indeed, immediate. The thunders of the church were in their hands; the despotic sceptre of Louis the 14th was under their controul. The pope, the French council of state, parliaments, and bishops, fulminated anathemas, sentences, and decrees against the Provincial Letters, as a defamatory libel. But the Jesuits never could answer its accusations. From that period, their systems of morals have been the scorn and fable of mankind, and when, at length, after the lapse of more than a century, they were abandoned by the arm of power, they fell, unpitied, the victims of that odium, which, perhaps, they no longer deserved.

The author of the Provincial Letters was destined to exhibit a proof of the weakness, as well as of the strength of the human mind. If had been instructed in his infancy, to adopt in its utmost latitude, the axiom of the church, in which he was educated, to consider every article of faith as above the jurisdiction of human reason, and as commanding the most implicit submission. His belief in miracles, therefore, was not confined to those authenticated in the Scriptures—he gave his unqualified assent to all those, which the catholic doctrines prescribe to their sectaries, and had no doubt of his having witnessed more than one himself. With the purest system of morals, recognised by that church, he had adopted many of its most unreasonable austerities. He believed the duties of religion to be so irreconcilable with the pleasures, and even with the business and duties of social life, that he abstained from a matrimonial connection, and from the pursuit of an official station, which he had contemplated, under the conscientious impression, that the concerns of this world must all be sacrificed to the prospects of the next. Actuated by these principles, so pernicious by their effects, and so dangerous by their resemblance to the sublimest virtue, he prevailed upon his youngest sister to renounce the world, and to enter into the religious sisterhood at Port-Royal. He retired to one of the solitary cells, belonging to that monastery, himself. He assumed, as the foundation of his piety, the imaginary duty of renouncing every pleasure, of denying himself every superfluity; and severely condemned himself for the innocent relaxations and amusements in which he had before indulged for the restoration of his health. Exhausted by incessant application, emaciated by long continued abstinence, and sublimated to the ecstasies of enthusiasm, by solitude, and the fire of imagination, strained beyond the tone of mortal endurance, he became subject to a degree of nervous irritation, which produced a partial alienation of mind. In October 1654, as he was riding in a carriage, with four horses, the two foremost took a fright, and leaped off from a bridge, which was not guarded by a railing, into the river. The tackling fortunately broke, and left the carriage on the bridge. But, in the feeble and languishing condition of his health, he was so much affected by the extreme danger he was in, that he was with difficulty recovered from a long fainting fit. The impression of this accident upon his nervous system was so violent, that he was ever after in continual alarm from the apprehension of a precipice, which he fancied at his side. This was likewise probably the occasion of a vision, which he had about a month afterwards. Of this he kept an obscure and indistinct account, written on parchment, which, after his death, was found sewed within the lining of his coat. With a number of broken sentences, detached words, and remarkable characters, it contained a more intelligible memorandum, to this effect, 'Year of our Lord 1654, Monday 23. November—St. Clement's day—from about half past ten at night, until about half an hour after midnight. God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob; and not of philosophers and men of learning.' This singular minute is sufficiently clear to indicate the state of his mind, and the subject in which it was absorbed. To humble the pride of the human intellect, let it be remembered, that its date is fifteen months earlier than the first of the Provincial Letters—That, when those beautiful models of controversial eloquence were composed, their author was in the same mental habits, which had produced this creature 'of imagination all compact;' and that those habits continued strengthening and increasing upon him until his death.

In the angry controversies between the Port-Royalists and the Jesuits, the former had an unquestionable superiority of talents, and the advantage of a better cause; but their antagonists had a weight of credit and influence, more than sufficient to counterbalance them, and the Jansenists often found themselves under the necessity of appealing to the test of miracles for support. On the twenty-fourth of March 1656, a niece of Pascal, a young girl, then residing at Port-Royal for education, and afflicted with a fistula lacrymalis, by touching a precious relic, which had just been obtained, a thorn from the crown worn by Jesus Christ at the crucifixion, was instantly and completely cured. No miracle at the grave of the Abbe Paris was more substantially authenticated. The physicians and surgeons, who had attended the girl, gave certificates of this extraordinary cure, and it was put beyond all question, by a regular ecclesiastical process, under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Paris. In all this there is nothing but what can easily be accounted for. But when we are told that Pascal was a witness of the fact; that he firmly believed it; that it was the occasion upon which he wrote most of his Thoughts upon Miracles, we should deem it as incredible as the tale itself, were there not numerous other examples of minds in the most elevated rank of human capacity, laid prostrate and impotent at the feet of superstition.

The Thoughts upon Miracles, were only the materials of a larger work he intended to compose, the object of which was to vindicate the christian religion against the objections of atheism and infidelity; a work which, had it been accomplished, would have borne the marks of that profound and sublime genius, which conceived and dictated the Provincial Letters, but which probably would have been deeply tinged with the infirmities, which made him give credit to the miracle of the holy thorn.

THE LAY PREACHER.

'Neither give place to the Devil.'

In a didactic exhortation to the Ephesians, the most eloquent orator, and the greatest moralist, among the apostles, introduces this judicious caution against the danger of giving a reception to one of the most plausible, insidious, and yet profligate characters, of which history makes any mention.

A dignified author, though not a bishop, has somewhere asserted, that the devil goes about in more pleasing shapes, than that of a roaring lion. It is, at those seasons, my readers, when this personage is disguised, or attired in agreeable array, that we should guard against his wiles. If he never assailed us, except when clad in that tremendous coat of mail, given him by the calvinistic divines, neither St. Paul, nor a more modern moralist would caution you against giving him place. If none but John Bunyan's devil appeared to us, I fancy, that to saucer eyes, a cloven foot, and a dragon's tail, not even a hardened sinner would open his gate. But, when satan chooses to walk to and fro, in masquerade, through the world, his deformities, all hidden, either by a broad mantle, or a flowing robe, then he allures the eye, then he fires the fancy, then he taints the heart.

Now, as we are not ignorant of his devices, and as Moses, an old authentic historian, has apprized us of his subtlety, it may be useful to those, who rashly judge of characters from appearance, to describe some of the most common shapes, which the tempter assumes. Hence, without a very laborious process in reasoning, it may soon be discovered that many of the most common and favourite objects of pursuit are the devil.

A bag of money, for instance, if we seek it in company with integrity and industry, is a harmless and useful acquisition. But when avarice advises to dig, 'knavery to undermine, and ambition to soar for it, the possessor will find a cloven foot in the sack's mouth, instead of the cup of Benjamin.

A well known poet once exclaimed, 'O grant me honest fame, or grant me none.' For this kind of reputation all should be anxious. Without a good name, man would be poor indeed. But, when greedy of applause, we hunt after it in pathless ways, at the expense of morals and health. When a drunkard thinks to gain it from an ocean of liquor, or a sensualist by keeping seven hundred concubines, when a fop imagines it attached to tawdry clothes, when a fanatic prays to acquire it from the destruction of the church, or a malecontent from the subversion of the state, in all these cases, men are actually striving to give place to the devil.

When a factious partizan wishes that liberty should be metamorphosed to licentiousness; when he surveys the administration, or reads the speeches, of WASHINGTON, and, then, has the effrontery to pronounce him a Catiline, or a Cæsar. When he defames ADAMS, as a tyrant; JAY, as a parasite; PICKERING, as a defaulter; and HAMILTON, as a stock-jobber, he is blind to the noon-tide ray, the moon beams have glowed intensely on his crazy head, he is mad, and hath a devil.

There has lately arisen, in America, a new sect in philosophy, stiled speculators, not very intense thinkers, but yet, contradictory as it may seem, absorbed in speculation. Like LOCKE, and other profound metaphysicians, they are more conversant with ideas, than with reality. Like an insane mendicant, who sometimes solicits charity at my door, they are perpetually vaunting of vast possessions in land, and muttering about titles, grants, and charters. I have been inclined to think they are allied to the noble family of gypsies and jugglers, from the variety and adroitness of their tricks, by slight of hand. I have turned over at least ten different dictionaries, to find a definition of the word speculation, and after fruitless attempts, I am obliged to frame one myself, and conclude that it means, the sale of a cloud, for a valuable consideration. Therefore, as a grave and scriptural author declares Satan to be 'the prince of the power of the air,' we may regularly infer that all transactions of this nature are within his jurisdiction, and that speculators give place to the devil.

If a youth, of ardent temperament, and acute sensibility, spy a Syren, whose eyes flash wantonness, and whose hands beckon with a turn in hither, I beseech thee; let him beware of her enchantments, though the roses seem to glow on her cheek, and though her tongue drops the manna of persuasion. Though her couch may be covered with tapestry and fine linen of Egypt, though she is impudent of face, and subtil of heart, and, though perfumed with myrrh and cinnamon, let him not give scope to lawless desire; neither give place to this devil.

The fair sex display, in general, such admirable taste and judgment in the choice of their favourites, it is hardly credible that a being, so ungracious and sooty, as Satan, could find any quarter from their delicacy. But I am assured by one, who has 'looked on the world for four times seven years,' and who is well versed in the ways and wiles of women, that when they scold for hours a worthy husband, or display unreasonable caprice and coquetry to a deserving lover, they not only give place to the devil, but frequently prevent his visit, and act the part of the fiend themselves.

MISCELLANY.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

If the following remarks be not too incorrect for the Press, by inserting them in the Port Folio, you will add to the favours conferred on an occasional correspondent.

ON VANITY.

Among the many writers on epidemic disease, I do not find one who has condescended to treat of Vanity; it is at least as prevalent as yellow fever in Philadelphia.

Vanity attacks, chiefly, persons in the prime of life, but age does not exempt us from it. I have known many elderly females, (especially the unmarried), afflicted with this malady.

Of young persons, those who are rich, handsome, or superficially learned, are generally vain. I would fain believe it confined to our own sex, but fear I am warranted, by my observations, in not excluding the fair sex from participating in our calamity.

Its symptoms I need not be particular in describing. They appear in a marked contempt for the learning, talents, and accomplishments of others, and a decided preference for our own. Egotism is vanity without fear of detection, and is really less censurable than when it is concealed. A desire to extort praise, is a very common symptom of vanity, discovered by disclaiming it, in order that it may be repeated. The symptoms of this malady are so numerous, that, to include an account of them, would far exceed the limits of an essay.

An important inquiry presents itself here. Is vanity innate in the human breast, or does it proceed from a habit of associating, with all our actions, an idea that they are praise-worthy? I am rather inclined to adopt the latter opinion, for several reasons: in particular, if it were present in the breast of every man, we should probably find its objects more uniform; something generous, noble, or useful, would be its objects, but the very reverse of this is the case. Men are vain of the most ungenerous, ignoble, useless actions, as seduction, gaming, dress, &c. The objects of vanity are as different as the characters of men. Tom Tindler is vain of his courage and honour, and a man who questions either, must blow his brains out. His cousin Simper is vain of his person—he has a good leg, fine teeth, whiskers à la mode, and is five feet nine. With these qualifications, he conceives himself the best looking man in every company; and I frequently hear him excuse his foppery by Chesterfield's trite remark, that 'a good appearance is a letter of recommendation.' Personal vanity is very common. Many fashions owe their origin to it—witness bare elbows in bleak December! My old tutor, Dr. Omicron, is excessively vain of his ancient literature; he often tells me I shall find every thing worthy a wise man's attention in the works of Plato, Aristotle, and a number of worthy old writers, with whom I have not the vanity to suppose myself acquainted.

Now, from the above cases of the prevailing disease, and many others, I infer, that its proximate cause, as I before stated, is an improper association of praise with our own actions. That which I know best, or do best, I wish to have every one think best to be done or known. We see this evinced very strongly in sportsmen. Ned Wilding would persuade me that every virtue is centered in leaping a five barred gate, and being in at the death of a fox. There can be no doubt that, in all the above cases, had this passion, (for habit almost fixes it into a passion), been directed to noble objects, the above characters had been much more respectable.

From all that has been said above, the indications of cure readily present themselves. 1st, We should subdue that inordinate fondness for actions not in themselves laudable; and, secondly, direct our attention, from excelling in trivial accomplishments, to improving the good qualities of the head and heart.

Should any of your readers find advantage from my advice, I fear it will add much to the vanity of your humble servant,

GALENICUS.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Madrid, April 22, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I have received all the letters you mention, except the one, which hath been the occasion of so much pain to you, and which hath excited a sensation in my breast, by no means agreeable, if one letter from a friend to me, is interrupted in France, many more may be, my conduct towards individuals of the nation, and my gratitude to the nation, shown in every instance, of my private and public life, since I have known it, made me hope, that, at this period, any correspondence carried on by me, or with me would escape suspicion. I know not what reasons the Em—r may have for keeping the letter I wrote you. In private life, these things are not permitted; but, I have too much respect for him, not to think, that he hath very good reasons to justify this step to himself, and if that is the case, any complaint from me, is unnecessary. Set your heart at rest, I have destroyed your letter of the 31st of March, which would have given me much real concern, had it not been accompanied by that of the 4th of April. It is cruel to believe an innocent man guilty, even without disclosing to another, our belief of his criminality, we ought therefore to be extremely cautious in the indulgence.

Suspensions, without we have the strongest evidence on which to ground our belief of our venerable friend at Passy, writes that both you and Sir G. G. have been somewhat to blame; I am glad that you both are like to bury the hatchet.

* * * * *

I think that your Republic ought to grow bolder in proportion, as the English naval force diminishes in the seas of Europe. It appears, by the preparations at Cadiz, that both courts mean to push the war in the West Indies. The papers say elsewhere, of course the English must send an equal force to oppose them, and themselves weak at home, why may not the crisis arrive that your country, and the neutral powers, may have their town to bully? The fleet from Cadiz, will sail in a few days, if it hath not already sailed. Several vessels have arrived in the ports of Spain from America, and by all accounts, the fleet in which Sir H. Clinton embarked, was wholly dispersed, as it was not arrived in any port of America the 17th of February. I have a letter dated the 10th of March, from Newberry. The Congress consist of the same members, as when I left it, except Mr. Thomas Johnson, who replaces me, and another who replaces Mr. Dana. When you have opportunities of writing to America, write to the above mentioned countryman of mine, who is, perhaps, one of the ablest members now in Congress, and my particular friend. Write also to Gouverneur Morris, and inform both, that you do it at my desire. I have some reason to think that Mr. Laurens, has a mission to Holland. If he should arrive, your inclination will dispose you, to treat him with constant and assiduous respect. I say no more, for I have forgot the name of party, since I left America, from whence it was my constant aim to banish it; you will see from the manner in which I write to you, that your intreaties to continue my friendship unnecessary. The virtues of the heart, ought always to excuse the errors of the head, even if they were great, I do not mean to apply this to the present case, for I know not the circumstances sufficiently to judge. I hope and believe the Duc. De V— is too good a man, not to be of the same opinion. I am much obliged to you, for the mention you make of me to the P—, you will continue to do it, with a certainty that the best wishes for his reputation and success, proceed from a sincere heart. Calm, my good friend, the agitations of your mind, which much distress me. Be cautious of my letters, though they contain nothing but the dress of my thoughts, of which I should be much ashamed. Mr. T. desires his respects—I only read such parts of your letters to him, as speak of himself, repeating the substance of the news, they may contain. Adieu.

Yours, &c. &c.

P. S. My best compliments to Messrs. N—, they have received a letter from me, ere this.

Madrid, April 10, 1780.

My Dear Friend,

You will before this reaches you, do me justice, and own me a tolerably punctual correspondent, since I have written to you very regularly, since I have been, until the present, and this defalcation proceeds from my absence, having been obliged to meet Mr. Jay, at Aranjuez, when the post arrived, which brought your letter of the 15th ult. I am much obliged to you, for your communications, that with respect to Prussia particularly. I have had frequent opportunities of talking with the Russian Minister here, and as he hath been inquisitive, I have taken the same liberty, the result confirms your intelligence. I have not had the least correspondence with the house you mention since I left Europe, but knowing no one else to whom to address myself at Amsterdam, and wishing to write you as soon as possible, I was obliged to make use of their mediation. Your desire therefore, will be punctually complied with; you see I have the same faith in you, that others had in your predecessor in the wilderness, he was a preacher of glad tidings, in which I hope you will, without being a prophet, have occasion to follow his example. Mr. Jay is well received here, as I have been by all ranks of people. The expedition hath or will sail soon from Cadiz. Mr. Jay reflects with pleasure, that his name is on the list of those who signed your commission, he only regrets that it was not to another since, of a more ample nature. I have never received your letter, sent to Doctor Franklin. How long will the patience of your countrymen, bear the angonies you speak of. I beg you to be very particular on this subject. Can you not contrive to see the Spanish Em—. I have written to Mess. De Veufrille, you must be both the interpreter of my letter, and of my heart to them, which is never more sincere, than when I assure you, how much I am your obliged and humble servant.

W. C.

Brussels, April 13, 1780.

Sir,

There has appeared in the Courier du Bas-Rhine, No. 27, April 1, 1780, a piece said to be an extract from an authentic letter, written from Philadelphia, which begins thus, 'Monsieur, vous voulez que je vous rende compte du rai etat de nos affaires.'

I am informed that this piece was furnished by you, to the Editor of the Bas Rhine Gazette, but as I know there are times in which misinformation is too current, especially in what concerns America, I cannot give implicit faith to such information, without it is confirmed to me by yourself. I therefore presume you will not think it improper in me, to request of you, that you will candidly tell me, whether you did, or did not furnish the Editor of the Bas Rhine, with the above mentioned piece.

I have the honour to be, with due respect, Sir, your most obedient servant.
W. LEE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

John Bioren and T. L. Plowman have issued proposals for publishing, by SUBSCRIPTION, a mode of printing which is almost a part of the law of the land in America, the History of the Wars which arose out of the French Revolution; to which is prefixed a review of the causes of that event, by Alexander Stephens, Esq. of the honourable society of the Middle Temple. This work, of which we have had only a transient glimpse, is written in a style highly polished, and not unlike the manner of GIBSON. Of the author's principles we have but an imperfect knowledge; but it should seem from some passages in his history, that he is an apologist for some of the excesses of the republicans. If, however, we give full credit to his motto, he must be acquitted of any sinister intentions in framing his narrative. For he tells us, in a quotation from the introduction of Sallust to his history of the plot of Catiline, 'Statui res gestas populi Romani strictim, uti quæque memoria digna videbantur, præscribere: eo magis, quod mihi a spe, metu, partibus reipublicæ animus liber erat.' If this motto be appropriate, the historian may be honest even in the excess of zeal, and he would not afford us the first example of a man biassed toward a rotten cause, and partial even to prejudice, without the least consciousness of the delusion.

If this performance be a legitimate history, and candidly unfold nothing but the truth, respecting the French jacobins, it deserves regard from a circumstance, not often slighted in the calculations of American economy. The London edition is sold for twenty-five dollars, and this is offered for four.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The business of instructing youth, though one of the most important, is at the same time one of the most painful and thankless employments in America, especially since parents have begun to set so small a value on Learning, and children claim all the rights of sovereign people. Strictly speaking, there is not a boy in the United States. Infants, and children, and idiots, every possible form of ignorance, every possible form of weakness, every possible form of audacity, are perfectly free, sovereign, and independent under the indulgent sway of a sort of Indian Democracy.

We are impatient, says a venerable friend, to hear of the event of the projected invasion of Great Britain by the French, and hope it will be the ruin of Buonaparte, either by his being knocked on the head in the voyage, or by the French restoring their king in his absence. Our Democratic news writers are making themselves very merry in the prospect of the success of the French, in this expedition, but we ardently hope, that Providence will not abandon Great Britain. Men do not consider, that if England were conquered, America would immediately become a Province of the great nation; this is perhaps, what the Jacobins wish, in hopes that Mr. Jefferson may be appointed Viceroy, but this event may be doubted, as Buonaparte has a brother in this country, for whom he may design that America should be an appanage or provision; and as the First Consul is a maker of Kings, he may give Jerome that title.

Miss Seward's Memoirs of the life and writings of Dr. Darwin have appeared.

A new periodical paper, under the title of 'The Man in the Moon,' has lately commenced in London.

A fellow of a college, whose name was Backhouse, pronounced Bacchus, once discovered a fellow collegian sprawling at full length on the floor, and full of the juice of the grape. Backhouse attempted to lift up the prostrate toper, who, recovering his recollection, exclaimed, from Horace—

Quo me, Bacche, rapis, tui Plenum?

Looking over some old papers, we found the following exordium to a New Year's Ode, published, some time since, at some village in Vermont, and written by S. Spunkey, Esq. a relation of the Butler family. The lover of Hudibras will be delighted with the double rhymes for which our American wag is so happily distinguished.

The Federal Bard, who erst bestow'd
On Walpole press a New-Year's Ode,
Which critics, with sagacious noddle,
Affirm was built on Homer's model;
And who, by dint of love-lorn ditty,
Can melt a marble heart to pity,
Dissolve in sympathy a rock,
Inspire with love a barber's block—
By magic harmony, with ease,
Excite a grove of hemlock trees;
Like Orpheus, stray o'er hill and hollow,
And bid the rapt Aschutney follow—
Can call to earth the list'ning moon,
While forests dance a rigadon,
And, scarce outdone by Macbeth's witches,
Attune the spheres to highest pitches,
Now, glowing with poetic fire,
Awakes to ecstasy the lyre!
Ye Gods and Goddesses, who traffic
In cantos, odes, and lays seraphic,
Apollo and Aonian ladies,
Whose lives are made of merry May days,
Who sometimes warble lays diviner,
If possible, than even mine are;
Bring violins and flutes sonorous,
To aid the song, and swell the chorus!
Borne on poetic wings, we rise,
Like blazing rockets, to the skies,
Astride a sun-beam, soar awhile,
Above old Homer many a mile,
While mortals gaze, and, turning pale,
Mistake us for a comet's tail,
Which indicates, by corruscations,
The Devil's to pay among the nations!

Dr. Brewster was put out of commons for missing chapel, on which occasion he made the following epigram:

To fast and pray we are by heaven taught,
O could I practice either as I ought!
In both, alas! I err; my frailty's such
I pray too little, and I fast too much.

The ingenuity of this epigram procured his immediate restoration.

A new poem, ironical, Hudibrastical, and satirical, has recently appeared in London, entitled, 'Terrible Tractoration, a poetical petition against galvanising trumpery, and the Perkinistic institution.' It is thus commended by the British Critic.

It has a considerable share of Hudibrastic drollery. The author is particularly happy, with a few exceptions, in his ludicrous compounded rhymes, and has many other qualities to insure no trifling success in doggrel verse. For instance:

For I could quote, with flippant ease,
Grave Galen and Hippocrates,
Brown, Cullen, Sydenham, and such men,
Beside a shoal of learned Dutchmen, p. 2.

For bottled urine has, no doubt,
In public mail been frank'd about,
(A thing there must be monstrous trouble in)
To London, as it were, from Dublin.
That such a man as Doctor Mayersbach,
(Such things took place not many years back)
May view the uric oxyd's basis,
And tell exactly what the case is.

This truly ingenious and original piece of levity, at the expense of the medical opponents of the celebrated Dr. Perkins, has already reached a second edition. The author's ambition, as he declares in his preface, has been to produce an original performance, and avoid all servile trick and 'imitative knack' of ordinary dealers in rhyme.

When Barry and Garrick were rival players of Lear, the town was amused by the following neat epigram:

The town has found out different ways
To praise its different Lears;
To Barry it gives loud huzzas,
To Garrick only tears.

A king? ay every inch a king—
Such Barry doth appear;
But Garrick's quite another thing,
He's every inch King Lear.

Epigram on Sir Thomas More, attributed to Lord Bacon.

When More some time had Chancellor been,
No more suits did remain;
The same will never more be seen,
Till More Be there again.

A most exquisite reasoner, and one of the purest of the English writers, arguing strenuously against that democratic device, absurdly called a reform in the English Parliament, says very truly—an independent House of Commons is no part of the English Constitution, the excellence of which consists of being composed of three powers, mutually dependent on each other. Of these if any one would become independent of the other two, it must engross the whole power to itself, and the form of the government would be immediately charged. This an independent House of Commons actually performed in the last century, murdered the king, annihilated the peers, and established the 'worst kind of democracy, that ever existed; and the same confusion, would infallibly be repeated, should we ever be so unfortunate as to see another.

* The usurpation of Oliver Cromwell forms a singular era, in the history of human folly, and wickedness. By an inhabitant of another planet, it would be scarcely credited, that a magnanimous nation, full of learning, loyalty and piety, should be dominated over by a gang of rebels, and hypocritical fanatics, more loathsome for their stupidity, canting, and vice, than any banditti of impostors, of which history makes any mention. Note by the Editor.

The eminence of Cowper, as a poet, is acknowledged by a very great number of persons; and however, in numerous instances, he may sink the dignity of language in colloquial familiarity, his general merit is incontestible. If he sometimes creeps with the ant, he at others soars with the eagle, and lights his poetic reed at the fountain of day. It has been objected that his descriptions are local, and that he has neglected general beauty for individual delineation, but are the features he has described unworthy of the choice?

In Ireland, among all who are sincerely loyal, there reigns a zeal of loyalty and patriotism, that has scarce been equalled in any other time or country. The yeomanry compose a force, of which the loyalty, gallantry, and discipline, are not to be exceeded. They are so much the more ardent in their loyalty, because they have been harassed by the crimes of rebellion, and have had to oppose it, to bloodshed. Preparations are at present made around the coasts, and throughout the interior country of Ireland, to resist any invading enterprise of the French, with an activity and an alacrity, from which it is reasonable to expect, the completest security. Lord Cathcart has succeeded General Fox, in the chief command of the forces. The administration of the Earl of Hardwick, as Lord Lieutenant, and of Mr. Wickham, as his secretary, continue to be highly acceptable to the inhabitants of Ireland.

Counterfeit eagles are said to be in circulation, of the impression of 1801. The face of Liberty is very poorly executed, and by a slight inspection, the false ones may be easily detected. It is a matter notorious through our country, that the Federal Eagle has been very much debased for two or three of the last years, by the substitution of a meaner metal. 'The fine gold has really become dim.' [Farmer's Museum.]

A PARODY OF AN ODE BY ROBERT BURNS, THE SCOTS POET.

This Ode has been admirably set to Music by Mr. DIBDEN.—It is we understand, the first number of a set of Martial Songs, which are to be occasionally published.

Britons! who, in rap'rous strains
Of Agincourt's and Cressy's plains,
Oft have sung—to foreign chains,
You who ne'er have bent the knee,—
Now's the day, and now's the hour;
See the front of battle lour,
See approach fell Gallia's pow'r—
Rapture, chains, and slavery!

Who would be a traitor—knave,
Who would fill a coward's grave,
Who so base as be a slave?
Traitor—coward—turn, and flee:—
Whom can empty threats appal?
Fly to Glory's clarion call!
Freemen stand, or Freemen fall!
Sons of Britain—on wi' me.

Parents, wives, and children dear,
Your's are gen'rous toils to cheer;
Arm'd for you, we know not fear—
For you, our laws, and liberty:
Tho' Austria shrink—tho' Prussia fail,
Tho' tenfold perils aye assail,
Still shall British arms prevail,
Alone shall Britain conquer be.

By Helvetia's cries and moans,
By England's wrongs, by Europe's groans
Open, Earth!—receive our bones—
Drink our blood—or keep us free:
Lay each rash invader low—
Ruffians fall in ev'ry foe—
Freedom strikes in ev'ry blow!
Freedom—who'll not bleed for thee?

On ravag'd Egypt's blood-stain'd sand,
Shrunk not France's scatter'd band,
Crush'd by Britain's vengeful hand?
What then here shall be their fate?—
Think, brave youths, on Nelson's fame,
On Abercromby's trophied name,
And let each blow in blood proclaim,
Equal valour, deadlier hate!

Soldiers!—our's a glorious part:
God of battles! steel each heart,
Valour, strength, and fire impart!
Now to our high destiny,
'Fall or conquer.'—Blush, bright Sun,
Should thou see us backward run;—
'Till the bloody battle's done,
On!—to death or victory!!!

It is common for ladies to dress the hair with a twist. The poor head inside is sometimes suspected of the like ornament. [ib.]

Flat is a very significant word to attach to the new boats intended to invade this country. The French, who have always been famous for dancing, are anxious to shew us the effects of their footing here, when we shall certainly make them dance to some tune. [ib.]

Mr. Sheridan dined a few days ago at Richmond Park, the invasion was so much the subject of conversation, that the Minister by way of experiment, got a little more than half-seas over. [ib.]

On the first of May, 1782, when debates ran high against the influence of the Crown, and the patriots insisted much on the majesty of the people, George Selwyn, happening, with some friends, to meet a party of chimney sweeper's boys, decorated with gilt paper and other ludicrous ornaments, exclaimed, 'I have often heard of the majesty of the people, but never before had the pleasure of seeing any of the young princes.' [ib.]

Last week a bill of Madame Bonaparte's, for £300. drawn by a Nursery-man, at Kensington, for plants and shrubs, was returned with this notice, 'the Treasurer has no instructions.' [ib.]

On the 23d of August, Mr. Harding, an eminent printer and bookseller of Liverpool, possessed of 11,000l. in bank property, cut his throat under hypochondriac terrors, as was asserted, of the threatened invasion of England.

The following from a British Magazine of November, the latest received in this country, exhibits a glorious picture of the spirit, and generosity of a nation, in which timidity and ingratitude are not considered, as virtues.

Our country may now be considered, as fully engaged in a contest, from which there is no retreat—from which there is no disposition to retreat. So much has martial ardour outrun precedent, that arms are not to be found for the men who stand prepared to wield them.

While our soldiers and sailors are fighting for the safety and existence of England, as an independent nation, their countrymen who are less exposed to the immediate dangers of war, feel a lively interest in their welfare. Such a fund as that at Loyd's Coffee-house, no other country can boast. The distresses of the widows and orphans of those who fall in battle, has long been deplored, and, we trust, will hereafter be mitigated as far as pecuniary assistance can effect that purpose. Life cannot be recalled by gold; but gold will supply a maintenance prematurely cut off. The evils of war cannot be annihilated, but all possible alleviation is now attempted by means of those liberal and honourable contributions. 'Tis all a father, all a friend can give.'

In his essay on Greatness, Cowley quaintly says, 'I confess I love littleness almost in all things. A little convenient estate, a little company, and a very little feast; and if I were to fall in love again, which is a great passion, and, therefore, 'I hope I have done with it, it would be, I think with prettiness, rather than with majestic beauty.

Mr. Jenyns, in the year 1782, advanced the following sentiments, which experience, truth, and prophecy, may claim as their own.

France thought no expense too great, which would involve us in a contest with America, and procure our defeat. This, with the unremitted assistance of English patriotism, she at length accomplished; but what was the consequence? why the very reverse of what our enemies hoped for, and we apprehended. Our commerce is not less, our wealth is greater, and our credit better than they were before the commencement of the war. We are enriched both by the contest, and by the loss of that for which we contended; by the first, because by that our debt is augmented, which can be proved to be our riches; and by the latter, as by that no inconsiderable sums are retained and circulated at home, which would otherwise have been annually expended to defray the useless expenses of American jobs. On the contrary, France is so exhausted that she has been obliged to abandon the pursuits of conquest and dominion, and suffer them to be wrested even out of her jaws, without a struggle. Besides which, her people, by their transatlantic connections, have caught such an idea of liberty, as will not easily be eradicated, without the loss of more blood than the present state of her constitution will bear.

The following wish, by Dr. Aikin, is well expressed in one of the most popular measures of the English ballad.

On the slope of a hillock, be plac'd my retreat,
With a wood at its back, and a stream at its feet;
In front be a meadow, rich, verdant, and gay,
Where my horse and a cow may find pasture and hay.

A beautiful garden I must not be without,
With walls and high hedges, well fence'd all about,
All blushing with fruit, and all fragrant with flowers,
With dry gravel walks, and with sweet shady bowers.

For my house, if 'tis lightsome, and roomy and warm,
Fit to take in a friend, and to keep out a storm,
I care not a straw whether brick, stone, or plaster,
And if 'tis old fashion'd, why so is the master.

An old friend from the town shall sometimes take a walk
And spend a day with me in sociable talk,
We'll discuss knotty matters, compare what we've read,
And, warm'd with a bottle, move gaily to bed.

When evenings grow long, and we're gloomy at home,
To vary the scene 'mong my neighbours I roam,
See how the world passes, collect all the news,
And return with a load of new books and reviews.

In short, 'tis the sum of my wish and desire,
That cheerfulness ever my breast should inspire,
Let my purse become light, and my liquor run dry,
So my stock of good spirits hold out till I die.

LINES, WRITTEN NEAR THE SCHUYLKIL.

With what a feverish mind do I behold
These scenes, that witness'd oft as pure a love
As ever dwelt within a mortal breast;
When she, the dear companion of my walks,
At whose appearance nature seem'd to breathe
New fragrance round, and wear her sweetest smiles,

Would point each beauty to my raptur'd view!
Would bid me mark how white the hawthorn's
flowers;

What verdure deck'd the lawn beneath our feet;
How gay the poplars, and amidst their green,
How pensive did the cedar's hues appear:
With what a majesty the setting sun
Casts his mild radiance on the winding stream,
Whose scarcely ruffled breast inverted shew'd
The various trees that on its borders grew,
And each light cloud that high in ether sail'd.
How sweet the robin trill'd his amorous lay;
How soft the wood-dove cooed unto her mate.
And then, when she has caught my wandering eyes,

Turn'd from the charms, which nature spread around,

To gaze on those a thousand times more dear,
How has she hid her face upon my breast,
And said she ne'er should make me nature's lover!

Ah! who could see her, and not nature love?

Oh she could bend me to her every will,
My soul's emotions all were in her power:
And yet, so gently did she bear her sway,
She never form'd a wish that was not mine.

I have known many, whom the thoughtless world

Would call more fair, more beautiful than she;
But never have my eyes beheld the face
Which more express'd that evenness of soul,
That meek sweet temper, which is ever pleas'd
When it can give delight; that mind, inform'd
By reason's precepts, candid and sincere;
That breast, by every gentle passion sway'd,
The throne of virtue, innocence, and truth;
And all those mental charms, by which the sex
Can make this world a paradise to man.
I oft have look'd upon her angel eyes,
To see sweet fancy sporting in their beams,
Have look'd until unutterable love
Has swell'd the tear of transport in my own.
I could not help it—I ne'er think on her,
But what my eyes are truants to my will,
And play the infant—

Here we stray'd.

How strongly memory paints upon my heart
That dear, dear glance, which first betray'd her love!

How widely different was her love from mine!
For tho' with such a warm her bosom glow'd,
That she has often told me she could die,
If that would but insure my happiness;
Yet was it mild as is the solar ray,
In that soft season, when the plastic hand
Of nature moulds, for Amalthea's horn,
Her embrio fruits, and scatters wild her flowers.
Me ne was the ardour of the mid-day blaze,
When on the torrid regions Phæbus pours
His fervid beams, and nature burns around.

Here, I have pluck'd the wild flowers for her breast,

And thought the simple blossom of the thorn,
Plac'd there, more lovely than the garden rose,
And sweeter than the violet of the vale.
Yet—why I know not—I would sometimes feel
As if those flowers should not be suffered there;
They might from her lov'd bosom steal its snows,
Or rob her balmy breath of half its sweets;

And I have taken them, unknown to her,
And torn their leaves, and strew'd them in our walks.

And once—such fancies fill a lover's brain!
Alas! that e'er their warning should be true—
I thought I heard a dying flowret say,
'Beware rash youth! those gusts of passion rule;
Torn from her breast, my fate may yet be thine!'

A PARAPHRASE FROM PHAEDRUS.

A cobbler once, no able stitcher,
Observ'd, while other folks grew richer,
As none a second time would try him,
He scarcely earn'd a sous per diem:
Though great his ends, his means were small,
To pay his debts he gave his awl,
New trades his scheming noddle cast,
And thought each better than the last:
Resolv'd at length on his condition,
He mounts a wig, and turns physician.
Far from his native town he hies,
That none his phiz might recognize—
Though meanest of th' empiric tribe,
More ignorant than Doctor L—,
When blunders haply fail'd to kill,
Or nature cur'd, they prais'd his skill:
He thus made shift the hinds to pillage,
And rose the Galen of the village.
One morn, a trav'ler chanc'd to drop,
Before the door of Crispin's shop;
Out ran the young the sight to see,
Out ran the old, out ran M. D.
Who felt his pulse, then gravely said,
'Alas! my friends, the man is dead.'
The dead man then was heard to mumble,
'You're wrong! 'twas gin that made me tumble—
Why Crispin! damn it, don't you know me?
I'm Hodge, your next door neighbour—blow me!
Good folks, I need must grin; it monstrous odd is,

Where none would trust their soals, you trust your bodies.'

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

Your former compliance with my wishes induces me to repeat my request—the following lines are, therefore, submitted to you to be printed or burnt, as you shall think most proper.

Eheu fugaces—
Labuntur anni, nec putas moram
Rugis, et instanti senectæ
Affert indomitique morti.

HOR.

On swiftest pinions fly our years,
Or bright with joy, or dim with tears,
And bring declining age;
Naught can withstand time's sullen power,
Snatch from his grasp one fleeting hour,
Nor stay the spoilers' rage.

The charms that youthful beauty deck,
The sparkling eye, the roseate cheek,
And every matchless grace,
Must yield to waning age and care,
That silver o'er her auburn hair,
And furrow the fair face.

With furious zeal the warrior glows,
The wreaths of conquest o'er his foes
To twine around his brow;
But stronger death, with swifter dart,
Ere long shall rive his swelling heart,
And lay the victor low.

With purer ardour glows the bard
To gain the poet's high reward,

Immortal praise the meed;
Soon lies unstrung the sacred lyre,
Deserted by the soul of fire,
Low droops his lifeless head.

But though the fair, the brave, the wise,
Must soon in darkness close their eyes,
And soon resign their breath,
Yet shall not piety preserve
Her sons, who ne'er from virtue swerve,
And ward the shaft of death?

Ah, could celestial virtue save
Her favour'd children from the grave,
Then would not Harvard mourn,
Then would not orphan'd kindred weep,
Nor science hallow'd vigils keep
O'er TAPPAN'S timecess

ADDRESS TO W—, IN AUTUMN.

When fields were green, and forests gay,
And air, and earth, and ocean smil'd,
Cheer'd with the soft cerulean ray,
Content and ease my heart beguil'd;
I careless struck the trembling lyre,
And bade the rustic muse inspire.

When, lo! each sylvan grace had fled,
And all was silent, dark, and drear:
Fair nature's golden tresses shed,
And wrapt in gloom the waning year;
Touch'd by the rigid power of frost,
The season's purple hues were lost.

Yet memory o'er the ravag'd scene
Its glowing lineaments would cast;
Its vivid colouring tips the green,
As Boreas drives the hollow blast,
And where the frowning tempest raves,
Remembrance winds its reflux waves.

The rocks that crown the distant hill,
The path-way o'er the russet plain,
The waving oaks, the tinkling rill,
The robin's sweetly warbled strain—
The shepherd's cot, the village spire,
Are dress'd in fancy's warm attire.

Across the valley's verdant side,
Where flowrets breath'd their odours round,
The rustling leaves are scatter'd wide,
The meads by autumn's hand embrown'd,
And where the towering mountains lie,
A shadowy mist obscures the sky.

Say, shall the social compact fail,
When nature wears its sombre form?
Shall fleecy snows, and pattering hail,
And all that wings the luring storm,
With chilling coldness e'er depress
The roseate buds of happiness?

When rural beauties faintly gleam,
Hope bids her aerial train advance,
And o'er the bower, the brake, the stream,
She casts her ardent, eagle glance,
Affection blends a sparkling ray,
And all is tranquil, soft, and gay.

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1804.

ELOQUENCE OF THE AMERICAN SENATE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CONCLUSION OF MR. TRACY'S SPEECH,
On the amendment of the Constitution,
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Friday, December 2, 1803,

I have already remarked upon the alteration made by the Senate, in the resolution passed by the house of representatives, changing the number five to three. But one addition made this morning, deserves attention; I mean that which authorizes the Vice-President to administer the government, in case neither the first nor the second constitutional electors effect a choice of President.

This is a new principle, and its operation is more uncertain, than that of any other part of the proposed amendment. Viewing it in one point of light, it may be thought to confer a new power upon the Senate; that of giving a President to the union. And it is said, that this part will recompense the small states, who have the ascendancy in the Senate, for the injury inflicted by the other parts of the amendment. If it be true, that the last part restores all which the former parts have taken away from us, it is inconceivable, why any man can wish to pass a resolution, the parts of which thus mutually destroy each other. It is possible, that by the force of intrigue and faction, the electors may be induced so scatter their votes for both President and Vice-President, in such manner, as to present several candidates to the house for President, and two or more to the Senate for Vice-President. In which case the Senate might immediately choose or select a Vice-President. In this state of things, there is an opportunity afforded for an intrigue, of a very extensive and alarming nature. The Senate, I mean a majority of them, might wish that the man whom they had elected Vice-President should administer the government; and if the house could be prevented from agreeing, their wishes would be gratified. The facility of preventing over that of producing a choice is very obvious.

A bold address may be made to any member of the house, without wounding his pride, or offending his morality, to adhere to his candidate, and not change his vote so as to effect a choice. He can be told that there is no danger of leaving the United States without a President, as there is one already chosen to his hand, by the Senate; and this person may be more the object of his wishes, than any of the other candidates, his favourite excepted. In this process the Senate may give a President to the United States. But if the probability of such a process and such an event is increased by the amendment of this morning, it certainly cannot greatly recommend it. For myself, I wish for no alteration in the constitution, not even if its operation were directly in favour of the small states, more especially if such a favour is to be derived through a sort of double conspiracy of intrigue; in the first place to operate on the electors, and then on the house of representatives. It seems to me, that the small states had better be contented to enjoy the rights now secured to them by the constitution, which they can honestly do, rather than submit to a deprivation of their rights, for the sake of dishonestly obtaining a restoration of them. We may charitably and safely conclude that the majority do not intend, by this part of the amendment, to expose the country to such a scene of iniquity. And the uncertainty of its operations, alone, is, in my mind, a sufficient ground for rejection. However, the operation of this part of the amendment may appear in theory, as to other points, it seems to me, that in one point all must agree, and that is, when the house of representatives know that the United States will be left without an executive magistrate, in case they do not agree; this awful responsibility, will speak in a voice too loud for the hardihood of party entirely to disregard. And may I not suggest, without giving offence, that the operation of this very responsibility, has been proved, at least in some degree, in the proceedings of the last Presidential election?

If this last mentioned security be worth preserving, it follows of course, that the part of the amendment alluded to, ought not to pass.

There is another view of the constitution, which has a reference to the general subject before us: and that is, the caution exhibited with respect to the introduction of amendments. In an instrument so important, and containing many features new, if not to the world, at least to ourselves, although we might approve of its principles; yet experience might discover errors as to the mode devised for carrying those principles into effect. Hence, it was the part of wisdom and caution to provide for such alterations in practice, as would give the fairest operation to principles, without incurring the confusion and agitation incidental to a general convention. But lest the daring and restive spirit of innovation should injure or destroy, under the specious name of amendment, that same wisdom and caution have provided salutary checks.

Two thirds of both houses of congress shall deem it necessary to propose amendments; and three-fourths of the state legislatures shall ratify such amendments; before they acquire validity. I speak now, sir, of the mode which has always been, and probably will be put in practice to obtain amendments. The other constitutional mode is equally guarded as to numbers, but, as it has no relation to the subject now in debate, may be laid aside. Two-thirds of both houses, must, I think, on every fair principle of construction, mean two-thirds of all the members. The number of Senators is thirty-four; two-thirds being twenty-three. And as there is no representation from New-Jersey, the number of representatives is one hundred thirty-six; two-thirds being ninety-one.

My impressions are, sir, that this amendment cannot constitutionally be proposed to the state legislatures, unless it is agreed to, in the two houses, by those numbers, twenty-three, and ninety-one, respectively. This is a constitutional point, which, I am told, has never been agitated. But it is certainly worthy of attention. If the construction should prevail, that two-thirds of the members present, at any time, might propose amendments, the consequence is, that twelve Senators, being two-thirds of a quorum, and forty-eight representatives, being a similar two-thirds, might propose any, and the most important amendments. I am aware, sir, that it may be said, such propositions are not final, they may yet be ratified or rejected by the state legislatures. But the spirit of the constitution seems to require two-thirds of the nation, acting by its proper organs, to propose amendments; and that, in so interesting a subject as a constitutional alteration, a less number should have no authority.

The letter of the constitution will certainly justify this idea of its spirit. When two thirds of the Senate are requisite to consent and advise to a treaty, the words are 'two-thirds of the Senators present.' To convict on impeachment, 'two-thirds of the members present.' Yeas and nays are to be entered on the journal, 'at the desire of one-fifth of those present.' In the two first cases it is requisite to act immediately, whether two-thirds of the whole are present or not; then we see the expressions are clear, 'two-thirds' refers to the numbers present. Why so? Because, without these expressions, the reference would have been understood to the whole number of members. In the last case why add the word 'present' to the one-fifth? Because, without that word, one-fifth of the whole would have been its meaning. In all other cases, when two-thirds are required, the spirit of the constitution certainly is, and the words seem to carry the meaning, 'two-thirds' of the whole numbers. It is said, 'that a majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business.' House, must in this case mean all the members. Two-thirds of both houses must, on the same principles, mean two-thirds of all the members of both. There is, I acknowledge, some obscurity, in the constitutional use of the word house, when either of the two branches of congress is described by it; but if the intention, and sense as well as words are attended to, I am forcibly led to a belief that two-thirds of all the members of both houses, are required to sanction propositions for amendments, and that this construction is most consistent with the wisdom and political skill of the convention. The construction for which I contend is analogous to the caution manifest in other parts of the constitution. It was well known to the convention, that amendments, if recommended or proposed by congress, would have an imposing influence with the state legislatures; and that in no possible instance, could more evil arise from indigested measures, than in the case of amendments, owing to the impossibility of clearly foreseeing their operation and effects on the general constitutional system. It was made requisite therefore to wait for the uninfluenced consent of two-thirds of the popular and federal representations of the nation. Whatever be our opinion on the point now discussed state legislatures have a constitutional right to judge of it for themselves, and to determine whether a proposition for an amendment is presented to them, with the sanction required, and if, in their opinions, the requisite numbers have not agreed to the proposition, they will guard the constitution, by refusing to ratify such amendment. My honourable friend from New-Hampshire (Mr. Plumer) has done such ample justice to this part of the subject, as to place it out of the reach of my assistance and beyond the need of any.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that the amendment now under consideration could not, in the Senate, obtain a constitutional majority, of two-thirds, nor even a simple majority, were it not for the influence of instructions. Some gentlemen have ingenuously said, that, until they gave this amendment the present particular examination, they had not contemplated the extent of its probable effects, and although they entertained doubts, yet they were induced by the instructions given them, to make the proposition to the legislatures, and let them decide for themselves.

Whatever may or can be said in favour of instructions generally, cannot be applicable to this case. For the purpose of obtaining amendments to the constitution, congress can only propose, and the state legislatures ratify. The duties are appropriate and distinct, and the uninfluenced independent act of both, requisite. The legislatures cannot ratify, till a proposal is made. This subject can be elucidated and enforced by familiar examples. The house of representatives alone, can originate a bill for raising revenue, but it cannot become a law without a concurrence of the Senate. Would not the advice and instruction of the Senate to the house, intimating our desire that they would originate and send to us for concurrence, a revenue bill, be thought improper, indelicate, and even unconstitutional? The President and the Senate can appoint certain officers, but they have distinct and appropriate agencies in the appointment. The President can nominate, but cannot appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate.

But the Senate cannot nominate, nor could their advice to the President, to make a nomination, be either binding or proper. The character of the several independent branches of our government, forming constitutional checks upon each other, cannot be exemplified more fully; than in the mode of producing amendments. And an interference of one independent body, upon the appropriate and distinct duties of another, can in no instance have a more prejudicial effect. Can it be thought then, either proper, or constitutional for the state legislatures to assume the power of instructing congress to propose to them a measure, when the power of proposing is not only not given to them, but given exclusively to congress? As well and with as much propriety might congress make a law, attempting to bind the state legislatures to ratify; as the legislatures, by instructions, bind congress to propose. In either case the check, which for obviously wise purposes, was introduced into the constitution, is totally destroyed. And we have not as much security against improper amendments, as we should have, if the power were exclusively vested in the state legislatures, and for this obvious reason, that in this mode of operation the responsibility, for the adoption of an improper amendment, is divided and destroyed. Is the sentiment correct, sir, that we shall be justifiable in sending forth this proposition to be considered by the state legislatures, if we believe it ought not to be ratified?

What would be thought of the Senate, if they should pass a bill, and send it to the House of Representatives for concurrence, the provisions of which they disliked entirely, and wished not to be established? And can any sound distinction be made between such a measure, and the one now before us? In either case, the single act of the other body would be final; and in either case the people at large would be safer to have but one body in existence, to legislate, or make amendments; for all our agency in both cases would only tend to deceive and mislead, and in addition, to diminish, if not destroy, as has just been observed, the responsibility of the other body.

It has been said, sir, that the House of Representatives have twice given a sanction to this measure, and that their conduct, in this particular, adds weight to it. I wish to treat that honourable body with the highest respect; but I must deviate from the truth, were I to acknowledge that their conduct upon this amendment, has a tendency to convince me that they have a full understanding of the subject. Twice have they sent us a resolution, similar in its leading feature to that on your table, and made no provision that the person to be Vice-President, should be qualified for the highly responsible office, either in age, or citizenship. And for aught that they had guarded against, we might have had a man in the chief magistracy, from Morocco, a foreigner, who had not been in the country a month.—

Mr. President, it was suggested, in a former part of the debate, by a gentleman from S. Carolina, (Mr. Butler,) that the great states, or ruling party of the day, had brought forward this amendment, for the purpose of preventing the choice of a Federal Vice-President at the next election. And we are now put beyond the power of doubt, that this is, at least, one motive, by the observations of several of the majority, but especially by those of the gentleman from Virginia. He informs us, and I appreciate his frankness, that if the friends of this measure do not seize the present opportunity to pass it, the opportunity will never recur. He tells us plainly, that a minor faction ought to be discouraged, that all hopes or prospect of rising into consequence, much more of rising into office, should be crushed, and that this amendment is to produce a part of these beneficial effects; which amendment he compares to the bill which was introduced into the British parliament, to exclude a popish successor to the crown, commonly called the exclusion bill. Have the minority then, no right left, but the right to be trampled upon by the majority? This is identically the conduct, which is mentioned in the quotation which I have had the honour to make from the secretary of state; to which I ask leave to recur. 'The majority, by trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions, which, in republics, have more frequently than any other cause produced despotism.'

What avails it then, that this country has triumphed over the invasion and violence of one oppressor, if they must now be victims to the violence of thousands? Political death is denounced now; what denunciation will follow? It would be a useless affectation in us, to pretend to close our eyes upon either the cause or consequences of this measure.

The spirit of party has risen so high, at the present day, that it dares to attempt, what in milder times would be beyond the reach of calculation. To this overwhelming torrent every consideration must give way.

The gentleman is perfectly correct, in supposing that now is the only time to pass this resolution; there is a tide in the affairs of party most emphatically, and unless its height is taken, its acme improved, the shallows soon appear, and the present demon of party give place to a successor. A hope is undoubtedly now indulged that one great and dominant passion, will, like Aaron's rod, swallow up every other, and that the favourable moment can now be seized to crush the small states, and to obtain their own agency in the transaction. And when we recur to the history of former confederacies, and find the small states arrayed in conflict against each other, to fight, to suffer, and to die for the transient gratification of the great states; have we not some reason to fear the success of this measure?

In the Senate is the security of the small states; their feeble voice in the house of representatives is lost in the potent magic of numbers and wealth. Never until now has the force of the small states, which was provided by the constitution, and lodged in this federative body, as a weapon of self-defence, been able to bear upon this question. And will the small states, instead of defending their own interest, their existence, sacrifice them to a gust of momentary passion? to the short-lived gratification to party prejudice?

The resolution, if circumstances shall unequivocally demand it, can pass at the next or any future session of congress. But once passed, and its passage will operate like the grave; the sacrificed rights of the small states will be gone forever. Is it possible, sir, that any small state can submit to be a satellite in the state system, and revolve in a secondary orbit around a great state? Act in humble devotion to her will till her purposes are gratified, and then content herself to be thrown aside like a cast garment, an object of her own unceasing regret, and fit only for the hand of scorn to point its slow and moving finger at? Can the members of this Senate who represent the small states, quietly cross their hands and request the great states to bind them fast and to draw tight the ligature?

I am aware, sir, that I shall be accused of an attempt to excite the jealousy of the small states. Mr. President, I represent a small state, I feel the danger, and claim the constitutional right to sound the alarm. From the same altar on which the small states shall be immolated, will rise the smoke of sacrificed liberty: and despotism must be the dreadful successor.

It is the cause of my country and of humanity which I plead. And when one vast, overwhelming passion is in exercise, full well I know, sir, that no warning voice, no excitement but jealousy, has been found sufficiently active and energetic in its operation to dissolve the wizard spell, and force mankind to listen to argument. Jealousy, hateful in private life, has perhaps done more in the preservation of political rights than all the virtues united.

I have made the stand, sir, in the Senate, which I thought the importance of the subject demanded. If I fail here, there is hope of success with the state legislatures. If nothing can withstand the torrent there, I shall experience the satisfaction which is derived from a consciousness of having raised my feeble voice in defence of that constitution, which is not only the security of the small states, but the palladium of my country's rights; and shall console myself with the reflection that I have done my duty.

At half past 9 o'clock on Friday evening, 2d December, 1803, the question was put in the Senate, and the yeas and nays being called, were as follow:

YEAS:

Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, MacLay, Nicholas, Potter, Israel Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Stone, Taylor, Worthington, Wright.—22.

NAYS:

Messrs. Adams, Butler, Dayton, Hillhouse, Ocott, Pickens, Sumner, Tracy, Wells, White.—10.

The resolution was sent to the House of Representatives, and on Friday, the 9th day of December, the vote was taken upon it, and the yeas and nays being called, were:

YEAS:

Messrs. Nathaniel Macon, (Speaker,) Willis Alston, Junior, Nathaniel Alexander, Isaac Anderson, John Archer, David Bard, George Michael Bedinger, William Blackledge, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Joseph Bryan, William Butler, George W. ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.

CONCLUSION OF THE LIFE OF PASCAL.

The last four years of his life were but a long disease, a state of continual and increasing languor, in which he manifested the fortitude and resignation of a genuine christian. It was not a new disorder, but a return of the complaints, to which he had been subject from his youth—aggravated by that carelessness of health, which a mistaken piety had now made a religious principle. The distemper came on by a violent tooth-ache, which deprived him altogether of sleep.—Yet even in this condition, that perpetual motion of intellect, that incessant activity of mind, which is the most decisive characteristic of genius, did not forsake him. About twenty years before, father Mersenne, an eminent mathematician, had published a problem for solution, which exercised the ingenuity of all the most illustrious men of the age, distinguished in that branch of science. He called it the problem of the Roulette, or wheel. The question was to ascertain the curve line, described in the air, by a nail in the circumference of a rolling wheel, from the point of its contact with the ground, until after a complete revolution of the wheel it comes to the ground again. The problem had remained unanswered, though in the meantime it had been a subject of investigation and of contest between such men as, Descartes, Roberval, Fermat, Baurgrant, Wren, Torricelli and others alike of distinguished note. In the agonies of the tooth-ache, Pascal discovered and settled the demonstration of this curve and its principal properties. His friend, the Duke de Roannes, to whom he communicated his success, advised him to make use of it as an argument in favour of that religious cause, so near his heart, by proving to the world, that the humble submission of his faith, was not for the want of powers to advance as far in demonstration, as any of the philosophical infidels. Pascal therefore, published the problem anew, and offered a prize of sixty pistoles, to any person who within eighteen months, should give the solution. None however appeared; and in 1658, he applied the money, to defray the publication of a small treatise containing his own demonstration. It was published under the name of Amos d'Ettonville, the anagram, of Louis de Montalte; and it is now extremely scarce, only one hundred and twenty copies having been printed. Its title was Treatise of the Roulette. But the curve has since obtained, and is now known by the name of the Cycloid. Its properties were farther investigated afterwards by Huyghens, Wallis, Leibnitz, and Bernouilli, the former of whom applied some of its principles to the improvement of clocks.

The solution of the problem had relieved Pascal from his tooth-ache, but the disorders from which it arose were such as 'not poppy, nor mandragora, nor all the drowsy syrups of the East, could medicine to rest.' He continued languishing, and devoting more and more of his time to relics, beads, and practices of devotion, until the 19th of August 1662, when he expired, at the age of thirty-nine years and two months. He was buried in the church of St. Stephen, at Paris, that being the parish in which he resided at the time of his decease.

Some years after his death, the loose hints, which he had occasionally thrown upon paper, to be used in the great work, which he did not live to accomplish, were published under the title of 'Thoughts of Mr. Pascal.' They were attacked by Voltaire, a man more bigotted in infidelity, than ever Pascal was in religion. As a specimen of the manner which Voltaire employed in the criticism, I shall give one example, in which the original thought, and the remark of the censor are peculiarly characteristic of their respective authors.

'Whenever (says Pascal) a proposition seems inconceivable, it should not be denied, on that account alone; examine its reverse, and if that be found manifestly false, you may affirm the proposition, however incomprehensible.'

Here is a rule, which must be of frequent use to every sincere inquirer after truth; not that it can lead to any material discovery, which could remain concealed without it; but because it gives a general method of setting any given and questionable proposition in a new point of view; and as different arguments, have the strongest impression upon different minds, there can be nothing more important in the art of reasoning, than to multiply the modifications and different aspects, under which a proposition may be placed.

Now, what think you is Voltaire's remark, on this ingenious and profound idea?

'It seems to me, that it is evident that the two contraries may both be false. For instance, an ox flies to the southward with wings—an ox flies to the northward without wings—twenty thousand angels yesterday flew twenty thousand men—twenty thousand men yesterday flew twenty thousand angels. These propositions are evidently false.'

One would think it unnecessary to tell a child of the most ordinary capacity, that to affirm that an ox flies to the northward without wings, is not the reverse of affirming, that an ox flies to the southward with wings. It is the very same proposition with different accessory circumstances. The reverse would be the same in both cases. An ox did not fly, which would be manifestly true. The same observation applies to the other instance adduced of angels and men.

Voltaire had no reasoning powers, and was utterly incapable of meeting a logician like Pascal, face to face. But he had much wit, and could easily build a sarcasm upon a blunder. His common practice was, to make buffoonery, serve the purpose of argument. Yet it needs some indulgence to discover even wit, in his flying oxen. With or without wings, they are still the images of dulness, and their creation is not more creditable to their author's imagination, than to his judgment.

I shall conclude this sketch of Pascal's life, with the character given of him by La Harpe, in his Lyceum.

'A genius, no less exalted than Descartes, in speculation, and vigorous as Bossuet, in style, Pascal, employed both those powers in combating infidelity, which had followed in the train of calvinism, and which, though concealed, and without influence, even then gave concern to the zealous friends of christianity. He first attacked those miserable casuists, who appear indeed, to have been sincere in their absurdities, but who nevertheless had disgraced religion, by rendering her as far as was in their power, accessory to those ridiculous scholastic subtleties, which had filled their books with the most pernicious errors. Those renowned Provincial Letters therefore, which gave them the stroke of death, may be laid to the account of true philosophy. Had these letters been only a book of controversy, they would have met the fate common to so many others, and been forgotten. Had they possessed only the merit of being written with a purity of style, at that period unexampled, they would be remembered only for the service they rendered to the language. But the talent of plainness, uniting with that of eloquence, and the ingenious choice of a dramatic form, by means of which he makes serious personages appear with so much humour and drollery, raising the smile of sport amidst the gravest and driest of materials, made it impossible for this excellent polemic work, to pass away with the particular interests which at first secured its splendid success.

'A much more exalted conception however, was that of the great work, which he did but purpose, and had not time to accomplish, in which he intended to have proved to demonstration, the necessity and the truth of revelation; by which those who know any thing of language, or of religion, will not understand that he ever thought of explaining the mysteries by a theory merely human; which would be to build up reason on the ruins of faith. Pascal was above an inconsistency so contrary to christianity; he meant only to demonstrate the motives of credibility, founded upon the certainty of facts and of consequences, in such a manner that reason could have nothing to oppose against it, but must be forced to confess that what God has been pleased to make us know, is sufficient to induce our belief of that which he has chosen to conceal. This plan is perfectly philosophical, perfectly practicable, if we judge only by the fragments he left perfectly as they have come to us, no more.

better qualified to accomplish it than Pascal. The connection of the ideas is necessarily lost; so that one of the main pillars with regard to the object of the work is wanting; but that of the thought and expression were of itself sufficient to immortalize the writer. Ex ungue leonem; you perceive the lion's claws: this may be said at every page of this singular collection, published after the death of Pascal, under the title of his thoughts. Voltaire has combated some of them, with very bad reasoning, and with dishonest misconstruction. The very project of attack was unfair, and uncandid. How can a man reconcile himself to the meanness of formal argument, against the mere detached and desultory first thoughts of an author, thrown upon paper only for the purpose of a memorandum, to be afterwards connected with the chain of his reasoning. Voltaire, forsooth, must go, and dash himself against a scaffolding. How much more unsuccessful, must he have been, against the building itself.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts of letters received from an American traveller, in Europe, in the year 1800.

Bale, in Switzerland, 5. Sep. 1800.

My last letter was from Strasburg; which place my fellow-traveller and I left yesterday morning, and arrived at night at Colmar, without any occurrence of consequence.—Colmar is a small walled town, and capital of the department of the Upper Rhine: It is not far from the lofty hills, or rather mountains of Alsace, and distant some leagues from the Rhine. By setting off early this morning, we were enabled to breakfast at Mulhausen, a very neat small town in alliance with the Swiss Cantons, and almost insulated by the department of the Upper Rhine. It is a place of some antiquity, and its history is very interesting. The surrounding country is beautiful and well cultivated. The hills particularly, which are covered with vines, are planted with low trees, whose round bushy tops give them, when in number, much the appearance of a Jersey orchard. The plains are covered with grain.

We came to Basle to dinner, through a country which increased in beauty as we approached the Rhine, whose opposite bank was spotted with white cottages, and with villages peeping out of every valley.—The high hills near the Rhine, were cultivated to the top, and nature really seemed to smile on every side.

At a small village called Bourg-libre, we passed the barrier which separates the Swiss from the French Republic, and escaped the trouble of having our baggage examined, by the politeness of the officer, who declined doing it, on our assurance that our trunks contained nothing but our apparel. A mile and a half further, we came to the Swiss guard, which also permitted us to pass, without examination.

We put up at the Three Kings, an excellent and celebrated Inn, whose walls are washed by the waters of the Rhine, which, at this place, is a broad and rapid stream. From the windows of the dining room, there is a noble view of the river, the Petit Basle, (as that part of the city on the opposite bank, is called) the wooden bridge, 600 feet long, and the mountains, which begin here to shut in the river.—We also see about a league below the town, the strong little fortress of Hunningen, a place of importance enough, to have cost the Austrians, this war, a siege of some trouble.

6. September. One of the gentlemen to whom we had letters, has been very polite in making us acquainted with the chief curiosities of this place.—We, as usual, first ascended the steeple of the cathedral, to form a correct idea of the situation of Basle, and the surrounding country. It is astonishing how broad the Rhine is, even at this distance from the sea, to which it is also navigable, even for the stage-boats that come up to Cologne.

In the body of the church, we saw the spot where the great Erasmus is buried; a simple flat stone, placed against a pillar of the aisle, is all the monument erected to this celebrated genius.—There are a variety of other monuments, and in the choir, is the tomb of a countess of Hapsbourg, from which ancient family, the present House of Austria derives its descent.

The inhabitants of Basle, have been somewhat alarmed, for these two days past, by an insurrection of the peasants of a few villages, about three leagues off. It appears, that on the revolution taking place, in this Canton, they were promised, that an oppressive tax or contribution, they were accustomed to pay, should cease to be levied, on condition of their acquiescing in the change. This was agreed to on their part; but the present government having again called upon them, for the payment of the accustomed tax, they refused it, and some soldiers were sent, to enforce their compliance with the demand; who, it is said, behaved ill, and even shot some of the most refractory.—This enraged the peasants, to such a degree, that they attacked the soldiers, with guns, swords, staves, &c. and killed some of them. The Prefect of Basle, went to explain the matter to the procureur; but he no sooner began his harangue, than he was fired upon, and obliged to fly. A body of Swiss soldiers were sent against them, but the peasants were so strong, that they beat them away; indeed, it was reported, that they were coming, last night, to Basle:—to day, however, all is quiet, though the insurgents have not dispersed, being still obstinate in claiming the performance of the promise given them.—This business has made a considerable noise here to-day; and I have seen nothing but soldiers parading the streets; and more than once, I have heard the trumpet calling to arms. The inhabitants of Basle, regret this revolt very much, as they are afraid they will find it necessary to call in French troops, to reduce the peasants to obedience: which is a circumstance much disliked, as they would only add to the number they are compelled already to quarter and support.

We amused ourselves, the first evening we arrived here, with looking at the singular dresses of the peasants, who came into the town to church, it being Sunday. I never in my life saw such odd figures. I believe it will not be possible for me to describe them satisfactorily, though I will attempt it.—The women wear their hair close to the head, and some have two long plaits behind; to which are tied two black ribbons, that reach the ground; others have a close cap of worked silk and muslin, trimmed with gold or silver lace, and ornamented with gaudily-coloured ribbon.—On their waist, they have a short close corset, which fits their shape, and is commonly of red, yellow, or other light coloured silk or worsted stuff, while their petticoats are striped, and scarcely reach to the calf of the leg. But, really, it is scarcely possible to convey an idea of these strange dresses, as they vary much; they are, however, singularly picturesque. I can only say, that they are infinitely more curious and fantastic, than any thing I saw of the North Hollanders, or West Frieslanders, who I thought, hitherto, had carried eccentricity of dress to its highest pitch.

We took notice, this morning, of some criminals chained, two by two, to a small cart filled with dirt, which they had collected in the streets. This mode of punishment, reminded me of ours. The wheel barrow, both of which, I conceive not founded upon the true principles of reformation, and rather tend to harden, than reclaim the bad members of society.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Passy, April 23, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I am much pleased with the account you give me, of the disposition with which the proposals, from the Empress of Russia have been received, and desire to be informed from time to time, of the progress of that interesting business.

I shall be glad to hear of your reconciliation with the—because a continuance of your difference, will be extremely inconvenient. Permit me to tell you frankly, what I formerly hinted to you, that I apprehend you suffer yourself too easily to be led into personal prejudices, by interested people, who would engross all our confidence to themselves. From this source have arisen, I imagine, the charges and suspicions you have insinuated to me, against several who have always declared a friendship for us in Holland. It is right that you should have an opportunity of giving the Carte du Pays to Mr. Laurens, when he arrives in Holland. But if in order to serve your particular friends, you fill his head with these prejudices, you will hurt him and them, and perhaps yourself. There does not appear to me, the least probability in your supposition, that the—is an enemy to America.

Here has been with me a gentleman from Holland, who was charged, as he said, with a verbal commission from divers cities, to inquire whether it was true, that Amsterdam had, as they heard, made a treaty of commerce with the United States, and to express in that case, their willingness to enter into a similar treaty. Do you know any thing of this? What is become or likely to become, of the plan of treaty, formerly under consideration? By a letter from Middlebourg, to which the inclosed is an answer, a cargo seized and sent to America, as English property, is reclaimed, partly on the supposition that free ships, make free goods: They ought to do so between England and Holland, because there is a treaty which stipulates it; but there being yet no treaty between Holland and America, to that purpose, I apprehend that the goods being declared by the captain, to be English, a neutral ship will not protect them, the law of nations governing in this case, as it did before the treaty above mentioned. Tell me if you please, your opinion.

With sincere esteem, and affection,

I am ever, dear Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant.

B. FRANKLIN.

M. Dumas.

Paris, Hotel de Valois Rue de Richelieu,
May 21, 1780.

Sir,

His excellency Dr. Franklin, lent me the inclosed letter, from Sir Henry Clinton, to Lord George Germain, upon condition, that I would send a copy of it to you. A privateer from Boston, had the good fortune to seize the packet bound to London, and the mail, in which among others, this letter was found. It was sent from Boston to Philadelphia, and there published in a newspaper of the 8th of April, one of these papers arrived, within a few days at L'Orient, in a vessel from Philadelphia.

It is a pity but it should be published in every newspaper in the world, in an opposite column, to a late speech of Lord George Germain, in the House of Commons, as his document in support of his assertions.

I have the honour to be, with great respect, Sir, your most obedient and humble servant.
JOHN ADAMS.

M. Dumas.

Aranguez, June 5, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I received your two letters, of the 4th and 11th of this Month, and am sorry to find that the consequences of the intercepted letter, still make you uneasy. Believe me, the personage you allude to, will never take any pains to injure you beyond sea; and although to save appearances with the person he protects, he may still keep upon an appearance of resentment; be assured it will go no further. I hope your correspondence with Mr. W. L. at Brussels hath finished; take the advice of a young man, derived from the example of an old sage, whom you respect, never trust yourself on paper, to one that is not your friend, but when you cannot help it, and then as cautiously as possible. If you have not written to Congress on that subject, I advise you not to write. That body hath too much to attend to, to be interrupted, by private disputes. If you have a paper containing the intelligence from America, mentioned by Mr. Lee, I shall be obliged to you for it. I do assure you, I have never heard from any one on the subject of the intercepted letter, except Dr. F—n, and when I do hear, I will immediately inform you. Let it therefore sleep in peace for the present. I am obliged to you for your communication from the P—y, cultivate him, he is of much more consequence to us both at present, than the other, whose interest and duty must make him coincide with us in conduct, and if I am not deceived, he acts also from inclination. If G. B. doth not recede from her present resolutions, with respect to your states, and R—ssa is in earnest to adhere to its declaration; the first named country will be involved with all these nations who accede to the invitation of the latter. Though I am afraid the neutral nations, regard the war with satisfaction, as it weakens the greatest maritime powers, and adds to their own trade, and future respectability. I would have you insinuate to the P—y, the glory that he might acquire by suggesting the idea of fixing the independence of America, and putting an end to destructive war, by means of the neutral powers, could they be prevailed on to show a disposition to do this, I am persuaded that it would have a great effect towards accelerating the peace. Nothing but insanity, can account for the conduct of the King of G. B. in not endeavouring to extricate himself from this business, unless he hath secret reasons for hope of which we are ignorant. He, I know is, the primary mobile of all our misfortunes. The characters you give me of your ministers here, hath given me much satisfaction. If you will take the trouble of giving me in each letter a slight sketch, of the characters of the most eminent members in your States, and in their public employments, I shall be a little more au fait in your affairs. I wrote to Mr. De Neufville, in answer to his first to me, and have since received one of the 9th of May. Mr. Jay hath answered the one he received from the same gentleman, and we both join in intreating you to thank them for their friendly and polite offers of service. We are so far from the centre of correspondence, that we seldom have it in our power to give you or them any news. Mr. Laurence was still in America, the 1st of March, as I have been informed. Adieu.

Yours, &c.

W. C.

P. S. Direct Messrs. De Neufville and Co. to address their letters, and yours, under cover to some banker of their correspondence, with instructions, either to send the letters to the house of Mr. Jay, Cavigera, St. Francisco, Madrid, or to keep them till called for.

Passy, June 5, 1780.

Dear Sir,

The gentleman, whose name you wished to know, in one of your late letters, is Mr. West-huysen, Echerin and Conveiller de la Ville de Harlem. I shall probably send an order to that place, for some of the types, of which you have sent me the prices, before I leave Europe. I think them very good, and not dear. A Dutch ship belonging to Messrs. Little, Dale, and Co. of Rotterdam, being brought into France, as having an English cargo on board. I have followed your opinion, with regard to the condemnation of the cargo, which I think the more right, as the English have in the West Indies confiscated several of our cargoes, found in Dutch ships. But, to shew respect to the declaration of the Empress of Russia, I have written to the owners of our privateers, a letter of which I enclose a copy, together with a copy of the judgment, for your use, if you hear of any complaint. I approve much of the principles of the confederacy, of the neutral powers, and am not only for respecting the ships as the house of a friend, containing the goods of an enemy, but I even wish for the sake of humanity, that the law of nations may be farther improved, by determining that even in time of war, all those kinds of people, who are employed in procuring subsistence for the species, or in exchanging the necessities or conveniences of life, which is for the common benefit of mankind; such as husbandmen on their lands, fishermen in their barques, and traders in unarmed vessels, shall be permitted to prosecute their several innocent and useful employments, without interruption, or molestation, and nothing taken from them, even when wanted by an enemy, but in paying a fair price for the same.

I think you have done well to print the letter of Clinton; for though I have myself had suspicions, whether some parts of it were really written by him, yet I have no doubt of the facts stated, and think the piece valuable, as giving a true account of the state of British and American affairs, in that quarter. On the whole, it has the appearance of a letter written by a General, who did not approve of the expedition he was sent upon; who had no opinion of the judgment of these who drew up his instructions; who had observed that preceding commanders, Gage, Burgoyne, Keppel, and the Howes had all been censured by the ministers, for having unsuccessfully attempted to execute injudicious instructions, with unequal force, and he therefore wrote such a letter, not merely to give the information contained in it, but to be produced in his vindication, when he might be recalled, and his want of success, charged upon him as a crime, though in truth owing to the folly of the ministers, who had ordered him on impracticable projects, and persisted in them notwithstanding his faithful informations, without furnishing the necessary number of troops, he had demanded. In this view much of the letter may be accounted for, without supposing it fictitious; and therefore, if not genuine, it is ingeniously written: But you will easily conceive, that if the state of public facts it contains, were known in America to be false, such a publication there would have been absurd and of no possible use to the cause of the country. I have written to Mr. Neufville, concerning the bills you mention. I have no orders or advice about them, know nothing of them, and therefore cannot prudently meddle with them, especially as the funds in my power are not more than sufficient to answer the Congress bills for interest, and other inevitable demands. He desired to know whether I would engage to reimburse him, if he should accept and pay them; but as I know not the amount of them, I cannot enter into any such engagement; for though if they are genuine Congress bills, I am persuaded all possible care will be taken by Congress, to provide for their punctual payment; yet there are so many accidents by which remittances are delayed, or intercepted in the time of war, that I dare not hazard for these new bills, the possibility of being rendered unable to pay the others.

With great esteem, I am, dear

Sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

B. FRANKLIN.

P. S. I cannot prescribe as you desire, any thing relating to your affair with 62, your own judgment ought to guide you. I shall be careful to furnish you early with any good news we may receive. If the 732, cannot be immediately made, it may with prudence come on by degrees.

(The copy of the judgment will be sent by next post.)

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

H. CARITAT proposing to sell the Library of his Literary Room, New York, solicits the attention of gentlemen of affluence and literature, to the following ADVERTISEMENT. The Books of which this Collection consists, have been selected with great care and attention; and the proprietor has spared neither trouble nor expense, to render it as complete as possible, by the purchase of many scarce and valuable works, in high estimation; but rarely, from the difficulty of obtaining them, or the expensiveness of the cost, imported into this country. When last in Europe, he devoted a considerable portion of his time in forming this Collection; in which are many works that, from their scarcity would not have been obtained, but from repeated applications by him in person; and he can with confidence aver, what is rarely the case in extensive collections, that there are very few, if any, among the Books constituting this Library, but what would be deemed Works of merit in their respective branches; the utmost previous attention having been paid, where the work was not well known, to obtain from the different Reviews, and other literary sources, the most correct opinion of it. A Collection of this kind must be an object well worthy the attention of, and particularly interesting to those gentlemen who are solicitous of forming a complete Library; as the delays and difficulties attending the procuring a number of valuable Works, for that purpose in Europe, except the person is himself on the spot, are frequently of a nature almost to discourage the attempt.

Among the Books offered for sale, under the article of Natural History, will be found a greater collection of works of that description, than probably are contained in any Library in the United States. The following are a part. Mr. Smellie's Buffon. Turton's Linnaeus. A valuable and elegant Publication, the Magazine, 12 volumes, the prints finely coloured; a work not solely confined to Natural History, but containing an account of whatever is new and curious in the Arts and Sciences; a variety of entertaining Anecdotes, and original Philosophical Essays: the splendid Work of Dr. Shaw, the naturalist's Miscellany, containing Notes, with Descriptions and plates of whatever is most rare, singular, and beautiful in the various departments of Nature, accurately delineated and faithfully coloured; Donovan's Insects of China in quarto, unquestionably the most beautiful work on Entomology, hitherto published, printed on fine paper, and the subjects most accurately and splendidly coloured: Cramer's Papillons Exotiques, in 4to. bound in morocco, the plates beautifully illuminated.

In Oriental Literature, the works of Sir Wm. Jones, the Institutes of Timur; Colebrook's Digest of the Hindoo Laws; Ouseley's Persian Miscellanies; Maurice's Indian Antiquities, with Dow's, and Orme's Histories of Hindostan; Scott's, of the Deccan, Hamilton's of the Rohillas; that of the reign of Shah Aulum; D'Ohsson of the Religion, Manners, Literature, and Jurisprudence of the Ottoman Empire, a very valuable work; with Ferdousi's Historical Poem; Translations of several very ancient Indian Poems, and the best Travels through the East; from as complete a Library of Eastern History as can be found in the English language. In History; in general, the collection is as full as it could be rendered, by the best modern historians, and the most approved versions of the ancients; of the latter of which, several are rendered extremely valuable by their scarcity and the difficulty of procuring them.

The Voyages and Travels include those of every modern traveller of reputation, from the arctic to the antarctic circle; among which are those of Park, Brown, Horneman and Barrow, in Africa; Symes, Turner, Macartney, Forster, &c. in Asia; Acerbi, in Lapland and Norway; the celebrated Travels of Professor Pallas, through Siberia, and the Northern Parts of the Russian Empire, in French, with a volume of Charts and Plates; and a more recent Publication in English, of the same author, of Travels through the Southern Parts of that vast Territory.

In the Belles Lettres and Poetry, the Collection is such as must render it highly interesting to the lovers of elegant Literature, and the friends of the Muses; together with Anderson's Edition of the British Poets, in 13 vols. imperial 8vo. and many of the best modern English Poems and Dramatic Works: it contains the most elegant Versions, of the Italian, French Portuguese, and German Poets.

To the Amateurs of Painting and the Antiquarian, Cooke's Hogarth, being a new impression of the Prints of that celebrated master, from engravings executed from the original designs, and of the same size, and accompanied with an explanatory volume; and an account of the Remains of Antiquity found in the Ruins of Herculaneum, with plates of the subjects which will stamp an additional value on this Collection.

The above Library will be sold on very reasonable terms, and at a small advance from the sterling cost, and will, if a sufficient number of gentlemen should unite in the purchase, be divided into lots for the accommodation of the purchasers.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

HERTFORD ASSIZES, JUNE 26.

THE RIGHT OF WATER.

STRUTT V. BOVINGTON

The plaintiff in this action is a miller near Rickmansworth; the defendant a farmer in the same neighbourhood. It appeared that the plaintiff and his ancestors had enjoyed the mills in question for several centuries past, which were turned by a stream issuing from the rivers Game and Colne; but with a view to accommodate the farmers adjacent, a custom had grown into established use, of diverting the waters which supplied the mill-stream on Saturday night till the Monday morning, for the purpose of flooding their meadow land. The defendant, however, was not content with this indulgence, and had let out the waters in so considerable a way as to prevent at times the working of the mills. The plaintiff's father had recovered of the defendant near twenty years ago for a similar infringement of his right, and the diversion of the waters was put an end to. The present plaintiff, after proving that the waters had been drawn off from his mills, proposed giving the written evidence of Mr. Charles Macklin, the late comedian, (who was examined on the first trial) to establish the ancient right of water vested in the occupiers of the mills alluded to.

Mr. Serjeant Best objected to the evidence, and insisted that it could not be legally given.

Lord Ellenborough observed that the grievance complained of was precisely the same as on the former trial, and therefore thought the evidence of Mr. Macklin might be received in the same way as a person who might have been examined upon interrogatories.

Mr. Garrow said, he would put an end to all controversy, and examine a gentleman then in court, to what Mr. Macklin had said in the former trial, he having been present at the time, and paying particular attention to the evidence.

Mr. Serjeant Best had no objections to hearing Mr. Macklin's ghost.

Mr. John Bayley was then put to the bar, who stated to his Lordship and the Jury, that he had heard Mr. Macklin give his evidence, and that it was of so whimsical an import that he could repeat it verbatim.—Mr. Macklin, at the trial of 1786 spoke as follow:—'About fifty years ago I was in the habit of visiting my friend Mr. Fleetwood, who was the proprietor of one of the theatres, and had a house in the neighbourhood of Mr. Strutt's mills, consequently I had an opportunity of knowing the waters alluded to. At that time there was no such thing as watering the meadows by a diversion of the stream. My friend Fleetwood felt the loss, as he wished to get a reservoir into his garden; but the miller, Mr. Strutt, would not consent to his drawing off the water; I undertook to bring the miller about, and said to my friend, 'You must invite the miller to dinner, and we'll talk the matter over.'—My friend did so, and the miller was regaled most handsomely. Having previously been informed that the miller was fond of smoking, when the cloth was removed, I proposed that we should adjourn to the smoking room, and taste Mr. Fleetwood's excellent tap of fine Staffordshire ale; the miller agreed, and we adjourned accordingly. For a time I smoked the miller, till at last the miller smoked me, and flatly said, he would not consent to have his water diverted. Determined not to give up the pursuit, the miller was invited to a second dinner of turtle, which agreed with his taste so well, that notwithstanding he was before so tenacious of his water, he was brought to consent that my friend should divert a little of the stream to water his garden, the miller observing at the time that Mr. Fleetwood must not forget that he, the miller, was the river god in those waters, and could withhold it whenever he thought proper.'

The plaintiff's right was fully ascertained in other respects, and a verdict taken for one shilling damages, the defendant agreeing to stop up certain sluices at his own expense, and preventing waste in future.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

From private sources, we learn that a challenge has been sent by a member of Congress to one of the heads of department, in consequence of some transaction, supposed injurious to the character of the former, having taking place.—We learn that the offer was declined.—The particulars, as is usual on such occasions, will probably before long transpire. As the character of the administration is not of a very martial complexion, it is thought the affair will be amicably settled.

THE TEAR.

On beds of snow the moonbeam slept,
And chilly was the midnight gloom,
When, by the damp grove, Ellen wept,
Sweet maid! it was her lover's tomb.

A warm tear gush'd, the wintry air
Congeal'd it, as it flow'd away;
All night it lay an ice drop there,
At morn, it glitter'd in the ray.

An angel, wandering from the sphere,
Who saw this bright, this frozen gem,
To dew-ey'd pity brought the tear,
And hung it on her diadem.

Why is Addison still the first of our essayists? He has, sometimes, been excelled in criticisms more philosophical, in topics more interesting, and in diction more coloured. But there is a personal charm in the character he has assumed, in his Periodical Miscellanies, which is felt, with such a gentle force, that we scarcely advert to it. He has painted forth his little humours, and his individual feelings. Johnson and Hawkesworth, we receive with respect, and we dismiss with awe: we come from their writings as from public lectures, and from Addison's, as from private conversations.

In one of the British journals, we read, with great satisfaction, that a spirited emigrant among the faithful band of French royalists, in England, has gallantly defended his friends, and most contemptuously designated his foe.

Monsieur Tinceau, has published an "Apologie des Royalistes Emigrés contre le libel diffamatoire, publié sous le nom d'amnistie, par le nomme" Napoleone Buonaparte, alias, Buonaparte'e d'Ajaccio soi disant, Consul de France.

* This phrase, like that of cette homme là, may be described as the strongest sense in the contemptuous mode of French expression. If a mere English reader wish to have an adequate idea of its sarcastic import, we refer him to Dr. Johnson, who speaks of one Mrs. Macauley, and to Whitlock, who, with the lofty pride of a courtier of the first Charles, talks of one Milton, a blind man, and republican.

The Chevalier de Bilang, a Swede, has invented a machine, by means of which, a person may swim, or least direct himself on the water, without the least danger. The king of Sweden has granted the inventor, a gratuity of two thousand rix dollars, and the exclusive privilege of selling his machine, during twenty-five years,

A composition has been recently discovered, in France, that will effectually prevent iron, steel, &c. from rusting. This method consists in mixing with fat, oil, varnish, four-fifths of well-rectified spirits of turpentine. The varnish is to be applied, by means of a sponge. Articles varnished in this manner, will retain their metallic brilliancy, and never contract any sort of rust. It may be applicable to copper, and to the preservation of philosophical instruments, which, by being brought into contact with water, are liable to lose their splendor, and to become tarnished.

M. Buschenderf has invented a press for packing all kinds of goods with expedition. It is cheap, easily worked, occupies little room, and is calculated to save the expense of metal vices, which are apt to swell with humidity; the operation being performed by the action of a lever, the power of which, may be easily augmented.

TO MISS—, WEeping.

Oh! if your tears are given to care,
If real woe distress your peace,
Come to my bosom, weeping fair,
And I will bid your weeping cease.

But, if with fancy's vision'd fears,
With dreams of woe your bosom thrill;
You look so lovely in your tears,
That I must bid you drop them still.

INSCRIPTION ON A JUTTING STONE, OVER A SPRING.

This sycamore, oft musical with bees,
(Such tents the patriarchs lov'd) O long unharm'd
May all its darksome boughs o'er canopy
The small round basin, which this jutting stone
Keeps pure from falling leaves! still may this spring
Quietly, as a sleeping infant's breath,
Send up cold water for the traveller
With soft and even pulse! Nor even cease
On tiny cone of sand its noiseless dance,
That at the bottom, like a fairy's page,
As merry, and no taller, dances still,
Nor wrinkles the smooth surface of the fount!
Here coolness dwell, and twilight. Here is moss,
A soft seat, and a deep and ample shade.
Thou may'st toil far, and find no second tree.
Here, stranger, drink! Here rest! And, if thy heart
Be innocent, here too may'st thou renew
Thy spirits, listening to these gentle sounds,
The passing gale, or ever murmur'ing bees.

ROSSTREVOR.

All you, who in scenes of wild grandeur delight,
Where nature and art both together endeavour
To furnish a treat for the traveller's sight—
Repair to the shore of romantic Rosstrevor.

Here are mountains, whose summits the skies proudly pierce,
While deep winding vallies their broad bases sever:
Even Prociis, that classical region of verse,
The Muses now own, could boast nought like Rosstrevor.

Arcadia! thy shades come my fancy across,
Where Pan, on his pipe, us'd so softly to quaver,
As I wander among the plantations of Ross,
And hear the sweet notes of the nymphs of Rosstrevor.

In verdure, the vales here with Tempe may vie;
Purest streams through their bosom run murmuring ever,
Yielding shepherds and flocks an unfailing supply,
When drought has drank up all those of Rosstrevor.

Old Neptune, around his whole briny domain,
Ne'er trac'd out a lovelier landscape—no, never!
On the banks of the Tiber, the Thames, or the Seine,
Taste finds no retreat to compare with Rosstrevor.

'Tis the fav'rite abode of the Goddess of Health;
From its precincts fly sickness, infection and fever;
Youth, beauty, and fashion, age, wisdom, and wealth,
Resort to the life-cheering shores of Rosstrevor.

Methinks now some saturnine miser I hear,
With a sneer, cry, 'All this, to be sure, 's very clever,
But diet and lodging, I'm told, there are dear;—
Stay at home, wretch! and starve—let me feast at Rosstrevor.

AN ADDRESS TO HEALTH.

Hail to thee, Goddess of the sprightly train!
Source of all ease, and antidote to pain:
Whether thou wand'rest on the northern hills,
Or in the vallies dwells't by purling rills,
Or whether, tir'd of fam'd Britannia's fogs,
Green Erin's swamps, and widely-spreading bogs;
Thou'st ta'en thy flight to fair Italian plains,
'Midst citron groves ne'er drench'd by falling rains;
Where summer suns ne'er cease to warm the soil,
And fruitful crops reward the labourer's toil:
Or whether, cross the broad Atlantic frown,
To ease the horrors of the rising town,
Whatever distant course thy flight pursues,
I pray thee listen to my humble Muse.
(The first weak essay of her feeble pen,
Which, urg'd by thee, shall bolder notes attain)
For lo! on yonder silken couch reclin'd,
(With beauty grac'd and loveliness of mind)
A maiden lies, oppress'd with carking care,
And all the ills which its attendants are.
Those eyes that erst the morning star outshone,
Alas! how chang'd—their lustre all is gone.
The cheek, with dimpling smiles once sweetly grac'd,
Where the moss-rose it's choicest colours plac'd.
Now feels the sad effects of thy delay,
And cries, with potent voice, Oh! haste away.
For there the lily, pride of lowly vales,
Her empire holds, preserv'd by sighs and wails;
And, if from thee, or some kind pitying pow'r,
Relief's not given, swift comes the last sad hour.
When her pure soul shall speed its way above,
Into the realms of purest joy and love.
Then fly, Oh, Goddess! from yon distant plains,
And use that skill, which ev'ry effort gains;
So shall thy praise be sung from morn till night,
By maids and youths, in strains for ever bright.

Among the number of names one meets with in the Metropolis, that are professionally appropriate to the avocation of their owners, not the least striking are the following:—In Smithfield, a multifarious professor sports the inscription of 'Catchpole, hair-dresser, peruke-maker, and undertaker. In Clerkenwell-green, we meet the sign-board of 'J. Grammer's Academy.' In Dyott-street, St. Giles's, a professor of the sable robe announces his avocation by 'Chimnies swept, and night-work performed here, by Timothy Brush.' A window near Clare-market exhibits a label, inscribed 'Thomas Swift, portering and messages performed here;' and an Hibernian lady, who keeps an Ovarium in High-street, St. Giles's, writes up, 'Fresh eggs every day, by me, Catharine Cluck;' and in High-street, in the Borough, an active agent of the law designates his residence by the words 'Grip, Officer to the Sheriffs of Kent.'

[Lon. paper.]

In his preface to his "History of the Earth," GOLDSMITH has written a paragraph, which has all the easy graces of his manner.

The ancients, Pliny, in particular, have anticipated me, in my manner of treating natural history. Like those historians, who describe the eve of a campaign, they have not condescended to give the private particulars of every individual, that formed the army. They were content with characterising the generals, and prescribing their operations, while they left it to meaner hands, to carry the muster-roll.

It has been candidly remarked by a British tourist through a portion of America that 'The English bewail the want of convenient taverns in the United States; but the complaint is groundless. For I have found taverns in the woods of America, not inferior to those of the common market-towns in England.'

Can I again that form caress,
Or on that lip in rapture twine?
No, no! the lip that all may press,
Shall never more be press'd by mine.

Can I again that look recall,
Which once could make me die for thee?
No, no! the eye that burns on all,
Shall never more, be priz'd by me!

Look, in my eyes my blushing fair,
Thoult see thyself reflected there;
And, as I gaze on thine, I see
Two little miniatures of me.

Press the grape and let it pour,
Around the board the purple shower;
And while the drops my goblet steep,
I'll think in woe the clusters weep.

Weep on, weep on, my pouting vine!
Heaven grant no tears, but tears of wine;
Weep on, and as thy sorrows flow,
I'll taste the luxury of woe.

A Cynical correspondent regrets that ladies who know so well how to charm, should not, in general, spell better.

THE NAME UNKNOWN.

Imitated from Klopstock's ode to his future

By THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ. AUTHOR OF "THE PLEASURES OF HOPE."

Prophetic Pencil, wilt thou trace
A faithful image of the Face;
Or, wilt thou write the NAME UNKNOWN
Ordain'd to rule my charmed Soul,
And all my future Fate controul
Unrival'd and alone?

Delicious Idol of my Thought!
Tho' Sylph or Spirit never taught
My boding heart thy precious Name;
Yet, musing on my distant fate,
To CHARMS UNSEEN I consecrate
A visionary flame!

Thy rosy blush and meaning eye,
Thy virgin voice of melody,
Are ever present to my heart;
Thy murmur'd Vows shall yet be mine,
My thrilling hand shall meet with thine,
And never—never part!

Then fly, my days, on rapid wing,
Till love the viewless treasure bring;
While I, like conscious Athens, own
A power in mystic silence seal'd,
A guardian angel unveil'd—
And bless the Name Unknown!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'Climenole' has arrived in safety, with unviolated seals, a very singular circumstance in the moral and entertaining history of our truly admirable, honest, and efficient government.

In answer to the curiosity of some, and the friendly care of others, we are desired by Mr. SAUNTER to state that the AMERICAN LOUNGER will shortly resume the easy exercise of his careless vocation. The temporary suspension of that paper, has been caused by the duty we owe to correspondents, of a higher character, than an idler, whose province is to be neither politic, nor grave; but whose page is desultory, and whose talk is prattle.

SONNETS,

BY MISS BANNERMAN, NEVER BEFORE PUBLISHED.

SONNET I.

* When the first beams of morn illumine the sky,
"To day I see her," and I hail the sun,
"To day I see her," and the moments run,
And life, and time, and all, unheeded fly.

O how I grasp delusions!—form again
The frantic hopes my firmer mind denies:
I see but her in earth, in air, and skies!
I feel but her in all my burning brain!

Then, as I think upon the woes to come,
Bereav'd of comfort, how I hate the day,
Tears, from a heart of anguish, force their way,
And oft I wish to make the grave my home;
To drink the bitter cup, while yet I may,
Before my strength is gone, and all my powers decay.

SONNET II.

† Is this sad heart, so cold and vacant, mine?
Enchanting scenes, I know you now no more!
The soft stream winds beneath th' o'erhanging pine;
Ye shine in summer pride, but mine is o'er.

O could I place my woes in louring skies,
In dismal seasons, or capricious care;
In the wild whirl ambitious strife supplies,
My lighten'd heart might breathe in freest air.

Wretch that I am! this bosom once so blest,
Contains the poison which consumes its peace;
In vain I stretch my arms, and seek for rest:
Dark clouds surround, forbidding all release:
Yes! I must fill the measure of my woes,
And then I find the road that leads me to repose.

SONNET III.

‡ Where is that sentiment which warm'd my breast!
That pour'd around me torrents of delight,
That brought all Paradise before my sight,
And wrapt my soul in visions of the blest!

How often has the wandering sea-bird's flight
Across the vast, unfathomable deep,
Through living waters, and immortal light,
Borne my free spirit in its rapid sweep,

To taste beatitude where raptures flow!
O how the heart is chang'd! for blissful dreams
Of life eternal! dim before me gleams
The deep and fathomless abyss of woe;
Where, hurried headlong through the blackening wave,
Or dash'd upon the rocks, I soon must find my grave.

THE TOUT-ENSEMBLE.

You wonder what it is I find
In Nancy, that I love her,
And why I am so very blind
To many girls above her;

* As soon as I opened my window this morning, I said, "To day I shall see her," and I calmly looked on the sun.

† Nature displays all her beauties before me, exhibits the most enchanting scenes, and my heart is unmoved.

‡ That ardent sentiment which animated my heart with the love of nature, which poured in upon me a torrent of light, which brought all paradise before me, is now me an insupportable torment.

Wetter, Let. 41.

You tell me that her shape is bad,
Her face is reckon'd homely,
And not a feature that she had,
Could be accounted comely.

I much regret that there should be
Such different tastes between us;
She's not an angel, I agree,
Nor is she quite a Venus.

But there is something in her air,
That greatly hits my fancy,
'Tis not her face, her shape, or hair,
But 'tis the whole of Nancy.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

I send you a copy of some lines, lately written by a friend in ill health, and from this and other causes, greatly depressed in spirits. He is now no more, and though this effusion may not, by the world, be considered to have merit, yet the contrast it exhibits, and which is drawn as it was felt, induces me to wish it preserved.

You will, however, give it a place in the Port Folio, or not, as you shall judge proper.

A. B.

The man whom heaven has blest with wealth,
With vigorous nerves and glowing health,
In life's dull round, alert and gay,
May jocund pass the hours away.
Gay frolic dreams are his at night,
And morning calls him to delight.
Ambrosial dews on zephyrs borne,
Make sweet to him the breath of morn.
'Tis for his use the verdant field
And fragrant earth their perfume yield:
The gems of Heaven more brilliant shine
On him who owns the golden mine.

His easy path of life is strew'd
With verdure gay throughout the road:
Elate, his raptur'd eyes survey
The countless pleasures in his way.
Where'er he walks, obsequious love
Attendant on his steps shall move.
Love lights his torch at Pleasure's shrine;
His golden lamp is from the mine.
From clime to clime, where'er he roam,
To him the world's a spacious home;
Delight, in all her varied charms,
Still fondly courts him to her arms.

Not so with him whom adverse fate
Pursues with unrelenting hate,
On whose devoted head is pour'd
The chastening phial of the Lord.
No morning's bloom to him is fair,
No nights, but close in sad despair;
'Tis not for him that Zephyr greets
The early morn with Flora's sweets
'Tis not for him the cheerful note
Of feather'd choirs in ether float,
The fragrant earth, the gems of heav'n,
Are not for his enjoyment given.

Thro' the wide world's extended Zone,
No chamber can he call his own;
Love in his walk is never found,
For poverty usurps the ground:
Love's soft and downy pinions ne'er
Can soar, if burden'd with a tear.

No pleasures call him to advance
And join the sprightly merry dance.
No glowing hopes his soul illumine,
Within is dark and endless gloom;
In vain the sufferer tries to find,
Some solace for his wounded mind:

Where'er he turns his aching eyes,
Through life's rough road, new sorrows rise.
If he has former scenes enjoy'd,
The world is now one tasteless void;
And memory's delusive dream,
Turns pleasures past to pain supreme.

Mr. OLDSCHOOL,

Twenty gentlemen, on the 26th of January, 1803, dined together, in the cottage where BURNS was born in order that they might gratefully celebrate the birthday of the poet. The following Ballad was composed on the occasion, by the Reverend Hamilton Paul.

Let others enamour'd of seasons more gay,
Their harps to the primrose of April attune;
Let them carol the sweets of the lily rob'd May,
Or garnish their lays with the rose-buds of June.

Not the season of beauty, the prime of the year,
So charming, so lovely to me can appear,
As the day, when the poet to Scotia so dear,
First open'd his eyes on the banks of the Doon.

O that the lov'd bard, e'er his spirit was flown,
E'er he bade a short life of misfortune adieu,
Wide over my shoulders his mantle had thrown:
I'd have breath'd a strain worthy of him and of you;

But alas! cold forever's the soul kindling fire,
Mute the tongue that could captivate, ravish,
inspire,

While the hands of the feeble awaken the lyre
And the muses sigh out, "our adorers are flown."
Yet duly will we, as this season returns,

With joy to the lonely roof'd cottage repair;
And as we pour out a libation to Burns,
Will toast the sweet dames of the Doon and the Ayre.

And sing till each river his woodlands among,
Bid his rocks and his caverns re-echo the song,
And the winds, on their wings, waft, delighted along,

Our esteem for the Bard, and our love to the Fair.

LINES

To a beautiful little Girl, of four years old, sitting in her Baby-House, surrounded by her Playthings.

BY MRS MOODY.

Little queen of infant pleasure
Smiling on thy seat of treasure;
Happy in each fancied blessing,
More than Monarchs worlds possessing,
Culling sweet from every rose,
That in thy fairy garden grows;
Thy breast as yet untaught by sighs
To check the transports as they rise.
No dread thy little bosom fills
Of physical or moral ills;
With pure delight, thy eye surveys
The splendid toys that round thee blaze;
Nor could a richer joy be thine
Did all Potosi yield her mine;
Thy tiny cup of silver, brings
A sweeter draught than cups of kings;
The doll for whom thy love prepares,
These emblems of maternal cares,
For whom this little board is spread,
For whom thou deck'd this little bed
Obedient to thy magic wand
Still eats and sleeps at thy command;
And tho' thou play'st the mother's part;
No mother's pangs corrode thy heart.
Oh! ever might thy future years
Be thus exempt from hopes and fears;
Thus, with smooth current glide away,
While beams of joy thus round thee play;
But thou a blended lot must share,
And with the blessing take the care.
Then, lovely Mary, hug thy toys,
Unsullied source of infant joys!
And, while thou cans't, the pleasure keep,
To lull thy waxen babe asleep.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. LXXVIX.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

A foreigner has remarked of the people of the United States, that they succeed well as public speakers. If this remark be true, the American will hear with satisfaction, that, while in most of the improvements which advance the reputation of a people, his countrymen boast not a pre-eminence, they have received from an intelligent observer, the praise of excelling in one of the noblest attributes conferred upon man.

There exist in the United States causes for the general cultivation of talents for public speaking, that are not to be found in any other modern country. The extremely popular cast of the government, by holding out to every class and condition of people, hopes of preferment, disposes them to a zealous interference with subjects of public concern. Political animosity is a fruitful source of oral contention. Spirited dialogues, and declamatory harangues, precede the contests at our frequent elections, and, where the collision of adversaries is suspended, warmth of feeling is moderated, and the heat of strife allayed, by friendly communications among political adherents. The legislatures of seventeen independent states, are so many different schools in which parliamentary faculties may be exercised and improved, while the national congress is open to those who court, in the walks of eloquence, a more diffuse and exalted reputation. The popular features in our civil codes, lend their aid in the formation of the speaker. Gain and honour recompense the exertions of the able advocate, and the tribunals of justice in every district of an extensive country, present to us theatres of Forensic disputation.

It may perhaps be affirmed, that since the days of Athens, there have been no people among whom oratory has flourished as it has done among the people of the American states. From this remark we must exclude that high perfection in the art of speaking, reached by a few illustrious individuals, where, in the full growth of a nation, powerful abilities have been exerted upon objects higher and more animating than occur in the earlier periods of any state. We have not yet, to use the words of an Irish orator, heard 'the torrent of Demosthenes,' or seen in our senates, 'the splendid conflagration of Tully.' Nor, do we aspire to a rivalry of that exquisite polish, which, in several prominent instances, has distinguished the annals of British eloquence. The refinements of rhetoric, and the decorations of classical embellishment, are not the usual recommendations of our public speeches. But, in that rank of oratory, which, although respectable, is not the most exalted, which pleases without often dazzling, and excites admiration more frequently than astonishment, the Americans have eminently excelled.

The historian of our revolution in speaking of the Congress that first assembled upon the dispute between the mother country, and her colonies has made the number of able speakers who were members of it, an object of particular notice. In their deliberations upon subjects of the greatest magnitude, then, for the first time, presented to them, abilities were displayed which might have reflected credit upon the national councils of older and more experienced states. Throughout the revolution, each member of the confederacy, continued to supply deputies, who became eloquent defenders of the American cause. The speeches delivered in the convention, that framed the federal constitution, have never been preserved, but the testimony of those who heard them, as well as our knowledge of the distinguished men, who sat in that body, instruct us to believe they exhibited specimens of powerful oratory. We are in possession of the discussions of the constitution had in the conventions of the different states, and the ample investigation they give to every part of that instrument, sufficiently attest how generally diffused and of how respectable a character was the talent for public speaking.

During the few years in which our present government has been in operation, many questions of great national moment, have employed the attention of the legislators of our country. In the discussion of these questions, rival delegates from every part of the union, have engaged in a contest for pre-eminence, and, the assertion may be hazarded that a large proportion of them have uttered their opinions, and enforced their arguments, in strains of impressive and dignified eloquence. The House of Representatives of the United States, has probably had in it during the last ten years, a greater number of public speakers than have appeared in any national assembly of Europe, in the same period of time. This fact, if it be one, is the more favourable to American oratory, when it is recollected of how few members the House of Representatives has consisted, and that our country has been in a state of comparative exemption from those alarming conjunctures, which have an effect to excite the feelings, and give fresh activity, to the mental vigour of a people.

Reflections like the above, offer inducements to the emulous and aspiring to cultivate an art, that seems to flourish well among us. Let not a view of the extensive qualifications that combine in the orator, deter any from attempting their acquisition. The character when reached is of that high kind, which seems to terminate the endeavours of enterprize, and satisfy the expectations of generous ambition. The powers of the human mind, can hardly appear under a form more captivating than in a speaker on the floor of an enlightened assembly, intent upon some question of high national interest, unfolding with luminous comprehension its nature and consequences, and with the arts of philology, and the lights of political wisdom imparting to others, his own convictions. Such high ideas of honour and advantage did the ancients connect with the art of declamation, that it was taught among them by public professors, and the orator was formed by the same course of previous discipline, that other professions are thought to require. Their attention to it was marked by an anxiety, that sought the ultimate perfection of the art. It was an usual prayer with Pericles, before he rose to address a public assembly, 'that in the hurry of delivery, no word might fall from him, which could offend an Athenian ear.' To those who look for eminence in the Senate, or the forum, an attention to the arts of speaking is among the indispensable prerequisites to success. Let all such therefore, have a proper sensibility to the high importance of their aims, and cultivate elocution, until excellence in it shall constitute the praise and become the acknowledged characteristic of the American people.

MARCELLUS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CLASSICAL LITERATURE.

In the second book of the Punicks, the interest of the reader is considerably excited; after the siege of Sagunthum, the Legates from Rome appear before Hannibal—at the head of this important embassy suing peace in behalf of the Sagunthines, the Roman Fabius presents himself—to them Hannibal addresses the following speech.

'Tis past, he cries, ye sons of peace, forbear
To talk of treaties 'mid the noise of war;
Now in the clangour of the trumpets sound,
And dying groans all softer notes are drown'd;
Hence, while you may, ner to the half-won town
Too rashly trusting, make her fate your own;
Too well the license of the sword you know,
Once flush'd with slaughter on a yielding foe.

Among the Carthaginians, appears a female warrior, who is thus described.

With Afric's sons whose garments flow, unbound,
A motley race for breach of faith renown'd,
A female warrior to the fields of fame,
Hlyarbas' blood, the bold Hasbte came;

From Ammon thus the warrior princes came,
And in his groves invoc'd her grandsire's name;
Pure from the pleasures of the genial bed,
In woods and wilds her youthful years she led;
No spinstress arts she knew, nor female toys;
But sports of labour, and more manly joys:
Diana-like, the chase was her delight,
The straining courser, and the game in sight.

A net of gold confin'd her flowing hair,
Her right arm, active for the fight, was bare;
Her left she guarded with the shining shield,
An Amazonian pelt, that glirr'd thro' the field.

Proud in her steeds and glittering in the van,
As on a neighbouring mole with speed they ran,
Frequent she lodg'd impell'd with matchless might
Her quivering javelins on the turrets height.
This Mopsus saw, and could no longer bear
The fierce approaches of the virgin's spear;
High on the walls enrag'd his bow he drew,
Loud sung the string; each feather'd weapon slew

A stranger he, and born in distant Crete,
Where the Curetes their loud cymbals beat,
His long laborious days in forests led,
An expert huntsman from his cradle bred;
Of did he fetch the falcon from the sky;
Of when the nimbler game his toils would fly,
So true his bowstring sped his fatal darts,
At once they heard it hiss, and felt them in their hearts;
Nor Crete, tho' rival of the Parthian bow,
An arm so vigorous, and so sure could shew;
At length past labour, friendless, old, and poor,
Forc'd by his wants to quit his native shore,
He, wife, and sons, a small, inglorious train,
Fate urg'd them forward, reach'd Sagunthum's plain.
His sons, their quivers cross their shoulders ty'd,
Beside him each his bow with shafts supply'd;
And as far shooting from the walls he stood,
Each Cretan arrow drank some Lybian's blood:
Gramus and Tyhrrus eager to engage;
Gisco, and gentle Bagas felt his rage;
His bearded arrow pierced young Lycus' heart;
Unhappy he to meet so sure a dart.

Mopsus then aims a shaft at the Lybian Amazon; Harpe, a female attendant rushes between them, receives the arrow, and falls in the arms of her queen.

Her falling in her arms the queen receives,
And o'er her dying lov'd companion grieves;
Then fir'd with vengeance to the rampart springs,
And at the foe her angry javelin flings.
Just then young Dorilas a shaft had set
Drawn to the head; the bows tough horns had met;
Whirl'd with what vigour passion could impart,
His sinewy shoulder felt the rapid dart;
With nerves relax'd he drops his useless bow,
And tumbles headlong on the plain below,
Revers'd his quiver pouring on the ground
Its shafts, that glitter'd, as he fell, around.
His brother's fate, sad Icarus survey'd,
And mov'd with clamour to revenge the dead;
But him preventing, as a shaft he drew,
The leader with a rock's rough fragment slew;
Fainting he falls, the freezing hand of death
Chill'd his pale limbs, and choak'd his struggling breath;
His hand no longer can its hold retain;
But in the quiver drops the shaft again.

Mopsus thus seeing both his sons slain, one by Hasbte, the other by Hannibal, flings himself from the wall in despair. Theron then appears.

Theron attended with a gallant train,
Rush'd from the gate, and battled on the plain;
No common arms the brawny warrior knew;
Nor lifted lance he pois'd, nor sword he drew;
No plaited corslet his broad breast o'erspread;
No crested helmet nodded o'er his head;
But far before him with resistless might,
Swung a huge club, and broke the ranks of fight
A lion's shaggy hide his shoulders bore;
Rose o'er his front the jaws, and grinn'd before;
His shields device the sevenfold Hydra stood,
Sprouting with monsters on a field of blood.

Theron after destroying several Carthaginians, who were distinguished in the fight, meets Hasbte.

Now plunging in the press, fierce Theron fought;
The watchful virgin saw, and turning sought
The fight; and aiming for a deadly blow,
Full at the forehead of her dauntless foe,
Her two-edg'd ax to thee, Dictynna, pray'd
And vow'd the trophies of the warrior dead;
Nor he inspir'd with equal thirst of fame
Less ardent to the glorious combat came,
And, as advancing with his lifted shield,
He strided tow'ring thro' the mingled field,
His lion's grinning jaws distain'd with blood,
Full at the faces of the coursers shew'd,
Who seiz'd with fright, and restive to the rein
O'erturn the tumbling chariot on the plain:
To quit the field by flight Hasbte tries;
The fatal club arrests her, as she flies;
Full on her front descends the forceful stroke;
Spouts the black gore; the crackling skull is broke;
Beside her car she sinks; th' entangled reins,
Are sprinkled o'er with mingled blood and brains.

Blind to his fate, and with no God to friend,
Thus toil'd bold Theron drawing near his end;
For Hannibal now swift to combat came;
His voice spoke thunder, and his eyes shot flame.

At the approach of Hannibal, the Sagunthines in dread terror fly before him; Theron thus addresses the fugitives.

Oh turn, he cries, your hasty fears resign;
The glorious danger of this foe be mine;
Turn but spectators of the fight; this hand
Shall drive the Punick general from the land;
Or if, Oh shame to arms! you dare not see
Unbous'd the combat, shut your gates on me.

Theron is killed by Hannibal, which concludes the engagement. The Roman legates arriving at Carthage, the Senate meet; Hanno declares for, and Gestar against satisfying the Romans; Fabius insists on a positive declaration of peace or war immediately. The translator makes the following observations on this important debate.

The strong and beautiful contrast between these two speeches of Hanno and Gestar, in the Carthaginian Senate, is drawn with a justness and loftiness of sentiment, and style suitable to the dignity of the personages speaking, and to the importance of the subject spoken on. When Hanno to recommend himself to his audience, declares that he will speak for his country though he dies for it; Gestar to take off the favour such a patriotic resolution might gain him, tells him he speaks like a Roman, and an enemy, insinuating he is conscious he deserves that death, he seems apprehensive of: Hanno to deter Carthage from the war, says, the Romans are more than men; I have seen them, he says, tear the javelin from their body, and strike it in the enemy's heart; I have seen, says Gestar to encourage to the war, Regulus the Roman general taken prisoner, dragged in chains, flung in a dungeon, and dying on a gibbet: The Romans are bred soldiers from their birth, says Hanno; ours are the same, says Gestar; but look at young Hannibal, who already rivals the god Hercules in passing the Alps; the conclusion is equally noble; Hanno says, he saves them a sea of blood; Gestar replies, they will pour out all their blood, they will die rather than not live free.

The close of Gestar's speech, exhibits the warmth and eloquence, which characterises every line from the commencement.

Behold, our matchless leader, and adore;
His tongue's first accent was the oath he swore;
An infant he was known with sword and fire,
To vow Rome's fate, and meditate his sire;
And in thy sight, if thou dare view the deed,
Now in his turn, shall make Rome's mightiest bleed;
Then, then let Alps on Appenines arise,
A growing rampart till they reach the skies;
His matchless vigour thro' those Alps shall break;
To gall thee, wretch, the boastful vaunt I make,
Those Alps, those skes shall be the hero's road;
Where great Alcides first victorious trod,
The dreadful pass, shall Hannibal despair,
At once to second and outshine him there!
But Hanno bids us quit the glorious strife,
And tamely give up liberty for life;
Recounts the slaughters, Lybia felt before;
Improves on each, and still denounces more;
Wretch as he is, himself may wave that fear;
Skulk like a girl at home, and tremble there;
We, we are fix'd the Rome's own Jove oppose,
To force our freedom from our haughty foes;
Or, if the fates the great attempt withstand,
And Mars has quitted this devoted land,
We'll die, my country, e'er proud Rome shall be
To us a tyrant, or a lord to thee:
For what demands have her bold legates bore?
And what can lords, or what can tyrants more?
Disband your forces, quit Sagunthum's plain,
And burn your navies, and renounce the main;
Ye Gods! if Carthage may your pity claim,
Look down, and save her from so foul a shame;
Free from the Romans, and his threatened fate
Preserve our leader, and in him the state.

War is proclaimed, and Fabius returns to Rome; Hannibal, the while taking the country about Sagunthum, is presented by the Galicians with a suit of armour, which is described; then turning, he presses the seige, and the Sagunthines almost famished, the goddess Faith, at the instance of Hercules patron of the city, conveys herself into it, and inspires them still to hold out, which Juno observing from the Carthaginian camp, applies to the fury Alecto.

Thus toil'd the watchful Juno for their fall,
And forc'd the fiercest fury to their wall;
At whose approach the mount was heard to roar;
The waves beat hoarser on the hollow shore,
From round her bloated neck fell serpents rise;
Uncurl their folds, and hiss against the skies—

The changing monster, now at once forsakes
Her own foul figure, and Tyburnus' takes;
Lost in the storm of war her Murrus dead,
She wept reliefless in a widow'd bed;

The guileful goddess bursts into the crowd,
All frantic, furious, and thus cries aloud.
Ye wrathful powers what further is design'd?
What end must we, must faith and virtue find?
Murrus I saw; how dreadful to behold!
How sad his look! and what a tale he told!
Ghastly and pale, and cover'd o'er with blood
Before my eyes the mournful spectre stood;
He stood and call'd, Tyburna hence away;
This wretched city fails the victor's prey;
'Scape if thou can'st, or at Elizium's shore
Come, meet thy Murrus, and we part no more:
'Tis past; our gods, our town, our people fall;
The Punick sword surrounds and conquers all.
My soul still shudders with the vast alight;
Still the pale vision swims before my sight.
Murrus thrice happy of thy fate to see,
Thy town untaken, and thy country free!
While we a poor, defenceless, friendless band
Must serve our tyrants in a foreign land;
And lay at last when life's last scene is o'er,
Our captive corpses on the Punick shore;
But you, who scorn your freeborn necks to bow,
And death an end of ev'ry sorrow know,
Illustrious youths, we claim it at your hand,
O save your matrons from a lord's command;
Virtue thro' peril must to fame aspire;
Then snatch a fame, the world can but admire.

The fury Alecto drives them to such a madness of rage and despair, that they burn the city, and themselves in it, to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy; the description of their sad disasters is very moving and highly picturesque.

At once all social, sweet remembrance fled,
The nuptial converse, and the blissful bed;
With fiercer passions their rack'd souls are toss'd
And ev'ry tender thought of love is lost.
Where thick and fast the gathering vapours throw,
Their curling columns, and ascending glow,
One drags in strength of rage a feeble sire,
And hurls him helpless on the kindling pyre:
To save his parent from the Lybian dart,
A cruel pity wrapt Tymbrenus' heart;
Not that dear form, which his own image bears,
And every feature of himself, he spares;
Thou too Eurymedon, thy parent's pride,
And thou Lycornas, blooming brethren died;
So like their stature, shape, and voice, and look,
Oft the pleas'd mother each for each mistook.

What tragic end this faithful state befel,
No human tongue without a tear can tell,
The monstrous ills, their dreadful virtue bore
Ev'n Punicks wept, who never wept before:
This city ever fam'd for faith, that told
The founder of her walls with gods enroll'd,
The Punick fraud, her own relentless rage;
And heaven and hell to force her fate engage.
What the wide waste of sword, and fire would spare,
Her own fell fury spoils, and slaughters there;
Thick from the pile, the rolling vapours rise,
And lift their sable volumes from the skies;
The mount-built Citadel, from whence were seen,
The shores, the Punick tents, and town between,
This sacred tow'r untouched by wars before
And temples of the gods, the flames devour;
The brightening fire the region wide displays,
Old ocean trembles with the quivering blaze.
Amid this carnage, lo! with dismal cries
To Marcus' tomb the sad Tyburna flies;
His shining faction fill'd her better hand,
And in her left she grasp'd a flaming brand;
Loose was her dress, dishevell'd was her hair;
Nude were her arms, her livid bosom bare;
When in the dreary kingdom of the graves,
Hell's early monarch, Stygian Pluto raves,

Less fury-like Alectos self appears;
Drives the pale ghosts, and thunders in their ears.
The hero's armour on his tomb now laid,
Each mournful relic she with tears survey'd;
Then kindled with her torch a blaze around,
And paid his manes with a dreadful sound.
Lo, these, the best, the last, thy wife can give,
The gift and giver, best of men receive;
She said, and with a mortal fury fir'd
Rush'd on the pile, and in the flames expir'd.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.
LIFE OF JOANNES SECUNDUS.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[In an Essay, prefixed to a translation of the Basia of Joannes Secundus, published at London, in the present year, are many notices of that agreeable author.—As I have never met with a connected history of his life, I have endeavoured to sketch a brief account of it from those notes. If you think it deserves a place in the Port Folio, you are welcome to publish it.

Joannes Secundus Hagensis, descended from an ancient and illustrious family in the Netherlands. His father, Nicolaus Everardus, was born near Middleburg, in Zealand, and is thence often stiled Middleburgensis. He was a man of great erudition, particularly in the science of the law, and possessed of every qualification necessary to complete a gentleman, or adorn a scholar. He became a favorite of the emperor Charles V. and was a member of the grand council of Mechelen, and president of the states of Holland and Zealand. He died at Mechelen, August 5th, 1532, aged 70.

Everardus left five sons, all distinguished by their talents; and three daughters. Peter Nicolaus, an ecclesiastic, doctor of divinity and the civil law, Everardus Nicolaus, president of Friesland and Mechelen, and knight of the golden fleece, Nicolaus Grudius Nicolaus, treasurer of Brabant, member of the privy council, knight and register of the order of the golden fleece, Hadrianus Marius Nicolaus, knight, member of the privy council, and high chancellor of Guelderland and Zutphen. Isabella Nicolaia became a nun, and it appears from an epistle of Secundus, that she had a fine taste in literature, and was capable of corresponding in Latin.—Of the other two daughters, we know nothing. It remains, that we should mention our poet, Joannes Secundus, who was born at the Hague, in 1511. In his early years, he prosecuted his studies under his father, who was the preceptor of all his children. His poetical vein soon discovered itself; for he is said to have commenced writing verses, at the age of ten years. When public duties deprived Everardus of the time necessary for instructing his children, Secundus, who was designed for the law, was committed to the care of Jacobus Volcardus, whose death he laments, in one of his Nania. Rumoldus Stenemola, succeeded as tutor to the young poet, who, in his works, bestows on him great commendations. The arts of Painting and Sculpture, shared with their sister Poetry, the attachment of Secundus, and love quickened his progress in them all. He carved his own family, his friends, the emperor, several persons of distinction, and his mistresses: To Julia, the first of them, he inscribed the first book of his Elégies. Being arrived at the age of twenty-one, he was sent to complete his professional studies, under the celebrated Andreas Alciatus, at Bourges, in France. Alciatus was not only a renowned civilian, but a polite scholar, and a poet, qualifications which not a little endeared him to his pupil. Having remained a year at Bourges, and taken his degrees, he returned to Mechelen, where he met with a misfortune, which, at his time of life, must have been severely felt. His mistress, Julia, who had first kindled the flame of love in his bosom, and inpride his flowing strains, had proved unfaithful, and was married to another. Venerilla consoled him for his loss, and, for a time, became the sovereign of his heart, and object of his verse. Her reign, however, proved short; for in the very year of his return from France, 1533, he went, with powerful recommendations into Spain, and was appointed secretary to cardinal Travera, archbishop of Toledo. Here it was, that he became enamoured of the beautiful, sprightly, but coquettish Nera, and here, probably, he wrote his Kisses, which he addressed to her. The fervid climate of Spain, disagreed with the constitution of Secundus, and caused a fever, which had nearly terminated his career; but his youth was opposed to disease, and finally prevailed.—In 1535, he accompanied the emperor Charles V. to the siege of Tunis, which was defended by the famous Barbarossa: But Phœbus or Venus, rather than Mars, seem to have presided over the birth of Secundus, for nothing is on record, of his martial achievements. Even his muse, accustomed only to sing love and the graces, was scared, by the din of arms, and he suffered entirely to escape him, so favorable an opportunity of celebrating the deeds of the emperor and his valiant attendants. On his return from Africa, he was sent, by the cardinal, on an embassy to Rome, to congratulate the pope on the success of the emperor's arms. But falling sick on the road, he returned to his native country, to recover his health. He next engaged, as secretary, to the bishop of Utrecht, and became so famous for his talents and for his learning, that he was sent for by the first protonotary of the emperor, to take charge of those Latin letters, which were to be signed by that prince's own hand. But death blasted all his budding prospects of future honor. Having gone to St. Amand, to meet his patron, the bishop of Utrecht, he was attacked by a violent fever, which, in five days after his arrival, put a final period to his labors and his expectations, on the 8th October, 1536, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. He was interred in the church of the Benedictine monastery, where a marble tomb has been erected to his memory. Thus perished, in the flower of his life, a youth, who, if we consider his country, and his years, and the works he has left us, deserves to rank among the highest in the list of modern poets. His sweet and impassioned lays, will make his memory endure as long as mankind shall continue to be animated by the most amiable of the passions, and as long as true taste shall be cultivated and admired.

Nicolaus Grudius and Hadrianus Marius, brothers of Secundus, were also elegant poets, as appears, not only from his testimony, but from some of their compositions, which remain to us. The Cymba Veneris of Marius, is a beautiful little piece.

None of the works of Secundus were published before his death; they have since passed through many editions; but are now extremely scarce. The following list of them, is taken from the edition of Scriverius.

“Series operum omnium quæ reperiri potuerunt.

Julia. Elegiarum liber I.

Amores. Elegiarum liber II.

Ad diversos. Elegiarum liber III.

Basia. Incomparabilis & divinus prorsus liber.

Epigrammata.

Odorum. Liber unus.

Epistolarum. Liber unus elegiaco.

Epistolarum. Liber alter heroico carmeni scriptus.

Funerum. Liber unus.

Sylva & Carminum Fragmenta.

Poemata—nonnulla Fratrum.

Itineraria. Secundi tria.

Epistolæ totidem soluta oratione.

The reputation of these works, has long been decided, by the unanimous suffrage of the learned.

The following critique from a French writer, is, probably, as correct and concise as any on the subject.

“This young poet has left us three books of elegies—one of epigrams—two of epistles—one of Sylva—one of Funera—one of gallant pieces; which he has entitled Basia; and some other poetical productions, belonging to neither of the foregoing classes.—These works prove that Secundus was possessed of a pleasing, delicate and lively imagination, which is the more remarkable, as he was born in a climate, which does not appear favorable to polite taste, so necessary to those who would distinguish themselves in elegant poetry. His genius, though extremely fertile, never produced any thing but what was excellent, and that with the utmost facility, and almost instantaneously. He is sweet, calm, and at the same time, perspicuous, in his elegies; delicately subtle in his epigrams; pleasingly noble in his lyric compositions; grave in his Funera, without pomp or bombast. In short, throughout all his works, we may pronounce his style, to be full, elegant and tender—and we may be assured, that had his leisure permitted him to undertake epic poetry, and improve himself in it, he would have excelled in that also: But his muse is somewhat too wanton.

CLIMENOLE.

A REVIEW, POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

NUMBER I.

Memorabilia democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full, and true account of that venerable science interspersed with anecdotes, characters and speeches of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats, by Slaveslap Kidnap, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651.

Washington printed by Samuel H. Smith for Duane, and Cheetham, and Adams, and F. Blake proprietors of the work.

A fatality, seems to attend all literary labours of the democrats in this country. For their works either never get to light entire, being miserably mutilated by the barbarous hands of as ignorant a set of editors as ever was the curse of any party, or they reach not beyond the jirk, of their printer's devils, falling, when this impulse is exhausted, by their natural tendency into filth, and oblivion; or else some envious friend conceals, or some bold enemy crushes the offspring of their brains, at its birth, and dooms it to eternal rest, without honours, and without epitaph. That the two first of these remarks are just any man may satisfy himself, who will take the trouble to inquire after the Aurora, the Chronicle, the Bee, or the Ægis, to which the labours of our democrats have chiefly been entrusted, and none of which he will find now in existence; except, perhaps, a few sheets, especially preserved to smoke under curling irons, or among the warm consecrations of the jakes; or for other like services, which the spongy and glutinous compositions of those papers, peculiarly qualify them to promote. The attempt to suppress Wood's history of the administration of Mr. Adams and its subsequent publication in so disfigured a state, are proofs that the jealous friends has not been less destructive to the interest of democratic science than the malignity of enemies. The work, I have now undertaken to review, is also a melancholy evidence of the same truth. Like that history it issued from the press about eighteen months since, under the patronage and with the universal expectation of the leaders of that party, and like it disappeared at once in a most mysterious manner. To what cause this suppression is to be attributed, whether the Federalists, as some say, in terror lest such ample testimonials of the talents and learning of their adversaries should go forth to the world, bribed the printer and got possession of the whole work, or whether, as is more probable, a certain great character, elated by his success in the affair of Wood's history, and jealous of the effect of this publication upon his projects, has performed this after peice, to his former tragedy, is not yet ascertained. But matters are in train, for this purpose and the result shall be laid before the public, hereafter, with all that strict regard for truth, which ought to be the study of every one who undertakes to write for its instruction.

With respect to the origin and general design of the work, under review, I cannot satisfy the curiosity of the public better, than by an extract or two from the author's preface; in which he states his motives at large, and also enters into some personal considerations, that throw an interest into the work, which a mere systematic development of his purpose would not have given. The preface bears date 'Washington 23d. January 1802.' And after stating the exertions, made by the author for Mr. Jefferson's election, and the promises he had received from him, thus proceeds.

'Having been buoyed up so long a time by such flattering hopes, I could ill endure my chagrin when I saw the Secretary ship of state, of war, and of the Treasury and other great, or lucrative offices, bestowed upon men of our party, and my services forgotten. I had thoughts, as some flaming democrats had already done, of turning Federalist upon the occasion. But the necessities of my family being pressing, I thought it more prudent to set out for Washington and on the spot, to remind Mr. Jefferson of his obligations to provide for me, now it was in his power. Those, who are acquainted with me, will not, I am sure, think that I rate myself at too high a value; as they know I was the leader, and the loudest of those patriots, who, at the races, at cockfights and whisky bouts, gave such essential support to his cause throughout the whole ancient dominion. Besides, although my estate be under mortgage, yet as I own, in my own right, one hundred negroes, my national influence, is nearly of one sixth more weight than that of any single democrat East of the Hudson, as any man may calculate, who will consider by the principles of the constitution the results of the last enumeration. Upon my arrival at this city, I immediately waited on Mr. Jefferson, intending to explain to him as delicately, as I could, the causes of my journey, and discontent. That great man, with that singular sagacity which distinguishes him, saw, before I spoke, the burden, which oppressed my spirits, and taking me by the hand into a private room, entered, in the most frank manner, into an explanation of the difficulties in which he was enveloped; bursting forth into those oaths, and passionate exclamations, which are the natural language of distress, and which soon caused all personal considerations to be lost, in pity for my friend. I found him as he expressed himself 'worried with such a numerous pack of greedy expectants, flying, with open mouths, at every office, and deaths being few, and resignations none, under daily fears of being torn to peices, in the paroxysms of rage, into which some were thrown by hunger and disappointment.' All hopes of personal preferment being thus lost, for the present, I looked about as becomes a good citizen to find, or make an opportunity to do some essential service to my friend and country. During my hours of leisure at Washington. I had not done this long before I was struck with the lamentable ignorance of our whole party concerning the origin and genius and history of democracy. Great doubts, and frequent bickerings upon these topics, happening at almost every private meeting of the majority in congress. On one occasion I well recollect a very warm debate occurred upon the question, whether democracy was a late invention; some contending that it was never discovered until the French, or at farthest, the American revolution; others, and those the most learned, insisting that much of its true spirit appeared about the time of one Cromwell, a patriot in their opinion, enriched with a genuine democratic tincture. Col. Varnum ended this dispute by observing, that all he knew about Cromwell, he learnt when he attended general court at Boston and lived at the sign of his head in Court street. From all he could gather, he was an Englishman, who lived about fifty years ago, and who, as the Col. expressed himself 'when a king was to be killed, always took care to have a finger in the pie.' 'But for my part' continued he 'I do not like this running to England after precedents. It is imitating the Federalists. I am against all examples, which are not to be found in our country.' At another time a question arose after supper at Stills, whether the term democracy was an American, or foreign manufacture; and how it was derived. Mr. Gallatin said that it was of French origin, as any one might be convinced, who would look into Cham-bauds dictionary, where he will find 'democratic—government populaire.—democracy.' 'Now' said Mr. Gallatin 'as the French words comes before the English, it is very obvious the latter must be derived from it; for in all etymological inquiries it is a principle that what is first can never be derived from that which is last, but that the probability is very strong, that the latter is from the former. Besides as the 'ie' so easily slides into y 'this alteration can hardly be deemed a change, and as to the adoption of c instead of t it is in strict conformity to the genius of the English language which is always hissing with s and c soft.' An evil, he added, he hoped it would be soon in his power to remedy; as he had no doubt that after his countrymen had fixed themselves in Louisiana, the French would become the national language in the United States. An event, which would be highly propitious to him, as no tongue could tell the difficulties he met with, in writing his reports in the present barbarous idiom. The member from Boston declared that he differed from the Secretary of the Treasury, and said that he would never yield the point, that the town, he had the honour to represent, was the native place of democracy; that he remembered it long before he knew such a nation as France had a being, and recollected it as a term of great power, when he was a boy and used to fight on Pope nights, in the streets, for the North Pope, against the South Pope. Mr. Giles said that he had always understood that the word 'democrat' was taken from the Virginia aboriginals; that he well remembered hearing Mr. Jefferson say it was a term of the Monacan tribe, who inhabited about the falls of James' river, and in their tongue signified 'a great tobacco planter, who had herds of black slaves.'

Mr. Dawson's experience enabled him to suggest a different origin of the term. 'When

I was a young blood' said he 'and with other bucks used to hunt w—s in Richmond, it was our custom as soon as we spied the game to exclaim Demme a cat, whence the girls of the town, always called us Demme cats. This I conjecture by an easy corruption has been changed into Democrat. I am confirmed in this opinion by observing how universally our whole party is addicted to this sport, so that no circumstance could be hit upon more happy, for the purpose of a general classification. Mr. Livingston corroborated the opinion of Mr. Dawson, and said that he had often had occasion to notice the same thing in New-York, and that for his part he had no joys in the term half so exquisite as those which the associations, resulting from its origin, produced. The member from Boston, however adhered to his prejudice in favour of his town. There was much marrow he said in the observations of the gentlemen, but that they rather strengthened, than weakened his opinion by the facts they had mentioned; that now he did not entertain a doubt that the term would be found, upon examination to have originated to the north of the Millbridge; and that he would certainly take occasion to inquire of his particular friend William Cooper clerk of that town, who, he said, was very learned in such matters.

These and more essential differences concerning important points of faith and knowledge, first started the idea of this work. I was grieved that so many great men should be at a loss when a little research into the history, and present state of democracy would clear up their doubts, and give them moreover so many solid reasons for exultation. I resolved therefore to look deeply into these subjects and publish the result to the world. How it will be received, I cannot anticipate, but if industry, impartiality and fidelity entitle an author, to public favour, this work must obtain it for me. The reader will see that no pains have been spared in paper and types. As to the engravings, they are likenesses taken from life, by an artist recommended by Mr. Jefferson; to whom I owe great obligations on this account, as he worked by the job, and by agreeing with him to paint by the dozen, I was enabled to make some important savings in preparing this work for the press.

As the above extract contains a full account of the origin and design of this work, I have published it notwithstanding its length entire. In my next number I shall inform the public of all that I have been able to learn concerning the suppression of this history, and of the manner, in which the copy I possess, came to my hands. I shall also produce some facts, which will go far to settle the question whether Slaveslap Kidnap, Esq. be a real or fictitious personage. Upon this head many of those friends to whom I have shewn my copy of his work, are disposed to suggest doubts, partly from the exceeding great novelty of the name North of the Potomack, and partly from the many, and great beauties of style abounding in every page, and which they insist must have been the work of a hand long exercised in writing, and could not be the production of a man on his first appearance before the public. I think I have evidence, which will silence these doubts. This done, I shall not for a moment withhold from the public, that gratification, it may expect from a perusal of those parts of this work, of which prudent considerations allow publication, and which will be accompanied by such critical, and explanatory remarks as the nature of the work under review, and the scope of the present essays require.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Passy, May 16, 1780.

To Messrs. the Judges of the Admiralty at Cherbourg.

Gentlemen,

I have received the Proces Verbaux, and other papers which you did me the honour to send me, agreeable to the 11th article of the regulation of the 27th of September 1778. These pieces relate to the taking of the ship Flora, whereof was Captain Henry Roodenberg, bound from Rotterdam to Dublin, and arrived at Cherbourg in France, being taken the 7th day of April, by Captain Dowlin, commander of the American privateer, the Black Prince.

It appears to me from the above mentioned papers, that the said ship Flora is not a good prize, the same belonging to the subjects of a neutral nation; but that the cargo is really the property of the subjects of the king of England, though attempted to be masqued as neutral. I do therefore request, that after the cargo shall be landed, you would cause the said ship Flora to be immediately restored to her Captain, and that you would oblige the captors to pay him his full freight, according to his bills of lading, and also to make good all the damages he may have sustained, by plunder or otherwise. And I farther request, that as the cargo is perishable, you would cause it to be sold immediately, and retain the produce deposited in your hands, to the end that if any of the freighters being subjects of their High Mightinesses, the states generals, will declare upon both that certain parts of the said cargo, were bona fide, shipped on their own account and risk, and not on the account and risk of any British or Irish subjects, the value of such parts may be restored: or that if the freighters, or any of them, should think fit to appeal from this judgment to the Congress, the produce so deposited, may be disposed of according to their final determination.

I have the honour to be Gentlemen, your most obedient, and most humble servant.

Passy, May 30, 1780.

Sir,

In my last of the 27th Instant, I omitted one thing I had intended, viz. to desire you would give absolute orders to your cruisers not to bring any more Dutch vessels, though charged with enemy's goods, unless contraband. All the neutral states of Europe seem at present disposed to change what had before been deemed the law of nations, to wit, that an enemy's property may be taken wherever found; and to establish a rule that free ships, shall make free goods. This rule is itself so reasonable, and of a nature to be so beneficial to mankind, that I cannot but wish it may become general, and I make no doubt, but that the Congress will agree to it, in as full an extent, as France and Spain. In the meantime, and until I have received their orders on the subject, it is my intention to condemn no more English goods found in Dutch vessels, unless contraband; of which I thought it right to give you this previous notice, that you may avoid the trouble and expense likely to arise from such captures, and from the detention of them for a decision. With great regard, and best wishes for the success of your enterprises, I have the honour to be Sir, your most obedient humble servant.

Mr. Torris. (Copy.)

Paris, Hotel de Valois Rue de Richelieu,
June 6, 1780.

Sir,

I thank you for your letter, in answer to mine of the 21st of May, and for your kind congratulations on my arrival here.

Mr. Brown, with whom you took your walks in the neighbourhood of Paris, has been gone from home some weeks, on his way hence. I should have had much pleasure, if I had been one of the party. I have rambled, in most of the scenes round this city, and find them very pleasant, but much more indebted to art than to nature. Philadelphia, in the purlieus of which, as well as those of Baltimore, and York town, I have often sought health and pleasure, in the same way, in company with our venerable Secretary Charles Thompson, will in future times, when the arts shall have established their empire in the new world, become much more striking. But Boston above all, around which I have much oftener wandered in company with another venerable character, little known in Europe, but to whose virtues and public merit in the cause of mankind, history will do justice, will one day present scenes of grandeur and beauty, superior to any other place I have ever yet seen. The letter of G. Clinton, when I transmitted it to you, was not suspected to be an imposition. There are some circumstances, which are sufficient to raise a question, but I think none of them are conclusive, and upon the whole, I have little doubt of its authenticity. I shall be much mortified if it proves a fiction, not on account of the importance of the letter, but the stain that a practice so disingenuous will bring upon America. When I first left America, such a fiction with all its ingenuity, would have ruined the reputation of the author of it, if discovered, and I think that both he and the printer would have been punished. With all the freedom of our presses, I really think, that not only the government but the populace would have resented it. I have had opportunities of an extensive acquaintance with Americans, and I must say in justice to my countrymen, that I know not a man that I think capable of a forgery at once so able and so base. Truth is indeed respected in America, and so gross an affront to her I hope will not, and I think cannot go unpunished.

Whether it is genuine or not, I have no doubt of the truth of the facts, in general, and I have reasons to believe, that if the secret correspondence of Bernard, Hutchinson, Gage, Howe, and Clinton, could all be brought to light, the world would be equally surprized at the whole thread of it. The British administration and their servants have carried toward us from the beginning a system of duplicity, in the conduct of American affairs, that will appear infamous to the public, whenever it shall be known.

You have seen A. Rodney's account of the battle of the 17th of April. The scripture of the ocean, is not to be maintained by such actions as this, and Biron's and Keppell's. They must make themselves more terrible upon the ocean, to preserve its dominion. Their empire is founded only in fear—no nation loves it.

We have no news.

I have the honour to be, with much respect, Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant.

JOHN ADAMS.

Mr. Dumas.

Passy, June 22, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I received duly yours of May 23, June 2, 6, 8, and 15. Inclosed you have a letter for the gentleman you recommend to me. He seems to be a man of abilities.

The words before I leave Europe, had no relation to any particular immediate intention, but to the general one I flatter myself with, of being able to return and spend there the small remains of life that are left me.

I have written distinctly to Messrs. De Neufville concerning those bills. I hear that 484 was at Newbern the 12th of April, and soon to sail from thence, or from Virginia for France. Probably he might not sail in some weeks after, as vessels are often longer in fitting out than was expected, if it is the Fies Rodrigue, a 90 gun ship that he comes in, I have just heard that she would not sail till the middle of May.

Herewith you have the judgment relating to the Flora, which I thought had been sent before. The mischiefs done by the mob in London are astonishing! They were I hear within an ace of destroying the bank, with all the books relating to the funds, which would have created infinite confusion.

I am grieved at the loss of Charleston. Let us hope soon to hear better news from the operations of the French and Spanish forces, gone to America.

With great esteem, I am ever, dear
Sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant.

B. FRANKLIN.

M. Dumas.

Passy, June 22, 1780.

Dear Sir,

As the English do not allow that we can make legal prizes, they certainly cannot detain the Dutch ship the Berkenboos, on pretence that it was become American property before they took it. For the rest there is no doubt but the Congress will do what shall appear to be just, on a proper representation of facts laid before them, which the owners should appoint some person in America to do. Those gentlemen, may depend on my rendering them every service in my power.

With great esteem, I am dear
Sir, your most obedient humble servant.

B. FRANKLIN.

M. Dumas.

Philadelphia, July 10, 1780.

Sir,

I know not how I can profess all the regard which I feel for you, without appearing on the one hand, to do it upon slight grounds, or on the other, to have delayed it too long.

I have been steadily in Congress without once visiting my dear family in Boston, since January 1777, and from May, that year, have been a member of the committee of foreign affairs; consequently I am well informed of your truly republican spirit, your particular affection for these states, and your industry in their service, most of your numerous letters down to December the 30th, 1779, having come to hand.

The honourable gentleman who will deliver this, being also a member of Congress, has a just esteem for you, and promises himself much advantage from an opportunity of conversing with you. Mr. Searle is well able to make a due return of the benefit from the fund of his intimacy with American state affairs, his extensive commercial knowledge, and his science of mankind gained by former travails. I shall shortly write to you again, by another respectable gentle of our assembly, and I will use every means to make him the bearer of what you have so rightfully solicited, as a faithful first correspondent of our committee, from whom you will probably have regular official letters, under a new arrangement of a secretaryship, which has been vacant from the days of a confusion excited by an indiscreet and illiberal publication, here on the 5th of December 1778, and which you have read with grief.

In the meantime I hope you will receive kindly this individual testimony of cordial friendship, from sir, your very humble servant.

JAMES LOVELL.

Venerable Mr. Dumas.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

H. Caritat has issued Proposals for publishing by subscription, an Original Work, entitled A JOURNEY, Made by order of the French Government, from Pittsburg on the River Ohio, through the Western Territory of the United States to the Upper and Lower Parts of LOUISIANA, Chiefly on the Mississippi, Missouri, Illinois, Arkansas and adjacent Rivers as low as NEW ORLEANS, in the years 1796 and 1797, BY GENERAL COLLOT.

This work will be comprised in two volumes in 4to,* containing thirty charts drawn for the most part on imperial paper of the dimensions of three feet six inches, together with plates and Views executed by the best artists of Paris, describing the aspect of the Country, its supposed boundaries, the nature of the soil, the farms, hamlets, villages and towns, which border on the Ohio, the Mississippi, and other rivers, and marking their soundings and those of the creeks which pour their waters into their floods. Translated into English from the original Manuscript, by Helen Maria Williams.—Subscriptions to this work will also be received by the following Booksellers; viz James White, Boston; P. Byrne, Philadelphia; John Rice, Baltimore; William Duane, Washington;—Thomas, Charleston.

PROSPECTUS.

The French Government having formed the design of making the acquisition of Louisiana, became highly interested in procuring more positive information respecting that country, than it had hitherto obtained. General Collot, was therefore commissioned in 1796, to take the most accurate survey of the country.

This Mission General Collot undertook, notwithstanding the dangers with which it was attended and which proved fatal to some of his suite,† which consisted among others, of twelve persons skilled in Geography and drawing. He began his expedition at Pittsburg, where he embarked on the Ohio and followed the course of this river to its junction with the Mississippi, describing the country on each side of its banks, the rivers which empty themselves into the Ohio, and the Creeks, Shoals and Soundings. From the Ohio, General Collot took a survey of the Mississippi and other rivers on the West, which empty themselves into the Mississippi, the course of which he followed to New Orleans, where Spanish jealousy attacked him, there he owed his liberty only to the firmness of his character; escaped from this new danger he reached Philadelphia from whence he had departed.

General Collot not satisfied with taking the soundings of the creeks and rivers which he surveyed, pointing out the dangers of the navigation, directing the course of future travellers, by marking on his charts the rocks, shoals, banks and bars which obstruct the passage, &c. He has also indicated the quality of the lands, and the character of the country, with a degree of precision that cannot fail to be eminently useful to future American Emigrants. Forests as ancient as the world here lift their towering heads, while natural meadows, which extend 40 leagues without a tree, bounded by woods and intersected by infinite numbers of creeks, demand the hands of cultivation. There, the most luxuriant vegetation invites the wanderer to fix his dwelling.

General Collot astonishes his readers, while he conducts them through immense plains till now unknown, covered with Mulberry trees, and Silk worms equal to those of the East Indies, and left to the care of nature. He leads them to mountains of pure salt; to lakes covered with birds and full of fish of every kind; in short to lands become the domain of an innumerable quantity of game.

The author bestows equal attention on natural history and commerce as on other objects; he treats of Furs in the minutest detail; nothing is neglected; nothing escapes his penetration; neither quadrupeds, reptiles, birds plants, trees, nor mines of any kind. To relieve the minds of his readers from that lassitude, which is too often inseparable from topographical description he has been careful to enlarge each of his chapters, with historical remarks, which afford just ideas of the manners and dispositions of the Indians he had visited, and which are naturally connected with his subject and engage by the interest they excite.

This interesting Work was on the point of being published at Paris, at the expense of the French government, when Louisiana was ceded to the United States, which circumstance left General Collot at liberty to dispose of it.

Already several Americans residing in France, at the head of whom was Mr. Swan of Boston, wished to treat with General Collot, under the favour and advice of his Excellency Mr. Livingston, Ambassador. They were disposed to advance the price, when the correspondent of Mr. Caritat, then in France, yielding to the solicitations made him from every quarter, consented to purchase it, on condition that the American gentlemen residing in Paris in July last, should subscribe first, which they did with eagerness. Miss Helen Maria Williams, so advantageously known in America, by her literary fame, after having read the manuscript with the greatest interest undertook to translate it into English, and Mr. Tardieu, the first Engraver of France, undertook the Maps and Plates, which are at present finished.

The public are respectfully requested to observe that Mr. Caritat did consent to become the Publisher of this important Work, and to advance near 10,000 dollars to complete it, until he received from his subscribers at Paris the positive expectation that their example would be followed in the United States, by all men of Public Character, of Literature, Merchants and Persons in easy circumstances, interested in the glory and prosperity of their Country. The Publisher has only one circumstance to regret, that he could not diminish the price of the work, which will however be found moderate, as may be proved, when the various and heavy expenses, attending such a publication, are calculated.

The drawing, and Plates being extremely expensive, the public are informed that there will only be a sufficient number of copies to satisfy the demands of the Subscribers

New York, Nov. 28, 1803.

CONDITIONS:

The price of each copy on fine paper, with elegant type, will be 22 dollars, neatly bound, and 20 dollars in boards, to be paid on delivery.—They will be ready for delivery on the first of May. A list of the subscribers will be published at the end of the second volume.

* LIST of those who subscribed both in Paris and here, before the Prospectus was put to press.

The President of the United States; his Excellency Robt. R. Livingston, Ambassador to France; his Excellency James Munroe, Ambassador to Great Britain; Mr. Skipwith, Commercial Agent of the United States in Paris; Messrs. Robert Louis Livingston, Peter R. Livingston, Burnet, Maclure, Cutting, Fulton, Barlow, Mcville, Swan, Bentalon, Montfalcon, Grant, Burch, Fenwick, Whiteside, Wayer, Pinkney, Norry, Garden, Saint-Clair, Robertson, Norris, Miller, Col. Orne and Captain Burn.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, JULY 19.

SITTINGS AT GUILDHALL.

WHITE VS. JERVIS.

This was an action upon the warranty of a Horse.

Mr. Erskine stated that his client, the Rev. Mr. White, was curate of Hamsted. Being in want of a horse the better to enable him to perform his parochial duty, he saw an advertisement in a newspaper of one to be sold by a Mr. Dickenson, which was the property of the Defendant. He liked the appearance of the horse, and having received a warranty of his soundness, he completed the purchase. He expected to find a quiet animal, who would carry him peaceably, through his parish, for he was no great horseman; but Mr. White had scarcely mounted, when the Horse became restive, and before he reached Hamstead, he gave proofs of every vice.

Lord Ellenborough said he supposed the warranty extended to the soundness of the horse's body, not to the sweetness of his temper.

Mr. Erskine observed, that he should prove that at the time of the sale he was not sound. Mr. Moorcroft, so celebrated for his skill in the diseases of horses, was ready to swear that there was a speck upon one of his eyes, which impaired his vision. This was observed within eight days of the time of the sale, and could not have grown in so short a time.

Mr. Dickenson was then called, and proved the sale and the warranty. On his cross examination he said, that he had sold the horse to Mr. Jervis, who, having no farther occasion for him, had sent him back to be re-sold. He was perfectly certain that he was sound when sold to Mr. White, and even now he could not perceive that he had a speck on his eye, or any other blemish.

Professor Moorcroft stated, that there certainly was a speck on the horse's off eye, which, in his opinion, was of long standing. He thought that this lessened the value of the horse, as he could not see so well with the one eye as the other.

Several witnesses were then called, but they all allowed that a small speck was perceivable, though they thought it was of no importance.

* The Publisher is not ignorant that a work so necessary to the public, must generally speaking, be put within the reach of every class, as much as possible. This principle which applies to every Country, ought to be more scrupulously observed in America, where they are not familiarised with editions of the quarto size, which the Publisher has been obliged to adopt for the aforesaid work; had he taken any other, the end, as well as the utility of this work would have absolutely failed. The reason will appear just, when it is remembered that the size of the Copper-plates and Maps, would not have allowed them to fold in 8vo. without being exposed to such mutilation as would render their use impracticable, after having opened the book only three or four times.

† General Warin, his Aid de Camp, was killed by an Indian.

Mr. Garrow paid many compliments to Professor Moorcroft, and confessed that he liked a horse much the worse for having his opinion against him. Yet though from his great science he had been able to spy an imperfection, it did not follow that the horse was unsound. If a whole regiment of cavalry were subjected to his inspection, he probably would not allow a horse in each troop to be faultless. "This eye is dull," he would say, "or has a tendency to dullness; this tendon is inserted into the bone a little too high, and that a little too low." We enjoyed the light and warmth of the sun, and were grateful to the great ruler of the universe; yet philosophers with their telescopes discovered spots on this glorious luminary, and perhaps some of them were of opinion that we should be more comfortable if it were uniformly bright. Many people had seen this horse without perceiving any speck on his eye, and had it not been for the Learned Professor, he might have carried a good character with him to his grave. If the plaintiff were to succeed, and the trial were to get abroad, as it probably would to-morrow morning by means of the newspapers, every one who was tired of his horse would get a scientific man to point out something that might be amended, and immediately bring an action against the person from whom he had bought him.

After an able reply from Mr. Erskine and an impartial summing up from Lord Ellenborough the Jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff—Damages 21l. 10s. 6d.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The following political sketches are derived from a source of information both correct and new. They will reflect a very vivid light upon the political scene in Europe.

The government and people of this country are still vigilant in preparations to resist the invasion threatened from France, and in endeavours to prevent it. The troops of the line have been industriously recruited, and with great success. The invasion would find us an armed nation, a nation of soldiers, impatient to prove their courage on the heads of any host, of insolent enemies. The distribution of an immense military force, exceeding half a million, is such as to render it most effective in defence of the kingdom. Encampments along the coast; garrisons in the proper garrison towns; provisions for the immediate centering of a great strength upon any one of those points, on which the improbability is the smallest, that an enemy should effect a descent; the fortification of certain positions immediately on the shore which might be before too weak in proportion to their importance; the maintenance at the same time of a sufficient number of troops in the interior parts of the country, to be a grand reserve if any misfortune were to befall those which are upon the coast; and in particular, the care that is used to preserve the health of the troops, to set approved generals at the head, to provide ample supplies of provisions, ammunition and other stores, to watch every movement and preparation of the enemy, appear to have satisfied the country in the fullest manner of the general spirit and energy. Every where, the troops hold themselves in readiness, as if the landing of an enemy were hourly expected. It is this vigilance which gives confidence to the country; since in this we know that we are safe. The metropolis is undoubtedly the grand prize to the seizure of which a well directed invasion would be aimed. For this reason, those landing places are more especially guarded from which an enemy might the most easily advance against London.

At sea also, the most vigorous efforts are made to annoy our enemies, and frustrate their designs. Lord Keith, and next to him, admiral Montague, have the chief command in the English channel. From Quimper to the coast of Norway, British fleets command the sea, watch along the coast and blockade the access into every harbour out of which any armament can be thought likely to issue. The success of the gallant Sir James Saumarez, together with the bombardment of the gun boats at Calais and Boulogne, were such as to prove to the French the insecurity of their ports, their gun boats, and all their paltry naval preparations; although the enterprize did not spread that utter destruction along the French coast, which was most earnestly to be desired.

The ports of the Dutch and Belgic provinces, and those of Germany in the power of the French, are closely blockaded by British ships of war. The chances are so small that the French gun boats under some rare advantages of winds and fogs should escape out of port and effect a descent, that prepared as we now are, the enemy's threats of so foolish an enterprize, need not give us the smallest uneasiness.

In the Italian seas, Lord Nelson commands a squadron sufficiently strong to resist any maritime enterprize of the French. Sir Edward Pellew and Sir Robert Calder watch Ferrol, and the marine movements of the French, on the coast of Provence. The British squadrons are masters of the West India seas. In conjunction with the land forces, they have captured the islands of St. Lucia and Tobago, and have also taken several French ships of war. It is expected that news will speedily be received of the surrender to the British fleet, of the remnant of the enemy's army, which two years since landed with so much pomp in St. Domingo. In the northern American seas, the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, have been taken by a small British force.

Parliament was to meet about the end of November.

France the most extensive and compact empire in Europe is terrible by the strength and activity of its military government. Its army in Hanover continues to oppress the inhabitants, and to devour the resources of that electorate and its dependencies. The people of the Dutch states suffer at the same time from their French allies, almost all the ills that can be inflicted on a conquered nation. They have been forced to take part in a war, in which they wished to look on as neutrals. They are compelled to furnish and to maintain a great body of native Dutch troops, whom they would much rather employ in the husbandry, manufactures, and fisheries. They have been compelled to receive French garrisons in all their strong towns, to put their sea ports into the hands of the French, and to expose their whole country in some manner, as a scene of passage and encampment to the armies of France. Their trade is at the same time ruined, and their ports are on account of their alliance with France, blocked up, by the English at sea. The inhabitants of the Belgic provinces of France suffer much by the levies of conscripts by the interruption, which the war gives to their manufactures and trade, and by the greater vigour with which they are governed, as being departments but newly added to the republic. Along the whole sea coast of these departments of the Batavian republic, and of those parts of ancient France, which are adjacent to the English channel, it is said that the total number of the troops, which the first consul of France has in readiness to be employed against England, including those which though not on the coast, might be speedily marched to it, cannot be less than 300,000 men. At Dunkirk a number of gun boats are in readiness. Incessant diligence is used to exercise the men in the different French harbours on the channel, in working the guns, and in all the necessary management of the boats, which bear them. Two thousand eight hundred men are said to be now every day at work, enlarging and repairing the fortifications at Boulogne. By the inconveniences and hardships necessarily attending the assemblage of so many troops, in temporary encampments, contagious diseases have been extensively spread among the French troops near Boulogne, Calais, and Dunkirk; and we have information that the numbers which die every day are very considerable. The consular government remains at present unshaken. France has suffered so much by revolutions, that submission to almost any government, would, for the present, be thought preferable to a struggle, for change that might lead to civil war. But, the difficulty in finding supplies for the public expenditure in that country, are now exceedingly great. The ruin which the war has brought upon the trade and manufactures, is deep and extensive, and, felt by all except the old soldiers, and officers, and those who, as contractors and tradesmen derive large emoluments from the supply of the necessities for the war to the army, and the government. The royalist and the jacobin parties are both considerable at this time in France, but they seem to form each of them a counterpoise to each other.

The First Consul is, undoubtedly, a man of commanding intrepidity and talents. But he wants that gracious fascinating affability without which no chief ruler can be long acceptable to such a nation as the French. Much of that ascendancy which he is still enabled to maintain over public opinion in France, is owing to the degree in which his power has, hitherto, gratified much vanity and ambition, by extending the military glory, and political power of the nation.

Russia next after France, the greatest power on the continent, consults its own true interests, in avoiding to take any part in the present contest, between Great Britain and France. Its true policy is precisely that which it now pursues—to improve the culture of its immense domains, and the civilization of its people, and to maintain only such a force, naval and military, as is requisite to give energy and authority to its internal government, and at the same time, to make it secure against contempt, or attack from any of its neighbours. We have no fear that Russia will by any intrigue, be led to take part in the war with France: For, the trade, the manufactures, and even the agriculture of Russia are, to such a degree, carried on with British capital, that hostilities with Britain would immediately distress the government and nation to an extent the most dangerous, and which Alexander and his ministers are not at all likely to hazard. Nor is it probable, that Denmark and Sweden now so remarkably subject to the ascendancy of Russia, and existing in such a rivalry between themselves will do otherwise, than remain in a wise neutrality during the remainder of this war.

I should prefer a tyrant to a democrat; for, in the severity of a tyrant, there is a chance for perfection; and we know we are not in greater danger from the oppression of the one, than from the licentiousness of the other.

Pope says—For forms of government, let fools contest,
That which is best administer'd is best.

But are all equally well calculated to be well administered? or if all were well administered would all be equally good?

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FREEDOM, AN ODE.

Written, in Scotland, by a young woman, the daughter of a miller at Edinburgh.

Array'd in dazzling robes of purest light,
Guiding the rapid car of power sublime,
Lo! FREEDOM triumphs o'er Oblivion's night,
And rears her trophies on the throne of Time.
What though she pauses in her proud career,
To mourn her altars, mingling with the dust,
To shed on Valour's grave a parent's tear,
The unconscious tenant, once her dearest boast,
Even then she stifles Sorrow's rising sigh,
As future triumphs rush on her prophetic eye.

Her lightning's glance can penetrate the gloom,
That dimly curtains many a slumbering year,
In whose bright course shall heavenly fires relume

Her torch, expiring in wild Nature's tear.
In ages yet to come shall ardent youth,
Warm'd by the flame that round her altar plays,
Rise the bold champions of oppressed Truth,
And if in Glory's beam their eagles gaze,
While the loud trumpet's blast of deathless fame,
Shall tell an awe-struck world each glorious name.

Oh, righteous power! thy mighty voice shall raise

Thy shrine, where Guilt his giant powers resign'd,
Where Truth's dread helm shall glitter in the blaze

Of starry wreaths on Mercy's brow intwin'd:
Beneath the genial splendors of thy reign,
Genius shall own thy pure, inspiring smile,
And Peace shall join bright Freedom's angel-train.

To tear the fetters from the sons of toil,
To pour the dew, nectareous, of the sky,
On the pale lip, parch'd with Affliction's sigh,
Thy potent hand shall holy altars rear,
Where tran'd Devotion may her transports pour;

Her soul, unaw'd by Persecution's fear,
Shall rise, triumphant, o'er his darkest hour;

Where pallid victims groan in deep despair,
Wrapt in the shades of Superstition's gloom,
Where crushing racks turn in the livid glare
Of flashing fires, the screaming sufferers' tomb.
Avenging power! on thee shall Heav'n bestow
Its fiery bolts, to lay the fabric low.

When o'er the cliffs of Albion's sea-beat shore,
Wild Superstition her dark pinions spread,
Her midnight orgies bathe the caves with gore,
And o'er the ocean shriek'd th' unhallow'd dead.

Her abject slaves, the ministers of death,
While gasping votaries strain'd the blood-shot eye,

Bade charming caverns fling their sulphurous
breath,

In column'd terrors, to the thundering sky,
And dreadful forms rose on the shelving height,
The airy cradle of the spell-bound night.

Freedom's loud voice bade those dread terrors cease;

Her orient lustre pierc'd the Stygian gloom;
While Science came, the heavenly child of Peace,

And rear'd her dwelling on dark Error's tomb:
Freedom, blest guardian of her mystic shrine,
On Time's dark wing pour'd her celestial light.
As some bright angel, 'mid the spheres divine,
Eids morning splendors chase receding Night,

And Nature, freed from Night's terrific power,
Her matin anthem sings in Summer's fragrant bower.

Bleak blew the wind around the quivering flame,
That cheer'd the summit of the lonely bow'r,
Where pale Disease consum'd the captive's frame,

Who call'd on Frenzy at the midnight hour;
And then the centinel, at dead of night,
Pac'd the wild battlement with footsteps slow,
While the dark raven curb'd his dreary flight,
To pour through grated bars his notes of woe;
Flapping his pinion, as the clanking chain
Chas'd sleep's bright visions from the sufferer's brain.

Ah! when the scenes of childhood met his views,

Rising in Memory's agonizing dream,
The landscape tinted with the rainbow's hue,
Its wild woods waving in the morning beam,
The airy mountain and the twilight vale,
Where light as air his infant footsteps flew;
His golden tresses flaunting on the gale,
That shook from Summer's rose the silver'd dew;
The smile maternal on his soul imprest,
That fir'd to madness his wild fetter'd breast.

How rush'd the life-blood through his palsied veins,

When Freedom enter'd the dark haunt of Night,
And from her child tore the time-rusted chains,
While beaming day burst on his aching sight.
As when he launch'd upon the azure tide,
His rustling canvass fluttering in the breeze,
The beams of heaven his bright, unerring guide;
While angel footsteps curb'd the slumbering seas,
Blest Freedom hail'd him to his native shore,
As Peace proclaim'd the reign of Carnage o'er.

To Freedom's care the awful charge is given
To watch in infancy the patriot's soul,
To warm his bosom with the fires of Heaven,
And lead his steps to Glory's dazzling goal.
Her raptur'd eye beholds his youthful frame,
With spring elastic bound across the plain,
And marks him glow with transport at the name
Of those who died to save her falling reign.
Till led by her when toil-mark'd years are fled,
Bright Glory twines her laurels round his head.

As when the valour of her Spartan son,*
In vain oppos'd Ambition's whelming storm,
That shook the centre of her Attic throne,
And menac'd ruin to her trembling form;
She saw the hero on Thermop'le's field,
With frantic woe in her maternal eye,
Before her shrine his mighty spirit yield;
While spheres eternal trembled in her cry:
Rous'd by her voice, the powers of vengeance came,
And pour'd their fury on Guilt's fainting frame.

Freedom again wav'd heav'n's avenging sword,
Thron'd on the summit of the Grecian steep,
While far below the crimson billows roar'd,
As hostile nations struggled on the deep,
Tremendous power when Persia's host essay'd
To bend thy children in Oppression's chain,
On their proud legions they rush'd undismay'd
As sweeps the whirlwind on the wintry main,
Inspir'd by thee, from millions scorn'd to fly,
Till Nature rung in their victorious cry.

Yes, Freedom fled the imperial towers of Rome,
When Vice, the priest of Luxury, profan'd,
With rites abhor'd, her consecrated dome,
While maniac Folly o'er the orgies reign'd.
In vain she pointed to her Cato's tomb,
In vain in thunders she pronounc'd his name,

* Leonidas.

They madly scorn'd their dread impending doom,
And Faction's clouds obscur'd bright Reason's flame,

Till fell Destruction smote them to the dust,
And conquer'd nations own'd the sentence just.

When Evening's purple robe glows in the beam,
Her golden star shed o'er Italian skies,
And the proud wave of Tyber's classic stream
Heaves its clear bosom in her balmy sighs.
On the etherial moon-light car of Even,
The mighty shades of other times appear,
Freedom for thee they fly the bowers of heaven,
For thee they visit Earth's nocturnal sphere,
To bid thee trust that god-like deeds sublime
Shall yet emblazon the dim shield of Time.

When the dread spirit of the mountain storm
Unfur'd his standard to the rushing wind,
That howl'd around the Caledonian's form,
On the rude fragment of the rock reclin'd,
O'er heathy hills the western moon-beams shone,
The torrents wild foam'd gleaming in the ray,
Thro' blasted pines arose the tempests moan,
Rocking the gray cliff where the hunter lay:
Freedom descending on the desert wild,
Blest the calm slumbers of her fearless child.

Dear to her bosom were those northern plains,
Oft has she listen'd when from Morven's vale
Arose the voice of Cercis' mournful strains,
Charming the spirit of the sea-born gale:
She train'd the warlike race from age to age,
And nerv'd their arm with Freedom's awful force,
She smil'd, exulting as the battle-rage
Swept Pride's dark legions in its vengeful course,
And with her spear, on the proud shrine of Fame,
Near mighty Wallace, carv'd her Bruce's name.

Freedom, thy voice can still the storm of woe,
And soothe the sufferer in the hour of pain;
While thy pure rays on his pale features glow,
As shines the moon-beam on the twilight main.
Oh, were I doom'd to Want's oblivious vale,
My lonely home her dark sequester'd dell,
Inspired by thee, I would her terrors hail,
For even with her blest Freedom loves to dwell!
Thy roses fade in Pleasure's gaudy dome,
But shed their sweets round Labour's cottage home.

SONNET TO R. FRYER,

WRITTEN AT THE CLOSE OF A COLLECTION OF POEMS, BY.....

"Here pause, my Muse, not the united rage
Of Jove, of Vulcan, or consuming Time,
Thy song can injure; spotless is the page,
And fated Fame's ethereal heights to climb.*
Thus surge full many a boasting bard of yore,
Thus thinks full many a bard of modern days,
Tho' skill'd to check the verse, which thus would soar,

And count, with humbler voice, poetic praise.
When friends approve, 'tis sweet, 'tis passing sweet,

Let me to thee my secret wishes own,
E'en I have hopes their partial praise to meet;
Nor pass my life unheeded and unknown,
Trembles my timid muse, and much I fear,
Her rugged rhymes may wound the polish'd ear.

No. LXXX.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

MR,

He who has mingled much among fashionable young men, cannot but have observed by what variety of modes the esteem is enforced, or the heart is assailed—while one commands the attention of his associates, by the splendour of his genius, the extent of his mental acquirements, the loudness of his voice, by the frequency of his invitations to dinner, or of his cards to a tea-party, another finds his passport to the fashionable circle by his eccentricity or his personal charms; by the shortness of his vest, or the length of his purse; or he builds his success on the mildness of his temper, or the manliness of his conduct. Thus a circle is formed of dissimilar materials, and harmony throws her silken chain around their hearts. The sprightliness of one chases the gloom from the brow of another, while the polite propriety of conduct in a third, corrects the familiarity, which, if indulged without controul, might degenerate into contempt.

For a considerable period, Mr. Saunter, I have been one of a club, in which, if genius and talents be strangers, the social affections have ever been cherished—yet, among us, there are possibly no two minds or dispositions, which have been cast in the same mould. The various qualities of the heart and of the mind, are found in our club-room, and experience has discovered them to mingle together with as much facility and relish, as oil and vinegar, mustard, egg and salt are made to unite in the salad-tureen by the skillful cookery of one of the most useful of our members. The pun and the joke fly round with the bottle, and in all matters which may affect the existence of the club, we unite with the same harmony, that we join in the chorus of a jovial song.

Good nature, or a tacit consent to be the standing target for the arrows of wit, is the passport by which Quietus found admittance—Versatile unites occasionally in sentiment with each of the members. If his oysters be fried, they are hard of digestion, and if raw, they are insipid,—when they are roasted, they are smoked, and if they be stewed, he curses Count Rumford, and orders them to the 'soup-house'—My friend Absens, amuses with his mistakes—he takes the beer-can for the snuff-box, and his neighbour's pun for his own—He interrupts a story by a call for the waiter, and sometimes surprises us by an essay on wedlock.—Classicus maintains his station by quotations from Horace, and criticises turtle-soup by the regulation of a Spartan broth-club—he sometimes drinks more than is needful that he may vociferate 'nunc est bibendum,' and empties a duck of its stuffing, while he exclaims, 'in medias res.'—Odi profanum vulgus,' makes him rail at democracy, and when he is hoarse 'vox faucibus hæret.'—The impetuosity of Ardens is seldom censured, for he never spills his wine on his neighbour's breeches, when he can throw it between his own lips—If he break a decanter, he will pay for it himself, and he d—ns the waiter to indulge his own feelings, in throwing him a dollar—But my sprightly friend 'Ambiguus' is a professed punster, and is contented to rest his success on his felicity in the science of punning.—Hard words in his mouth are tortured into as many forms, as 'clay in the hands of the potter.' There have been many expressions used at the club, which passed for sentences of no meaning, until Ambiguus discovered two for them. If a noisy member, exhilarated by wine, attempt to usurp the head of the table, my friend insists he should be at the foot,—and if a young lady be toasted in beer, Ambiguus demands that she should be drunk in good spirits. There is scarcely the name of a female toasted at the supper table, which his ingenuity has not changed into another, and possibly from this felicity in changing ladies' names, he has become so much their favourite. If a member call for beer, Ambiguus is sure it will carry him to his grave, and when I ask for pickle, he exclaims 'God preserve you'—At the supper table celery, is always a standing pun, and a tongue is sure to put that of Ambiguus in motion, and when we feast upon lobsters, he says that our host should not insert the claws in the bill. Last night the stove was called a ten-plated one, because the waiter had put that number of plates on it to be heated. Ambiguus is not only a punster himself, but is the cause of punning in others. Some evenings since my friend Quietus was unluckily engaged in an argument, and being assailed by a strong dilemma, he declined further dispute, observing that he was cooped up. This was not intended for a pun, and therefore Ambiguus was hasty in calling him a chicken—Classicus declared it was a foul pun—Ardens insisted it was fair, and ordered Classicus not to pull it to pieces. This was considered a merry thought, and of course excited a loud laugh, which Ambiguus lengthened by desiring us not to crow so loud.

This detail of the mode of passing an hour may possibly soften the severity of old maids, who in some unguarded moment, may have reproached us with dissipation, and satisfy them that they are not made the objects of our levity, when fresh topics are offered for our merriment.

QUIXOTE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. CLIMENOLE.

A REVIEW, POLITICAL AND LITERARY.—No. 2.
Memorabilia democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science. Interspersed with anecdotes, characters and speeches of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats, by Slaveslap Kiddnap, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651
Washington, printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

In my fact, I promised to lay before the public, all the information I possessed concerning the publication and the suppression of the work I have undertaken to examine. This I shall now attempt, with that simplicity, which is the proper dress of truth. And, being well aware how impostors have multiplied, of late, and how many writers, for party and ambitious purposes, have assumed characters, which in no wise belonged to them: I shall be careful to say nothing for which I am not willing to vouch, in the most public manner; and for the authenticity of which I am not able to produce the most ample testimonials; and, if need be, both witnesses and certificates: it being my firm resolution, to follow the example of Mr. Jefferson, in his appendix to his Notes on Virginia, touching the murder of Logan's family; and to place no reliance upon my own character for veracity; but in support of every fact, which shall be controverted, to publish a pamphlet, containing, like his, fifty octavo pages, and "present to the public, in the form of letters, certificates and affidavits, as they came to me. fragments of evidence, the small remains of a mighty mass, which time has consumed."

The work under review, came into my hands in the following manner. Having had occasion, to reside at Washington, on private business during the winter, in the beginning of the year 1802—I took lodgings, by accident, at the hotel where a great number of the leading democratic members of congress resided: and notwithstanding I differed from them in politics, yet, as they were, for the most part, companionable fellows, not at all addicted to abstruse speculations, and, particularly the Virginians, rare lovers of whiskey toddy and nogg; and being myself not averse to a cheerful glass of those liquors: I passed my time, for the most part, pleasantly enough—nothing more being necessary to make oneself agreeable to these gentlemen, than to drink healths to Mr. Jefferson, damnation to the excise, and to play at all fours. To which sacrifice, for the sake of the liquor and of peace, and withal, from a wish not to offend, I did submit—a conduct, which, considering the company, the times and the temptation, none, except very flaming federalists, will, I trust, condemn. One of Mr. Smith's the printers devils, was a regular attendant at our hotel, coming daily, after congress hours, with waste paper, consisting, principally, of old newspapers and proof-sheets, which he was accustomed to sell, in great quantities, to the democratic members, for their special accommodation. This assistance I found most salutary and necessary to these gentlemen; inasmuch as they seldom returned from congress hall, without having their animal economy in a most deranged and turbulent state;—for being hard pressed by the federalists, and also gagged by the votes of their own party, the noxious humours, which used to vapour through the mouth, were driven to other channels. Quia data porta ruunt.

In these emergencies, Mr. Smith's supply was always timely, and the demand was so urgent, that as I was told, by good authority only the offals of his shop, but whole edition of democratic publications, which lay heavy on his hand, were worked off in this way. Looking one day into the basket of Mr. Smith's boy, my eye was caught by a proof-sheet of the title to a work, which seemed new and interesting, and finding, on a short examination, the performance not a whit behind its promise, I bought the whole basket load, and afterwards, from time to time obtained, by the assistance of the boy, the residue of the work, in proof-sheets, loose, as they came from the press. I was the more pleased at this incident, as I was assured by the boy, that only two or three and those head, democrats, were in the secret of the publication, and that it was intended to be produced on a sudden, just before the elections, which were about to ensue, on which, it was expected it would have the most important effects. I had not however, enjoyed my good fortune long, when the boy came to me, in great agitation, conjuring me not to inform his master, that he had been instrumental in furnishing me with the work. "For, as far as I can gather," said he, "it is to be suppressed. My master was closeted, almost all yesterday, with a short, ill-looking, spindle-shanked fellow, in black, and last night, all the journeymen were employed in delivering the edition entire, to some unknown hands, who have taken it away." Having removed the apprehensions of the boy, and moreover made him a proper pecuniary compliment, he went away satisfied. I was soon after called from Washington, and brought my prize, the work, under review, away with me, which has ever since remained in my hands, without any disclosure of its contents, except to a few select friends. I know that for this concealment, and for thus appropriating, to my exclusive use, for so long time, a treasure in some sense, belonging to the public, I shall be exposed to the malignity of the censorious. But I look for protection, to the candid and judicious. My situation in relation to Mr. Kiddnap, was very delicate. Notwithstanding frequent solicitations, I could never obtain his permission to use the advantage fortune had put into my power. What his engagements were with those, at whose instance, he had undertaken to suppress his publication, I was ignorant. To use, as my own, what had the appearance of being another's property, was difficultly reconciled with those strict notions of justice, in which I had been educated; and to involve an innocent man, from whose talents I had received so much delight, in penalties and forfeitures, of the nature and extent of which, I was not apprised, seemed altogether to militate with that excellent sentence of morality, which teaches to do unto others, as we would wish them to do unto us. But the arguments and urgency of friends, whose casuistry is not less correct than their patriotism is ardent, have overcome these scruples. I have been convinced, that what has once issued from the press, is the undoubted property of the public. My lawyers also assure me, that by a fair bona fide sale, in market overt, for such, say they, the basket of Mr. Smith's boy, was a legal property, has been vested in me, which even the author cannot controul; and that if Mr. Kiddnap sustains any inconvenience, consequent upon his engagements to suppress the publication, he, alone, will be the sufferer; such being what they term damnum absque injuria.

I have thus faithfully communicated to the public, the circumstances by which I became possessed of this work. Conformably to my engagements, I should now proceed to make the extracts, I have promised, if I did not think it will be gratifying a very natural and laudable curiosity, first to make my readers acquainted, with all the information I have been able to collect concerning the author, from whose labours they are about to receive so much pleasure and instruction. Here it would be an abundant gratification both to me and the public, if I were able to bring, in Mr. Jefferson's manner, half a dozen neighbours to swear to the particulars of his birth, breeding, and qualities. This kind of satisfaction on a disputed point being very desirable; to say nothing of the great number of captious and legal forms, which this method involves, which add mightily to the ease of the writer, and no less to his emolument; swelling the book, immoderately, at little, or no, intellectual expense. But, notwithstanding I have done my best to become acquainted with Mr. Kiddnap, my endeavours have not yet been attended with success. He has cautiously avoided answering one of the many letters, I have addressed to him, through the mail, on the subject of this publication. Whether his silence be occasioned by that oppressive modesty, which is often the companion of real desert, or whether he is apprehensive that any reply might be construed into an encouragement of this publication, I am wholly in the dark. All that I have been able, with my utmost research, to learn is, that soon after suppressing his works, he went away from Washington; not that I would suggest, that, like Mr. Wood, he absconded on this account. But, doubtless, he has retired, to enjoy, in the bosom of his family, the fruits of those exertions, which, as they were deprived of their honours, were, probably, proportionably lucrative.

With respect to the family of the Kiddnaps, my correspondents assure me, it is very numerous throughout all the ancient dominion. The founders of it were famous, in the infancy of that colony, for a species of patriotic labour, which the term indicates; and which, as it was a cheap mode of introducing a very convenient kind of property, into the country, was always popular and honourable, but of late has come to be considered one of the chief exercises of patriotism, and to be holden in the highest estimation, since Virginia has been able, by means of her black votes, to lord it over the whiter parts of the union.

To this patriotic energy, our authors' family owe their patronymic. To another highly useful talent, he is indebted for his name of baptism; which expresses with much simplicity and neatness, a very necessary operation in raising fine crops of tobacco, the staple of the country, and is never given, except to children, who exhibit, in their infancy such a solid texture of muscle and sternness of temperature, as qualify them for good negro drivers. The operation, in question, being performed by a certain instrument of agriculture, called, in the eastern states, a cat-o-nine tails, but in Virginia, it has acquired a much more homely appellation, which, for the sake of delicacy, omit. With this, the operator ploughs as deep into the naked back of his subject, as, in his opinion, may be necessary for the good of the tobacco; and, as in this, he proceeds without judge or jury, and is regulated solely by his sense of his own interest, which, in most minds, is very active, a good cultivator seldom permits a season to pass without turning up furrows, to the bone. The only limit, the wisdom of the law imposes, being that he stop short of death. An event, since the weight of slaves has been experienced, in the national elections, universally deprecated by all Virginia patriots. 'This practice says our author,' in his ninth chapter of the work under review 'is very laudable, and should never be overlooked by any scientific inquirer into the causes of the greatness of my native state. For who can hear the great Jefferson in his notes on Virginia, enumerating, what he calls 'the real destination which nature has made,' without being convinced that negroes are nothing more than animated instruments of agriculture, and that of consequence he is the best citizen, who makes them produce, in a given period, most to the commonwealth? For 'whether,' says that great man, 'the black of the negro resides in the reticular membrane, between the skin and the scarf skin, or in the scarf skin itself; whether it proceed from the colour of the blood, the colour of the bile or from that of some other secretion, the difference is fixed in nature. He next shows, that not only 'colour, figure and hair, but other physical distinctions prove a difference of race. They have less hair on the face and body. They secrete less by the kidneys, and more by the glands. Their odour is very strong and disagreeable. They are more tolerant of heat and less of cold than the whites. The difference in the structure of the pulmonary apparatus, their disposition to sleep, the transient nature of their griefs, their ardour for the female,' and other proofs of a difference, which that great philosopher recapitulates ought never to be obliterated from the memory of Virginia patriots; who owe him, indeed, the highest honours, for that glorious conclusion, which is the result of this philosophical inquiry into the negro nature, and which he couches in the following terms. 'These unfortunate differences are powerful obstacles to the emancipation of these people, and a lover of natural history, one, who views the gradations in all the races of animals, with the eye of philosophy, will excuse an effort to keep those in the department of man as distinct as nature has formed them. In other words, which is the plain meaning of this whole disquisition. Slavery is not less consonant to the law of nature, than it is to the law of Virginia. Glorious Jefferson! immortal philosopher! divinely art thou the delight of Virginia; the pride of the whole ancient dominion.'

The importance of the foregoing extract will, I trust, be a sufficient apology for this short digression. I will no longer disappoint the expectations of the public, but in my next number present some extracts in detail from this interesting work.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Madrid, July 24, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I confess myself very remiss in not answering your favour of the 21st ult. sooner. The remove of the court from Arangues to this city, and a bilious disorder which hath oppressed me more than a month, and which still affects me, hath in part been the reason. I have no news to communicate to you, which can console you for our late misfortunes; I can assure you however, that they do not deject me. Per aspera ad astra, heaven doth not intend to exempt us from the adversities, which have befallen other nations, who struggled for their liberty, by giving us almost full and instantaneous enjoyment of it. I have full confidence in the perseverance of our countrymen, they will I hope act with more vigour, in consequence of their misfortunes. I have received letters from America, dated in the end of April, and the first of May, which speak of the loss of Charleston as certain, and which foresee other successes of the enemy in the northern states, but which make no dispondence. I shall pay implicit obedience to the request you make me, with respect to your family, and you may rely upon me, when I tell you that as long as have any influence, or any friends in the councils of America, that they shall not want strenuous advocates, and this letter will always be a memento that would put me to the blush, should I be deficient in a promise, which I think myself even in justice to my country, obliged to endeavour to fulfill in the best manner possible. The Spanish, or rather allied fleet hath returned to Cadiz, except a few vessels which cruize near that port. The Ct. D'Estaing is expected at St. Ildephonso in about a week, the count being now at that place, I go there this week. I see that the courier of Europe mentions that Mr. Jay hath received his longe, &c. &c. not a word of truth, the English papers sent our commissioners from France frequently, yet a treaty was made by these same longed commissioners. I have received your cypher safe, begin when you please your observations on men and things. I shall be much obliged to you, to separate and seal up all the letters you have ever received from me, unless it be this, under a cover for me, which in case of death, which heaven forbid, you will direct to be delivered to my orders.

My best compliments to your family, and Messrs. De Neufville, and believe me ever
Your friend and servant.

W. C.

P. S. If you meet with Colonel Brice of Maryland, in Holland, treat him as a friend on my account.

Passy, July 28, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I wrote to Messrs. De Neufville by the last post in answer to theirs of the 14th, I hope they received my letter, it signified that I could accept the bills, drawn on Mr. Laurens. I find by a note of Congress on the 4th of March, that they then stopt drawing, and I am informed no more bills have been issued since. I could not relish those gentleman's proposals of mortgaging all our estates, for the little money Holland is likely to lend us. But I am obliged to them for their zeal in our cause.

I received and thank you for the protest relating to the election of the coadjutor. You seem to be too much affected with the taking of Charleston. It is so far a damage to us, as it will enable the enemy to exchange a great part of the prisoners we had in our hands. otherwise their affairs will not be much advanced by it. They have successively been in possession of the capitals of five provinces, viz. Massachusetts bay, Rhode-Island, Pennsylvania, New-York, and Georgia; but were not therefore in possession of the provinces themselves. New-York and Georgia still continue their operations as free states, and so I suppose will S. Carolina. The cannon will be recovered with the place; if not, our furnaces are constantly at work in making more. The destroying of our ships by the English, is only like shaving our beards which will grow again. Their loss of provinces, is like the loss of limb, can never again be united to their body. I was sorry to hear of your indisposition. Take care of yourself. Honey is a good thing for obstructions in the reins. I hope your health is by this time re-established.

I am less committed than you imagine in the affair between Jones and Landais. The latter was not dispossessed by me of his command, but quitted it. He afterwards took into his head to resume it, which the former's too long stay at Paris, gave him an opportunity of effecting. Captain Jones is going in the Ariel frigate to America, where they may settle their affairs as they can.

The captain Cormu of Dunkerque, who occasioned the loss of our dispatches, is himself taken by the English. I have no doubt of the truth of what Mr. White told you about the facility with which the tax was collected.

That same Baron de Wulffen has not pleased me, having left little debts behind him unpaid, though I furnished him with twenty guineas. As he had been with his brother at Verlo, before he saw you, where he might get money, I wonder at his borrowing of you.

I thank you for the vote of Congress you send me, dated the 23d of March. I imagine 484, went in that vessel to 533, and may have been detained there for convoy.

Your dispatches by M. Gillon, are in the Alliance, which sailed the 7th or 9th instant.

This will be delivered to you by his Excellency John Adams Esqr. whom I earnestly recommend to your best civilities. He has never been in Holland, and your counsels will be of use to him.

My best wishes attend you, being ever, dear Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant.

B. FRANKLIN.

Passy, August 1, 1780.

Sir,

The bearer of this, Mr. Appleton, is lately arrived from Boston. He is recommended to me as a young gentleman of excellent character, and, as such, I beg leave to introduce him to your acquaintance and civilities.

With great esteem, I am ever, dear
Sir, your most obedient, and most
humble servant,

B. FRANKLIN.

Amsterdam, September 3, 1780.

Dear Sir,

I have this moment the pleasure of yours of the 3d instant, and I thank you for your kind congratulations on the glorious news of the capture of the British fleet for the East and West Indies, by the combined fleets of France and Spain, and especially the value of the property, the number of soldiers and seamen, and especially the disappointment to the English fleet and armies, and merchants in the East and West Indies, and in North America, gives a great importance to this event. But when we consider it as a precedent, it is more interesting still. This is the only wise method of warring with Great Britain. When France and Spain shall adopt the policy of conveying their own commerce, and cruising for that of the enemy, this war will soon be brought to a conclusion. Such a capital success, in one of their first essays, will be likely to convince the two courts, as well as their marine officers, of the utility of this measure, and induce them to pursue it: which I wish with all my heart.

America would rejoice at your news, as well as at the sight of the messenger: but by a letter from London of the twenty-ninth ult. it seems that her own cruisers have done a similar favour to the Quebec fleet.

Two vessels are arrived here, one from Virginia, and one from Philadelphia. Their accounts are favourable. Kniphausen has been defeated in the Jerseys, and has retreated to New-York, as you will see by the letters of generals Washington and Green.

I saw with pleasure the revival of the American philosophical society at Philadelphia, and the establishment of an academy of arts and sciences at Boston. In a new country, and a young society, such institutions are, perhaps, more useful and necessary, than in older nations. But in order to render them more useful to the world, would it not be proper to promote some connection and correspondence between them and the academies of Europe? Would it be unworthy of any academy in Europe to send these infant societies a set of their printed memoirs or transactions? Science and literature are of no party nor nation: they belong to the great commonwealth of mankind.

I hope that one of the first objects of the new societies in America will be the formation of botanical gardens, and collections of the birds, beasts, and fishes, as well as trees and plants, which are peculiar to this country, in order to a natural history of it. An ample field this!

I am very happy, sir, at Amsterdam: and uncertain when I shall leave it. When I return, I promise myself the pleasure of seeing you at the Hague, but I shall be likely to come upon you unexpected.

Is it not wonderful that it does not occur to the friends of England in the United Provinces, that the best method they can take to shew their friendship to her is to convince her of her error. She is rushing, like a mad woman, down a precipice. Is it either humanity or friendship to spur her on?

I am amazed that avarice itself does not stimulate the misers who lend ~~her~~ money to stop their hands. If this war is continued but two years longer, these misers will lose their money. The only chance English credit has for salvation is to stop short, make peace, acknowledge American independence, and secure as great a share as she can of American commerce, before it becomes established in other channels, in two years more it will import little to American commerce whether Great Britain or not.

Can it be friendship to England to fill the universe with the most abominable lies, in order to keep up a false idea of her power, and the weakness and distress of America?

I am, sir, with sincere esteem, your friend and humble servant,

JOHN ADAMS.

Mr. Dumas.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF DODSLEY.

[The life of Dodsley, like the life of Lackington, is memorable for a similarity of early acquirements. Both were indigent, both obscure, but by economy, diligence, perseverance and enterprise, both rose to affluence and consideration. Both too, unsatisfied with selling books, aspired to the renown of composing them; and their volumes have instructed some, and amused more. Of Dodsley it certainly is no trivial praise that one of his earliest performances was written with so much felicity, and was at once so polished, and brilliant that the courtly Chesterfield, was the reputed author. His 'Toy-shop' is replete with precious gems, and exhibits no French paste of factitious lustre. But the merit of Dodsley as an editor of good books and an encourager of literary merit is perhaps still greater, than as an author. His annual register, whose editor was Burke, his Preceptor for which Johnson wrote the elaborate preface and his collection of Poems, which contained some of the finest effusions of modern wit, are lasting monuments of his judgment and taste.]

Robert Dodsley was born at Mansfield, in Nottinghamshire, in 1703. The humble situation and circumstances of his parents precluded him from the advantages of a liberal education; and his first setting out in life was in the station of a footman to the Honourable Mrs. Lowther, in which his good conduct and abilities soon brought him into notice.

In this humble sphere of life he wrote several poems, which excited so much attention, that he was encouraged to publish them under the title of 'The Muse in Liv'ry'. The collection is very little known; but it was printed in 12mo. had a very handsome list of subscribers prefixed to it, and was dedicated to Mrs. Lowther.

He was for some time footman to Dartineuf, the luxurious voluptuary, and intimate friend of Pope; and it is greatly to his honour, that he was not unwilling that his low station in the family of that epicure should be recollected, when he had raised himself to competency and affluence.

'When Lord Lyttleton's 'Dialogues of the Dead' came out, says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, 'one of which is between Apicius, an ancient epicure and Dartineuf, a modern epicure, Dodsley said to me, 'I knew Dartineuf well, for I was once his footman.'

What contributed still more to his reputation, was his writing a dramatic piece, called The Toy-Shop, built on Randolph's celebrated comedy, called 'The Muses' Looking-Glass,' 4to, 1638; which being shown in manuscript to Pope, he was so well pleased with the delicacy of its satire, and the simplicity of its design, that he took the author under his protection; and though he had no connection with the theatres, procured him such an interest as ensured its being immediately brought on the stage.

It was acted at Covent Garden theatre, in 1735, with very great success, and when printed, was received with much applause by the public. The hint of it is taken from Randolph's play; but he has so perfectly modernized it, that he has made it perfectly his own, and rendered it one of the justest, and at the same time the best natured rebukes that fashionable absurdity perhaps ever met with. It contains many lively, pointed, and satirical strokes on the vices and follies of the age; the characters are distinct and appropriate; and though it is better calculated for the closet than the stage, it is still received with no small applause.

Pope's warm and zealous patronage of Dodsley is noticed in a malignant epistle from Curll, to that celebrated poet, in 1737.

'Tis kind a Livory Muse to aid,
Who scribbles farces to augment his trade,
When you, and Spence, and Glover drive the nail,
The devil's in it, if the plot should fail.

The world has long been ruled by an opinion which is not yet entirely removed, that talents and prudence are incompatible qualities; that it is not easy for a man to be a wit without mortgaging his estate; and that a poet must necessarily be in debt, and live in a garret.

It was Dodsley's good fortune to prove, if any proof were wanting, that a man's cultivating his understanding is no impediment to improving his fortune, and that it is very possible for a man to be an author, without neglecting business.

The pecuniary advantages which Dodsley had derived from his first publication, and from the success of his Toy-Shop, were applied by him to a very wise and useful purpose. Instead of adopting the precarious situation of a town writer, he determined to engage in some profitable business; and the business he fixed upon was happily suited to his literary taste, and favourable to his connection with men of learning.

In 1735, he opened a bookseller's shop in Pall-Mall; and such was the effect of Pope's recommendation and assistance, and of his own good character and behaviour, that he soon obtained not only the countenance of persons of the first abilities, but also of those of the first rank; and in a few years he rose to great eminence in his profession.

His shop became the fashionable resort of persons of literature and rank; and he reckoned Chesterfield, Lyttleton, Spence, Glover, Shenstone, Dr. Johnson, and other distinguished characters, in the number of his friends.

His employment as a bookseller did not prevent his pursuing the bent of his genius as an author. In 1737, he brought on the stage at Drury-Lane theatre, a farce called The King, and the Miller of Mansfield, which met with very great success. The plot of the piece is founded on a traditional story in the reign of Henry II; of this story he had made a very pleasing use, and wrought it out into a truly dramatic conclusion. The dialogue is natural, yet elegant; the satire poignant, yet genteel; the sentiments are such as do honour to both his head and heart; and the catastrophe, though simple, yet affecting and perfectly just. The scene lies in and near the Miller's house in Sherwood Forest, near Nottingham; and he had probably an additional pleasure in the choice of his subject from the connection of it with his native place.

O native Sherwood! happy were thy bard,
Might these his rural notes to future times,
Boast of tall groves that nodding o'er thy plain,
Rose to their tuneful melody.—

The year following, his Sir John Cockle at Court, a farce, was acted at Drury-Lane. It is a sequel to the King and Miller of Mansfield, in which, the miller newly made a knight, comes up to London with his family, to pay his compliments to the king. It is not, however, equal in merit to the first part; for though the king's disguising himself, in order to put Sir John's integrity to the test, and the latter's resisting every temptation, not only of bribery, but of flattery, is ingenious, and gives an opportunity for many admirable strokes of satire, yet there is a simplicity and fitness for the drama in the turn of the former production, which it is scarcely possible to come up to in the circumstances that arise from the conduct of Sir John Cockle at Court.

The Miller of Mansfield, and its sequel, exhibits an interesting contrast between the unadorned solidity of country manners, and the splendid vices of a court; the blunt honesty of a miller, and the slender importance of a monarch without his attendants, in a sequestered spot, and in midnight darkness. It has several pleasing songs, which from some of them continuing still to be popular, must have merit.

His next dramatic performance was The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, a ballad farce, which, according to Mr. Victor, was acted at Drury-Lane, in 1739-40, but Mr. Reed says in 1741, but without much success. It is on the same story with Day's comedy of 'The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green,' 4to, 1659.

In 1744, he published A Collection of Plays, by old Authors, in 12 vols. 12mo. which was a valuable acquisition to the literary world. It has been highly improved in the second edition, published by Mr. Reed, in 1780; in which, besides an excellent preface, and very useful notes, some plays before inserted are rejected, and others of greater merit are introduced in their room.

In 1745, he produced a dramatic piece, called Rex et Pontifex, 8vo., being an attempt to introduce upon the stage a new species of pantomime. It does not, however, appear to have been represented at any of our theatres.

In 1746, he published The Museum, or Literary and Historical Register, in 3 vols. 8vo., to which Dr. Johnson, and other men of genius, were contributors.

In 1748, he collected his several dramatic pieces, which had been separately printed, and published them in one volume 8vo., under the modest title of Trifles.

On the occasion of the singing the treaty of peace, at Aix-la-Chapelle, he wrote The Triumph of Peace, a masque, which was set to music by Dr. Arne, and performed at the theatre in Drury-Lane, in 1748-9.

In 1749, he published that eminently useful school-book, The Preceptor, in 2 vols. 8vo. The design of this work was framed by Dodsley, and the execution of it was accomplished by several of the distinguished writers of the age.

In 1750, he published a small work, which, for a short time had a very great celebrity, under the title of 'The Economy of Human Life, translated from an Indian manuscript, written by an ancient Bramin; to which is prefixed, an account of the manner in which the said manuscript was discovered, in a Letter from an English Gentleman, now residing in China, to the Earl of——.' Besides the apocryphal introduction of this work into the world, it derived a temporary popularity from its being universally ascribed to the Earl of Chesterfield. This supposition was strengthened by a letter that had been addressed to his Lordship by Mrs. Teresa Constantia Philips, in which she had complimented him on being the author of The Whole Duty of Man. She had probably heard an account of the Earl's letters to his son. However this may have been, the power of literary fashion procured the Economy of Human Life a rapidity and extensiveness of sale, and a height of applause which it would not have obtained had it been known to be the production of a bookseller. The work, upon the whole, is not without a considerable share of merit. The subjects are well chosen, the advice is good, the style is succinct and frequently nervous; but it is deficient in that strength and energy, that vividness of imagination, and that luminousness of metaphor, which pervade those parts of scripture that were intended to be imitated, and which occur in the genuine oriental writings.

The popularity of Dodsley's performance produced a number of imitations: 'The second part of the Economy of Human Life,' 'Appendix,' 'The Economy of a Winter Day,' 'The Economy of Female Life,' 'The Economy of the Sexes,' 'Complete Economy for the Female-Sex,' 1751, and 'The Economy of the Mind,' 1767.

In 1752, he obliged the lovers of poetry, by the publication of 'A Collection of Poems, by Eminent Hands. vol. 1st, 2d, and 3d, 12mo. Several of his own little pieces are inserted at the close of the 3d volume. The 4th volume of this elegant and valuable miscellany appeared in 1735, and the 5th and 6th volumes, which completed the collection, in 1758. The pieces of which it consists are not all equally valuable; but perhaps a more excellent miscellany is not to be found in any language. By this collection he performed a very acceptable service to the cause of genius and taste, as it has been the means of preserving several productions of merit, which might otherwise have sunk into oblivion. A judicious selection of pieces omitted by Dodsley, was given to the world by the editor of 'A collection of the most esteemed pieces of poetry that have appeared for several years: with variety of originals, by the late Moses Mendez, Esq. and other contributors to Dodsley's collection. To which this is designed as a supplement,' printed for Richardson and Urquhart, in 1 vol. 12mo, 1767, 1770. The work is indebted for a more extensive supplement to Dodsley, to the valuable 'Collections' of Mr. Pearch, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1768, 1770; and of Mr. Nichols, with biographical and historical notes, in 8 vols, 1780, 1782. The collection printed for Urquhart and Richardson is commonly, but erroneously ascribed to Mendez, who died in 1758. His imitations of Spenser, and other poems, are highly deserving of republication, and were originally recommended by the present writer to be inserted in this collection of classical English poetry.

The subject of his next publication was Public Virtue, a didactic poem, which was intended to be comprised in three books, including 1st, Agriculture 2d, Commerce, 3d, Arts; of this truly useful and valuable undertaking, the first book on Agriculture, was published in 1754, 4to. and was all that was accomplished by Dodsley. It is probable that the reception and sale of the poem did not encourage him to complete his design.

In 1758, he published Melpomene; or, the Regions of Terror and Pity, an Ode, 4to. This ode was eagerly read on its first appearance, and is justly regarded as one of the happiest efforts of his muse.

His next publication was 'The Annual Register, or a View of the History, Politics, and Literature of the year 1758; a very valuable work, which has been continued to the present time.

- The same year his Cleone, a tragedy, was acted at the theatre in Covent Garden; and met with very great success. An imperfect hint towards the fable of this tragedy was taken from the 'Legend of St. Genevieve,' written originally in French, and translated into English in the last century, by Sir William Lower. The first sketch of it, consisting then of three acts only, was shown to Pope two or three years before his death, who informed Dodsley, that in his very early youth he had attempted a tragedy on the same subject, which he afterwards destroyed, and he advised him to extend his plan to five acts. It was first offered to Garrick, but he refused it; principally, as it should seem, because it contained no character in which he could have figured himself. To prevent its success, he appeared in a new part on the first night of its appearance. This scheme had no effect; for the play rose about all opposition, and had a long and crowded run; the character of Cleone received every possible advantage from the exquisite performance of Mrs. Bellamy, whose peculiar merit, in this part, contributed, in a great degree, to promote the run of the piece. The prologue was written by Mr. Melmoth, and the epilogue by Mr. Shenstone.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LEVITY.

[The numerous victims of the present fashionable nakedness excite, at once, pity and indignation. With a view to correct this folly, during the present severe weather, which, indeed, ought alone to work a reformation, the following essay was written. The wit and genius of our correspondent sparkle brilliantly in this playful composition, and we are of opinion that his poignant sarcasms will cause many a coquet to multiply her petticoats, and double her gauze.]

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

I was called, not long ago, to attend the funeral of a young lady, who perished in the bloom of life, by a rapid decline. Her disease was attributed, by one of the mourning relatives, to a cold, caught by exposing herself one evening in the present fashionable dress to cold, damp air, under circumstances peculiarly dangerous. 'Poor girl,' said Philander, she mistook her case. This pithy declaration, and still more the manner in which it was made, excited curiosity. I, among others, asked an explanation. He smiled, spoke of something else, and then whispered 'come and breakfast at my lodgings to-morrow.'

Though my visit was not very early, I found him in bed. To excuse himself, he said 'I was detained later than usual last evening by a friend, whose health will not suffer by thin petticoats.' This strange apology by no means blunted my curiosity. The same thing from some of my acquaintance would have past as a whimsical gasconade: but Philander is not that sort of man

He is rather taciturn than loquacious, and remarkable for the modest deference of his behaviour, especially to the other sex, with whom he is a great favourite, though he is neither handsome in his person, fashionable in his dress, nor sprightly in his conversation.

He declined answering my questions till after the breakfast was set on table. He then sent away his servant, and began as follows. 'What I said yesterday, Eugenius, at the funeral, surprised you. This was natural enough. It referred to circumstances with which you are unacquainted. Perhaps, (said he, after a short pause), it would be as well for mankind that they should be kept a profound secret by the initiated; I have, however, a particular reason for communicating them to you. It can be done most conveniently by anecdotes, respecting the fashionable dress, which I learnt in my late tour through a part of Europe, and which have furnished me since with contemplative amusement, and practical enjoyment. A young lady of rank had received from the bounty of nature an overflow of constitutional sensibility: at the slippery age of fifteen, whenever she saw a handsome man pass by the window, her countenance was animated by a fervid glow, a gentle tremor ran along her frame, her large blue eyes sparkled with uncommon lustre, and were then suffused mild and languid; after a gentle sigh, her tranquillity was restored. Appearances of this sort occurred so often, that they could not escape attention. The experience of a fond mother readily understood those indications of extreme modesty; for such they seemed to her father, and his maiden sister, a slim perpendicular model of sharp cornered chastity, then in her fiftieth year. Mamma was too well bred to contradict her sagacious lord. Prudent women, you know, never open a field for conjecture in which their friends and connections may stumble over any thing unpleasant. But her parental tenderness was alarmed. In the meantime, the susceptible Amanda became every day more and more lovely, as her buds of beauty opened into bloom. Already her swelling hips had exceeded the meagre limit, assigned by statuary to Diana, and might have served as a model to Titian for the goddess of Love. It was with a view to this as well as to other circumstances, that when Amanda first accompanied her mother to a public place, she appeared with but one petticoat, and that a thin one. To say that she was followed, admired, adored, is needless. This has already been said a thousand times upon similar occasions. Her youth, her beauty, that sweet suffusion of countenance, and the continued play of features, prompted by a mind intelligent, and a sensible heart, were, indeed, irresistible. Some how or other, perhaps from the thinness of her dress, Amanda's secret got wind, and in the luxurious capitals of Europe there is no lack of reapers for the field of gallantry. Mamma was watchful, but even Honour sometimes sleeps. It so happened, that one evening while she was engaged with an agreeable friend in pleasant conversation, Lothario found means, in half an hour's visit, to explain the whole theory of moral sentiment to the tender and delighted Amanda. This lesson had the same effect on his charming scholar, which Virgil supposes to have been produced by the western breeze, sape sine ullis conjugiis, vento gravide mirabile dictu! Mamma, who could justly say, in the language of that charming poet, non ignara mali miseris succurrere disco, shortly after these interesting conversations, made a further improvement on the dress of her daughter, so that Amanda came out more beautiful than ever with a short waist, and no petticoat at all!

'By degrees the fashion was followed and understood. Ladies, who had the same feelings, put on the same dress. One of them (who, on some occasion or other, had read medical books), called it the cool diet, and insisted on it as the proper treatment for inflammatory cases. Fashions, you know, are generally carried to excess; but that which, in the degree, is proper and becoming to one person, is, in the extreme, ridiculous and even dangerous to others. Not only those ladies, who were conscious of quick sensibility, stripped themselves for use, but others, to whom the cool diet was by no means needful, went half naked for ornament. Not a few took up the fashion as a symbol.' As a symbol, cried I, how can that be? 'That,' (said Philander), is among the mysteries which I mean to communicate. Certain ladies, who, by the warmth of imagination, supply the coldness of constitution, resemble epicures, who take medicines to create appetite. By such persons the most delicate viands are swallowed without relish, and the difference they experience between expectation and reality, leads them to suppose there still remains untasted some precious morsel, which may stimulate their languid organs to enjoyment. But, however it might suit the barefaced luxury of a monarch to offer a premium for the discovery of some new pleasure, the laws of decorum forbid a fashionable woman to hold out direct invitation; and, indeed, such conduct might defeat its own purpose, and rather repel than attract. It was thought, therefore, most advisable to make an ostentatious display of the cool diet, because to those who should consider it as dictated by the consciousness of an irritable organization it would prove a strong incitement, and inspire that enterprising spirit, which conduces to victory both in love and war.

'Thus you see, my dear Eugenius, there are two classes of women, one to whom the ventilating system is necessary, and one to whom it is more than unnecessary. Yet both are the easy objects of gallantry: so that in a country, where women are properly instructed, you may safely consider those who use it as thrown into your arms by the excess of nature, or the extravagance of fancy. There is, indeed, and particularly in this country, a third sort, who follow the fashion, either without knowing what it means, or else as a guard against danger to which they are not exposed. Our poor friend, whom we followed yesterday to the grave, was of this last description, and of course the cool-diet occasioned her death.' Of course! said I with astonishment. 'Yes, of course—You have doubtless heard it observed, that if a severe pedagogue be set over a lad of mild and feeble temper, he will infallibly break the boy's spirit; and you must be sensible that the curb which is needful to rein in a fiery courser, will make a dull beast go backward.'

'And now, said he, Eugenius, I must tell you my reason for giving this information. I have been here six months. During the first three, I was employed in making observations, for I know, by experience, the importance of beginning well, be the undertaking what it may. During the last three months I have turned my observations to account; and the business grows so fast upon my hands, that I wish for a fellow-labourer in the vineyard.'

I must acknowledge, that, notwithstanding my profound respect for the maxims of the old school, I have dispositions for certain practical doctrines of the new school, which make me desire to blend them a little together in my own conduct, though I would discourage the general prevalence of those heretical opinions. Such being the case, I was not a little charmed with the kind communication of my friend; but the fear of applying, by mistake, to a lady of that third sort which he mentioned, made me desist of further information. I asked, therefore, how they were to be distinguished from each other.

'In this country, said he, it is a matter of some difficulty, because young Ladies imitate with so little discrimination that frequently what would elsewhere amount to certain proof, is here but slight presumption. I have, therefore, found it best to imitate Sailors who, when they navigate an unknown Sea, always keep the lead going, 'Keep the lead going; what do you mean by that?' I mean to imitate the blind, and those who walk in the dark. 'They, 'you know, must feel their way.' The vacancy of my countenance shewed that I did not understand him. He smiled at my simplicity, and went on. 'The manners of this country permit a number of what are called innocent familiarities. By closely observing the effect of these when only a spectator, I determine the true sense of other indications, and by the help of those little innocent familiarities, when I become the agent, save a deal of time, which might otherwise be wasted in vows and protestations.'

After conversing together an hour longer upon the same subject, I felt myself in a condition to take the field, if not as a veteran soldier, at least as a promising recruit. If you are acquainted with Ophelia, you must often have admired the rosy warmth of her ripened charms, which, exposed to the visitation of the winds, bid to their keenest blast a proud defiance. My propitious stars so ordered it, that lately, in an evening visit, I found her sitting, or I might say lying, alone on the sofa, which she had drawn before the fire. She had been reading a novel. It was open at a tender scene. We read it together. By accident and instinct my hand took hold of hers. I felt a slight and tremulous compression of her little finger. I placed the dear hand on my heart, which beat a tumultuous alarm. Her cheek was crimsoned. Her eye met the keen gaze of mine. She turned it gently to heaven, and the sigh, half suppress, gave full rotundity to her swelling bosom. My lips were applied in the eager haste of rapturous emotion. She sprung from me, trembled, and, after a few minutes, during which I believe that I looked like a fool, said coldly 'I find, sir, I am much deceived.' I muttered out, as an excuse, I know not what about passion; but as soon as I pronounced that word, she repeated it emphatically, 'passion! which all can feign, but few can feel!' She then stepped across the room with such an indignant air, that I was heartily glad to be relieved by the arrival of young Florio. He sparkled, as usual, in the gaiety of the jolly god, but neither of us caught his mirth. Indeed, she seemed a little displeased with his visit, and gave me, unobserved, a look of gentle reproach, which I feel to this moment. Now it happens that my friend Phikander is on a tour to the northern and eastern states, and I cannot tell, without his assistance, how it is with me and Ophelia. I thought I had followed his advice, and cast my lead with due skill and industry. Nay, I thought I had good soundings; and, after all, it is but a broken voyage. I am not yet quite up to this business, and, therefore, cannot tell whether it is she, or I who have mistaken her case. If you, or one of your experienced correspondents, will explain the matter, you will much oblige, dear sir, yours,

EUGENIUS.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

Died, at London, the chevalier de Sainte Croix, a French emigrant, of much celebrity. He was held in high esteem, by the late king of France, and was equally attached to his sovereign; there was a mutual confidence between him; which subsisted several years. After the peace of 1763, the king intended him for his ambassador to the British court: but the parties and factions, which, at that time, prevailed in the French cabinet, thwarted his majesty's inclination. However, he has, at different times, been charge des affaires and ambassador to almost every court in Europe. He spoke the English language with tolerable fluency, and wrote some tracts in the English language. For a short time, he was secretary of state for foreign affairs; but when the king was forcibly brought from Versailles to Paris, he resigned his situation, and soon after came to England. He was held in considerable esteem, by the late ministry, and was often consulted by them. His knowledge and reading, being very extensive, his society was much esteemed, by the superior classes. His personal manners were those of the most polite and well-bred gentleman. He was supported, in England, by the munificence of his friends; and it is believed, he received some elymosinary benefits from persons in England. He bore his misfortunes with singular good temper, and becoming magnanimity. He died in his 60th year.

Dallas's "Percival, or Nature Vindicated, is a work, warmly recommended by the anti-jacobin reviewers, to the serious attention of all parents and guardians.

The great and avowed objects of the author, are, to rescue moral sentiment from the chains of false shame, to fortify the minds of the fair sex, to expose the wiles of seduction, to give an exalted idea of marriage, to justify the rules of society, and to paint an elevated view of human nature; objects which clearly and justly suggested the second title of the work, "Nature vindicated.—Among the principles of this work, we find, throughout, the rules of society forcibly inculcated. Mr. Dallas, (reader, it is R. C. Dallas) therefore, is no jacobin or leveller. The following strong and well-chosen expressions, used by Stormont, must not here be omitted; himself an agonized sufferer, from the successes of one of those agents of hell, against the person of a wife, he might otherwise have lived with in love and mutual bliss.—"Oh seduction! diabolical art! Do not, Percival, think I would wound you, by alluding to the individual instance of it, that has destroyed my happiness. * My apostrophe is aimed at the crime alone. The devil's first crime was ingratitude; seduction was his second—second in succession, but first and foremost in mischief. By the one, he damned himself alone; by the other, he spread damnation, and blighted every joy.

* Whom he at that time supposed to have been the brother of Percival.

The review is concluded in the following words.

We must now take our leave of this pleasing, instructive and well-written performance, with a few remarks on its style.—We can say of this novel, what we have not always an opportunity to say of the productions, in general, which come before us; it is ENGLISH; it is written in the pure language of our country; on that account, were its other merits not allowed to influence our recommendation, we should press it upon the attention of parents, who allow their daughters to read what are called (but are not always so deserving, as his, of the title) good novels. The 97th letter from Percival, to madame de St. Valeri, (miss Coverly) subdued, at length, by reason and reflection, we particularly select from the whole, as one of the most finished, most elegant, and most instructive letters, we ever read in any book whatever. Having said thus much of the work altogether, we have revised our sentiments, and are happy to declare, that we have not said too much.

Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Siddons.—In spite of the ill-founded contempt this great man professed to entertain for actors, he persuaded himself to treat Mrs. Siddons with great politeness, and said, when she called on him, and Frank, his servant, could not immediately get a chair, you see, madam, wherever you go, there are no seats to be got.

In Britain, every man has a right to be tried by his peers—except an author!

John Selden used to say,—marriage is a desperate thing: the frogs in Æsop, were extreme wise; they had a great mind to some waters, but they would not leap into the well, because they could not get out again.

Cowper's opinion of Lavater—I have read most of Lavater's aphorisms; they appear to me some of them, wise, many of them whimsical, a few of them false, and not a few of them extravagant. Nil illi medium—If he finds in a man, the feature or quality that he approves, he deifies him; if the contrary, he is a devil. His verdict is, in neither case, a just one.

Many a man, says Dr. South, would have made a very good pulpit, who would have made a very bad figure, if he had been put into it himself.

Lawyers. A proclamation was issued on the 6th day of November, and twentieth year of the first James, in which the voters for members of parliament are directed not to choose curious and wrangling lawyers, who seek reputation, by stirring needless questions.

In Aleyn's Hist. London 1638, we find the following:

—A prating lawyer, (one of those which cloud That honoured science) did their conduct take; He talk'd all law, and the tumultuous croud, Thought it had been all gospel that he spake. At length these fools, their common error saw, A lawyer on their side, but not the law!

No man was ever more able to appreciate the merits of deservng, none mor inclined to expose the errors and deformities of wicked authors, than Doctor SAMUEL JOHNSON;—a name ever dear to the friends of religion and learning; and a w i e r, whose works, while these handmaids to human wants are held in veneration among men, will never cease to convey admonition to the profligate, and knowledge to the ignorant.

The earl of Carlisle, a recent and a youthful poet, has committed a ludicrous blunder in his "Step-mother, Act 2, sc. 1. He informs us, that women express their grief, at the circumstance of a rape, by neighing:

We soldiers love the roaring of great guns,
The neighing of war horses and of matrons
Violated, and all such martial noises.

Pun. The following is one of the good Puns that I have met with.

Judges are Gods, and he who made them so,
Meant not men should be forc'd to them to go
By means of angels.

It occurs, in Dr. Donne's 5th satire—The reverend writer playson the word angels, which signifies both a messenger and a coin.

A good artist who has long observed the perpetual struggle which female fashion has to maintain against her two greatest enemies, nature and convenience, has contrived an entire new. "Dress for Ladies" which while it satisfies the minutest inspection of a lover's eye with the sight of charms hitherto "invisible," or but "dimly seen," is calculated to protect the tender female frame against the rudest attacks of wind and weather it is made of compleat glass, the advantages of which must be many and obvious. Ladies, by this means, will carry about with them at once, a mirror, and an emblem, in which, while they dress themselves, they may study themselves. Cased in this suit, a lover would as soon think of flying, as offering to be rude, as he would infallibly cut his finger in the attempt. Even an invading conqueror would abate something of his impetuosity, and respect the innocent contents, for the sake of the dangerous envelope which held them. The projector has laid in a stock of glass, to customers of all ranks and degrees, as plate glass for the nobility, green glass for young maidens, and flawed glass for courtezans.

The following is a verbal translation of an Ink-maker's shop Bill in China. From the style and spirit of this article, we are led to believe that a strong resemblance exists between the Chinese, and the true Indian.

SINGONE, the name of the place, where the Ink is manufactured, and whence it derives its name.

Very good Ink, very fine, very old shop, Grandfather, Father, and self make this ink; fine and hard, very hard, pick'd out very fine and black, before and now. Sell very good ink, prime cost is very dear; this Ink is heavy, so is gold; no one can make like it; the others, that make ink do it for money, and to cheat. I only make it good, for a name. Plenty of Gentlemen know my Ink; my family never cheat: always a good name. I make Ink for the Emperor, and all the mandarins round. All Gentlemen must come to my shop, and know my name
UNGWANCHI LOCEE.

A Gentleman sometime since, ascended in a balloon, accompanied by a lady; after having risen to a considerable height, he proposed to salute her; this the lady then refused, adding 'that at any other time, she should not have the least objection upon earth.'

Taking titles are all the vogue in London Miss Plumtree having lately published Something New, a droll author has followed her with three volumes of 'Nothing New.'

The travels of a Comet.—(From the French)—"After having run a considerable career, the Comet quartered itself the first night, between the horns of Capricorn.—what a bed! the next night, it reposed itself on the Dragon's tail—what a spot! the following evening, it got into company with a minor Bear—what a society! it then paid a visit to the heel, the leg of Heracles!"

In Belturbet church-yard, Ireland, is this inscription—"Here lies John Higley, whose father and mother were drowned in their passage from America. Had they both lived they would have been buried here.

THE RANZ DES VACHES OF SWITZERLAND Translated.

The Ranz des Vaches was inserted in the 6th number of the Port Folio.—Its simplicity recalling, on perusal some days ago, the scenery of a particular part of his former country, induced the gentleman who sends us the following to translate it, while under the influence of that maladie du pays, which gave birth to the original. Some of our readers may have seen a translation of it in the Port Folio No. 15.—Notwithstanding which we hope the one we now offer will be thought worthy of notice,

Oh! when shall I that happy moment prove,
To see again the objects of my love!

Our lakes and our riv'lets so clear,
Our hill and our mountains so high,
Our hamlets to mem'ry so dear
And our vales that with Tempe might vie!

Oh! when shall I that happy moment prove,
To see again those happy objects of my love!

When, under the shade of the tree,
To the sound of the shepherd's soft pipe,
Shall the sweet Isabella with me
Dance gayly again by moonlight!

Oh! when shall I that happy moment prove,
To see again those objects of my love!

My father and mother so dear;
My brothers and sisters so kind;
My lambs and my flocks that were there;
My charmer so long left behind!

Oh! when shall I that happy moment prove,
To see again those objects of my love! D.
[Anti-Democrat.]

It is said that the committee of our legislature who unanimously adopted a resolution to call three of the judges of the Supreme court before them to answer certain charges brought against them by Thomas Passmore, have reconsidered their resolution, and determined merely to call Thomas Passmore and his witnesses before them, in order to procure their testimony. Probably somebody has kindly told these sage legislators what they did not know themselves, that they have no power to compel the appearance of judges to answer to any accusation whatever.

The National Intelligencer of the 27th, has the following paragraph.

The Members of Congress Dine together to-day, and next week give a Ball, in celebration of the acquisition of Louisiana. This example will, we have no doubt, be generally followed by the citizens of the United States, who appreciate, as highly as their Representatives, this great event.

[ib.]

Married lately in New Hampshire, Mr. William Longfellow to Miss Elizabeth Short.—There are some good matches, some bad matches, and even some happy matches; but this may be said to be no match at all.

THE RULE OF RIGHT.

If the United States have lost, say, a hundred thousand dollars by Mr. Jefferson's putting Mr. Livingston into Mr. Harrison's office without any necessity or good cause, ought not so fine a patriot and philosopher as Mr. Jefferson to pay the loss himself?—Or, if he should be President another four years, and it should be stopped out of his salary, which is twenty-five thousand dollars a year, would no 25,000 dollars multiplied by 4, the number of years, produce, according to the rule of three, 100,000 dollars, the exact amount of the judgment already obtained against Mr. Livingston at the suit of the United States. [Fred. Her.]

A PUZZLE.

Mr. Jefferson, we find by the papers, has appointed a person to the office of District attorney of New-York, which office we know was held by Edward Livingston, Esq. Now we want some democratic printer to tell us, what has become of Mr. Livingston, and what is the meaning of this new appointment. Can it be that Mr. Livingston is dismissed from office? And if so, for what? Why all this silence about the matter? Why can't we get one word about it from the Jeffersonians? And why won't they open their—
'poor, poor dumb mouths
And bid them speak.' [ibid.]

Examining the fragments of writing which have come down to us from the times of monkish darkness, when the human understanding, as well as conscience, was kept in fetters, and the churchmen of the day contrived to make a monopoly of learning, by shutting out, as far as they could, the laity from the use of letters, we find a most deplorable want of that sententious wisdom, which distinguished the latter end of Paganism, and of that wit, which has rendered the face of the civilized world so illustrious since the revival of learning—or, to use the words of Dr. Johnson, 'Since learning triumph'd o'er her barbarous foes.' All was, during that time, quaint quibble, or miserable conceit, and those continued for a long time afterwards to be affected by the greatest men. Shakspeare now stands a signal instance of it. Sometimes, however, we find a lucky thought in the rubbish of those times, and among those we consider one which has been noticed by Lord Bacon. 'One of the Fathers, says his Lordship, saith that there is this difference between the death of old men and young men: that old men go to death, and death comes to young men.' [Charleston Courier.]

Some years since, a gentleman in Scotland observed a post boy, and another lad, dismount from their horses, and proceed to playing quoits. The gentleman could not contain his indignation at this neglect of an important duty, but rode up and exercised his whip on the post boy. The other lad begged not to be treated in the same way, as he 'was ONLY an express!' [ib.]

Among other instances of deviation from instinct, mentioned in a late British publication, is that of a buck rabbit. A spaniel dog and a cat were in the same house with him; and they all ate and slept together. They were often seen before the fire, the dog at the bottom, the cat over him, and the rabbit stretched across the cat.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In numbers tun'd to unaffected woe,
To thee, dear maid, I bid my sorrows flow,
Convinc'd within thy feeling breast to find
The balm of comfort for a weary mind.
Oh! what extatic pleasures fir'd my soul,
While o'er our heads the down-wing'd moments stole,

And love light hovering in the fragrant air,
To give a zest to every joy was there!
What though no more I clasp my Hannah's charms

In the fond circle of a lover's arms,
What though no more ambrosial sweets I sip
From the rich ruby of her smiling lip,
What though no more the languish of her eye,
Her head declin'd, and gently heaving sigh,
Bless my fond sight, and firm assurance prove
That her fair soul is form'd for tenderest love;
While now cold Prudence, with a cautious air,
Moves me reluctant from the melting fair,
Yet all these pleasures could I well resign,
Convinc'd her heart, her yielding heart, is mine,
Did but a constant correspondence prove
The dear memorial of unalter'd love:
But ah! while now through each revolving day
My breast accuses loitering love's delay,
How can I fancy's mournful views controul,
Or check the fears that agitate my soul?
Can she be wavering?—no—the thought I scorn,
Of jealousy and frantic passion born—
Oh! jealousy, thy cold, reverted eye,
Thy heaving bosom, and thy ponderous sigh,
I will not own;—all tyrant as thou art,
Thou shalt not lord it o'er my faithful heart.
But, O my soul! whence these foreboding fears?
Whence that deep sigh, and whence these streaming tears?

Does dire disease with tottering step advance,
And in her bosom fix his burning lance?
Methinks I see her mournful friends around,
And catch her sorrows' lamentable sound.
Through the lone day these griefs my thoughts employ,

And chase each faint, each fleeting sense of joy.

And round my couch at night, (the couch of pain),

Sad fancy's terrors rise renew'd again;
Grief's pallid train my shudd'ring soul affright,
And forms unusual burst upon my sight;
Methinks with thee thro' aromatic groves
I stray, surrounded by the laughing loves;
Gay spring before us strews the path with flowers,
And melting music warbles from the bowers;
Down the green slope a wildly winding stream
Murmurs and sparkles to the solar beams;
Sudden the tempest heaven's bright glory shrouds,
And thick and thicker fly the sable clouds;
Through the deep gloom the lightning's livid
glare,

Sweeps in broad curves, and seems to fire the air,

While o'er our heads the thunders roll around,
And deafning echos catch the awful sound,
And night's tremendous crew, with aspect pale,
And shape terrific, flit along the vale,
Another flash succeeds, and lo! the maid
I most revere a lifeless corse is laid!—
Instant, and though with sleep the vision flies,
Should I once more to slumber close my eyes,
Perhaps upon some mountain's breezy brow
We view the ocean's placid waves below,
At distance far the posting sails descrie,
Like some fair cloud just dropping from the sky,
And as their safe return we bend to greet,
The faithless bank betrays our trusting feet;
Down, down we sink; but I, not doom'd to share,
Unhappy youth! the fortunes of the fair,

Preserv'd from death and left behind to see,
What doubly wounds my breast, the loss of thee.

In pity, Hannah, to a love like mine,
Send from thy hand the soul-consoling line,
Or, if I may not this full blessing prove,
At least these tortures of suspense remove,
'Tis all I ask;—if, with destructive sway,
Sickness shall tear each bud of bliss away,
Still shall my soul, to generous feelings true,
The path which love and duty point pursue;
Or should celestial health, without alloy,
Lead thee in rapture through the realms of joy,
Thou'lt not forbid my votive muse to stray,
A soft companion on the flow'ry way,
To cull poetic blossoms, and to braid
A breathing garland in th' embow'ring shade,
To deck the ringlets of my lovely maid!

SONG.

In vain to me the zephyr blows,
And vainly blooms the vernal bow'r,
Down my sad cheek the tear-drop flows,
And sighs consume the pensive hour:
Ne'er must the briny torrent stay,
Till Delia wipes the tear away;
Ne'er must my bosom cease to sigh,
Till kindness re-illumes her eye.

Why did the gentle maiden rove
From rural scenes, from rural joys?
Why, when I dar'd to disapprove,
Did she resent the friendly voice?
Ah! rather say, thou simple swain,
When Delia left this peaceful plain,
Why did'st not thou, with ready care,
Attend the footsteps of the fair.

Ah! would she bless my longing eyes,
Would she but smile on me once more,
Then ne'er should chiding damp our joys,
Henceforth my every care were o'er:
Then lay thy every care aside,
Sweetly the generous damsel cry'd,
As through the grove, with blushing charms,
She sprung into her Damon's arms.

PSALM 137.

As down in the vale all dejectedly laid,
Her star-pointing turrets where Babylon rears,
When russet-rob'd evening had spread her dun
shade,
We mournfully swell'd the slow tide with our tears.

Upon the green willows that wav'd o'er the stream,
Our harps all untun'd we neglectingly hung,
No more we attempted the heart-cheering theme,
No more flow'd the heav'n prompted hymn from our tongue.

When down the low valley, with looks full of pride,
Our laurel-crown'd victors came stately along,
And give us, ye Hebrews, they tauntingly cried,
Come! give us the notes of your Sion's sweet
song.

How can we, far distant from Solyma's towers,
Our harps, all untun'd, in soft music employ?
How can we call forth gentle harmony's powers
To indulge an ill-tim'd, an unnatural joy?

Should I be forgetful of Sion's blest vale,
From my heart should the deep fix'd impressions
decay,

May my fingers to guide the gay strings ever
fail,
May my tongue still refuse to pour forth the soft lay.

Oh! father, enthron'd in the mansions of love,
Whose frowns can destroy, and whose smile can restore,
May Edom the fate of captivity prove,
And feel the distresses thy people deplore.

For, O! when the sword of the mighty is nigh,
When the hand of destruction spreads horror
around,
O'erturn that proud temple exulting they cry,
And level those towers of defence with the ground.

And shortly, ah! Babylon, thou too shalt drain
From the cup of affliction the bitters of woe,
The queen of all nations no more shalt thou reign,
But all thy proud honours be humbled and low.

Nay, blest shall they be who in fury arise,
And pierce at the breast the dear pledges of
love,
Whose bosoms regard not the tenderest ties,
Whose pity no moans of misfortune can move.

SELECTED POETRY.

[A good translation of the works of Anacreon, say the English reviewers, has long been a desideratum in English literature. We are happy to declare it as our opinion that this desideratum is now ably supplied. Mr. Moore seems to have a clear perception of the peculiar graces of the original, and has not been unsuccessful in transfusing them into his native language. His versification is at once polished and easy; and he has imitated, as far, perhaps, as was possible in a translation, that concise simplicity of phrase, which renders the odes of Anacreon so attractive.]

ODE IX.

I pray thee, by the gods above,
Give me the mighty bowl I love,
And let me sing, in wild delight,
'I will, I will be mad to night!'
Alcmeon once, as legends tell,
Was frenzied by the fiends of hell;
Orestes too, with naked tread,
Frantic pac'd the mountain head;
And why? a murder'd mother's shade
Before their conscious fancy play'd.
But I can ne'er a murderer be,
The grape alone shall bleed by me,
Yet can I rave in wild delight,
'I will, I will, be mad to night.'
The son of Jove, in days of yore,
Imbrued his hands in youthful gore,
And brandish'd, with a maniac joy,
The quiver of the expiring boy;
And Ajax, with tremendous shield,
Infuriate scour'd the guiltless field.
But I, whose hands no quiver hold,
No weapon but this flask of gold,
The trophy of whose frantic hours
Is but a scatter'd wreath of flowers;
Yet, yet can I sing, with wild delight,
'I will, I will be mad to night.'

The classical reader, after perusing this sally of jovial enthusiasm, will remember the dulcest desipere, and the non sanius bacchabor of the carousing HORACE.

No. 81.

Vox populi vox dei.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

TO the cosmopolite, in spirit, I know of no more consolatory reflection, or, to the eye of philanthropy, a more exhilarating prospect, than the striking and universal pre-eminence of the modern over the ancient world, even when in the zenith of its reputation, and in the most celebrated eras of its renown. Human reason towers in flights, far beyond the ken of Grecian or Roman philosophy to reach, or their presciences to anticipate; and irradiations of light have beamed upon the world, to whose splendour the boasted perfection of antiquity is as much inferior as that perfection is exalted above the gross ignorance and ferocious barbarism of the eleventh century. Science and the arts have enlarged their empire, and indefinitely multiplied their ramifications; the range of the ratiocinative faculty is incalculably dilated; to the powers of fancy are expanded new and inexhaustible sources of amusement and creation; and the mind reviews, with astonishment and exultation, the extent of its progress, and the variety of its acquisitions.

We emulate the ancients in the distinguishing characteristics of their excellence, and encounter them in the most favourite walks of their genius. To Plato and Aristotle we may oppose, in politics, Locke, Montesquieu, or Machiavel; in criticism, a Johnson or a Blair; in pneumatology, the patient research, luminous method, and profound analysis of Reid and Steward: to the nervous diction and masculine oratory of Demosthenes, the logical precision, and irresistible cogency of Chatham and Fox: to the diffuse, the brilliant, the versatile, and argumentative eloquence of Cicero, the more enlarged philosophy, diversified information, glowing style, ductile imagination, rich and variegated imagery of Burke. The glory of Pliny is lost in the superior lustre of Linnæus and Buffon: the problems of Euclid and Archimedes dwindle into insignificance when contrasted with that vast superstructure of mathematical truth, which the moderns have reared by the instrumentality of algebraic and infinitesimal calculation. From a monstrous compound of visionary theory, and wild, absurd hypothesis, the grand discoveries of Newton and Kepler, the elaborate investigations of La Grange and La Lande, have exalted astronomy to the rank of one of the most extensive and clearly demonstrable, as it is the most sublime and useful of sciences. The invention of glasses, which bring near what is immensely remote, and render perceptible, what the unassisted eye would search for in vain, which lead up the astronomer's discernment even to the satellites of the Georgium Sidus, and carry down the naturalist's observation as far as the animalcule race, has elucidated an infinitude of phenomena, heretofore deemed inexplicable, and opened new stores of knowledge too abundant for the imagination itself to grasp, too multifarious for the limited period of human life thoroughly to explore.

In the course of this progressive amelioration, the ten closing years of the last century have produced improvements both of theoretic and practical legislation, which more nearly affect and which must ultimately prove more beneficial to society, than any other of which the ingenuity of man can boast. My remarks on this head shall be confined to the most momentous of those improvements, the more complete development and wider diffusion of what the enlightened venerate as the boldest lineament and very seminal principle of the sacred rights of man, I mean the text I have adopted, 'that the voice of the people is the voice of God.' As by the voice of the people is understood the voice of the majority, and as a majority is always composed of those, whom the inanity of pride has contumeliously denominated the vulgar, their voice comes, therefore, not simply as the dictate of the most profound sublunary wisdom, but fortified by the more awful and imposing guise of an emanation from on high. It was at the prospect of a revolution, which promised to propagate and establish this maxim, together with all the unutterable blessings which it necessarily entails, that a juvenile warmth thrilled the frame of doctor Price, that, in the ardor of joyful anticipation, and in the effervescence of a generous zeal, he breaks out, to speak the language of his eloquent antagonist, into 'that beautiful and prophetic ejaculation' nunc demittis, 'Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.' He saw, as if in the bird-eye landscape of a promised land, the proximate overthrow of that subordination of rank, so falsely emblazoned as the Corinthian pillar of society, he saw the invidious distinctions of birth and wealth and talent totally exploded; superstition, under the more specious appellation of religion, disrobed of all the ornaments, and divested of all the terrors which the pious credulity of accumulated ages had enabled her to usurp; mankind casting off the thralldom of experience and the clog of prejudice; acquiescing in no domination but that of reason; amalgamated into one promiscuous mass, and consolidated into one equal fraternity. He saw the approaching verification of this prediction of the Gospel, 'that the kingdom of Sion was at hand, that whatever was highest on earth should be brought lowest, and whatever was low should be exalted.' The partial illuminations of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries did but lop the branches, and prune the luxuriance of the feudal despotism: he saw the axe now applied to the root, the sap siccated, and the trunk withered. Mathias and Boccold, it is true, seemed in those ages to have imbibed one spark of the celestial fire; they seized upon Munster, a city of Westphalia, proclaimed that the spirit of God should alone be their political guide; taught the universal equality of man, and anathematised the office of magistracy, as an unwarrantable encroachment on spiritual independence. Cnipperdoling's voluntary commutation of the consular dignity, for the humble duty of a public executioner, sanctioned those doctrines by an act of self debasement, no less rare than admirable. Unfortunately for their contemporaries, the flame which they lighted up was both circumscribed in its extent, and transient in its duration; the salutary lessons inculcated by the first, and the heroic example of the latter, were equally inefficacious in a warfare against the bigotted hierarchy and too potent aristocracy of the times; it remained for this glorious epoch to prosecute what they had left inchoate, to embrace their principles in the fullest latitude, to give them wider dissemination, and establish them on a more stable basis.

For one conversant with the literature of the ancients, it is almost a work of supererogation to remark, that whatever they possessed of genius the most brilliant, judgment the most solid, or penetration the most acute, militates not only against the letter, but against the spirit of the maxim which forms the subject of the present essay. The works of Plato and Aristotle, of Herodotus and Thucydides, of Xenophon and Plutarch, of all the luminaries of Greece and Rome, illustrious for their experimental knowledge of republican systems, teem with the most unqualified abuse of majorities; their turbulence and venality, their credulity and ingratitude, their indiscriminating vindictive rage, when roused, their wanton oppressive tyranny when armed with power, are themes on which they appear to dwell with the utmost fervor of complacency and energy of invective. They abound in opprobrious epithet, odious simile, and injurious allusion. From their mutability they assimilate the populace to the moon, and enforce the analogy by portraying both bodies as equally opaque, in which there is inherent no native light, whose superficies can only be affected, and whose interior is impervious to the cheering ray. A solitary eagle supports the blaze of the sun better than a myriad of bats; if the chisel of the statuary, and the polish of the artificer are essentially requisite to fashion a stone into the human figure: without their aid that figure would as little spring from a junction of all the stones of the quarry, or the rocks of the mountain. If the union of an infinity of Zenos can never produce an unit, to the unenlightened wisdom of antiquity a similar impossibility would seem to obtain that an infallible decision, or even a judicious choice, should result from an host of men, who, individually, can have no speculative or practical acquaintance with government, whose situation and habits necessarily preclude them from even a moderate insight into the genuine characters of the candidates for their favour.

The celebrated Phocion is said to have been so deeply impressed with these ideas, that he considered the plaudits of the multitude as the most indubitable test of error, and habitually investigated, with peculiar warmth of suspicion, and diligence of scrutiny, the steps of his career, which stood highest in the public estimation. To an undistinguishing eye the melancholy catastrophe of this great man would appear to superadd no contemptible weight to his opinions: he was finally executed, as an infamous delinquent, by the people of Athens, although the boast of Greece for the supereminent endowments of his mind, and the exalted purity of his life.

Whatever loftiness of feeling, or elation of conscious superiority, this retrospect must infuse into the breast of the most illiterate of the present day, I venture to pronounce that those emotions will be greatly invigorated, and the triumph doubly enhanced when the name of Cicero is subjoined in support of the same ignoble cause. With a hand that refined and perfected whatever it touched, with a mind that ranged through every region of science, and penetrated into every subject, however complicated or abstruse; in his political disquisitions alone he walked in error, and groped in obscurity. A most intimate knowledge of human nature, and a long series of years, unremittingly occupied in the midst of popular elections, and in the study of popular passions, instead of leading him in the strait path, served but to widen and multiply his aberrations. His banishment from the republic, after having twice preserved it from destruction, the exaltation of Piso, Lentulus, and 'a funeral train' of ferocious monsters, the subsequent reign of the sanguinary triumvirate, may possibly have conducted to the adoption of those sentiments, so repugnant to the majesty of the people, of which he makes even an ostentatious display. The following argument, already given in substance above, is gravely advanced in the fifth book of the Tusculano: 'An quidquam stultius, quam quos singulos contemnas, illos aliquid puta. e esse universos?' In an other philosophical moment, in all the coolness of speculation, he unequivocally declares that the multitude possesses neither reason or prudence, or discrimination or judgment, 'Non ratio, non discrimin, non consilium, non diligentia in vulgo.' His ideas of government wear a similar aspect, 'Statuo esse optime constitutam rempublicam quæ ex intrinsecis generibus illis regali, optimo et populari modice confusa.' This vaunted union and eternal equipoise of the three diverse species, is but the veil of tyranny, the delusive plausibility of interested politicians, fundamentally subversive of real liberty, and every way incompatible with the voice of the people, if free and untrammelled in its operation. Theirs would be the total abolition of the regal authority, the annihilation of the aristocratical, the complete preponderance of the popular. The works of Seneca breathe the same spirit, and strenuously inculcate the same doctrine: the sober moralist treads undeviatingly in the footsteps of his predecessors, dictatorially publishes to the world that nothing is so contemptible as the judgment of the multitude, 'nihil tam inestimabile est quam animi multitudinis,' and omits no opportunity of instilling a preposterous and an aristocratical, but, with him, a favourite maxim, 'estimes judicium non numeros,' estimate opinions by their intrinsic merit, and not by the number of their abettors.

If the reader, from his individual experience, or in the plenitude of his veneration for these great names, be inclined to fluctuate, I would beg leave to suggest, and it should always be premised, that a belief of what is incomprehensible, constitutes the essence of faith. If also, in the course of his historical studies, he should have encountered obstacles still more formidable, if he should have found that the annals of all democratical institutions uniformly record the triumph of vice, and the depression of virtue; that they are invariably the archives of licentious disorder, and tumultuary violence, of iniquitous intrigue, and shameless corruption, of bloodshed and of massacre, if he should have discovered that whatever is most abhorrent to the understanding and to the heart has been in all ages, sanctioned by the general approbation of a multiplicity of nations, I would again remark, that the ways of providence are inscrutable to man, and that it is a received paralogism in logic to condemn because we do not understand. This country has already felt the genial influence of the preponderance of the majority, it is here that the genius of universal suffrage has selected the seat of his empire; we have opened 'an asylum for oppressed humanity from all parts of the globe;' to that asylum numbers of the oppressed have flown; throwing aside narrow views, and local prejudices, we have demanded no probationary period, but instantaneously made them members of our body corporate, and even elevated them to the rank of our political teachers; we have, indeed, a constitution moulded after a corrupt model, but the framers and the advocates of that constitution we have hurled from power, and in their place have substituted those who know no reverential awe, or puerile scruple, who have already applied the incision knife, and can soon lodge it in the family vault of 'all the Capulets,' these are a part of the effects of this glorious doctrine; to them, and to such as are future, I appeal as the most irrefragable vouchers of its truth and utility.

NO. 3.

Memabilia democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science. Interspersed with anecdotes, characters and speeches of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats, by Slaveslap Kiddnap, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651

Washington, printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

In pursuance of my engagements, I now present to the public an extract from the first section of the first chapter of this admirable work, which opens in the following manner:

"Man is, by nature, a mighty megalonyx, produced purposely, in a philosophical view, to prowl, pillage,* propagate, and putrify. But circumstances combining to produce an augmentation of the species, and the ratio of individual exigencies increasing beyond that of his energies, he was soon necessitated to circumscribe his natural dispositions, and submit to the slavish requisitions of society. In this state his original temperament preserved its preponderancy. The inclination to take from each other, what each other had accumulated, strengthened. Hence proceeded throes and convulsions. The agonizing spasms of infuriated man, seeking, through blood and slaughter, to wrest its earnings from labour, and the counter current, the disposition to retain produced, agitated the billows of society, and left no shore peaceful. To this wild condition of civilized man, succeeds a republican organization. Instead of expending his blood and substance for the wretched purpose of exchanging this master for that, he placed the powers of governing him in a plurality of hands of his own choice: so that the corrupt will of no one man might in future oppress him, and, proscribing prerogative, he consolidated the laws in the hands of such plurality. Then succeeded the sum of good government. Then closed the circle of his felicities. Men, restrained from injuring one another, and left otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry or improvement, took not from the mouth of labour the bread it had earned, nor from the belly of industry the butter it had churned.

"About to enter, republicans, upon an examination, which will comprehend every thing dear and valuable to you, it is proper you should understand what I deem the essential principle of democracy. I will compress them into the narrowest compass they will bear, stating the general principle, but not all its modifications. Regular and continued multiplication of men. 'Heat being,' as the great Jefferson says, 'friendly, and moisture adverse, to the production and development of large animals,' a careful collection of fuel for population propensities. Intimacy, commerce, and sexual connection with all women—matrimonial alliances with none—a careful preservation of the whole constitutional vigour, as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home, and safety from abroad. The support and elevation of insurgents, Genevans, French, and other imported patriots, as the most competent administrators of our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwark against anti-republican tendencies; a jealous watchfulness over elections, and a studious command of democratic plurality, by the mild and easy infusion, into the rights of suffrage, of foreigners, who, at home, were destined to be lopt by the sword of the law. A well disciplined band of needy expectants, our best reliance in power, and our only sure resort in moments of election. The civil supremacy of a democratic executive, and a prompt corrective for the want of participation in office of those, who are neither honest, capable, nor faithful to the constitution; economy in the public expense, that coaches may be lightly burdened; the punctual payments of Virginia debts from the national purse, and a sacred distribution of offices, according to faith pledged previous to election. Encouragement of Duane, and of Dawson as his hand-maid. Diffusion of jealousies of monarchical designs, and arraignment of all orders of the state at the bar of democratic reason. Freedom for all religions and for atheism—freedom for falsehood—freedom for convicted libellers, under the protection of the power of pardoning—and a trial by juries, selected by marshals appointed out of our own party, or trembling under correcting procedures. These are the bright constellation of principles, which have conducted, or attended, democratic power in all ages and nations, and as they should be the text of civic instruction, the touchstone by which to try those we trust, I thought I could not do better than thus, in the beginning of my history, to give them as conspicuous a place as their importance deserves."

Having shewn the above extract to some democratic friends of mine, they affirm that it is as choice a sample of fine writing as was ever produced in any age or country. It is, say they, cut in the latest and most fashionable court style, and closely corrected after the most approved models. As to that 'sublime aliteration,' (for so they term it), with which the work opens, they are at a loss for language to express their admiration. According to them, however, our author cannot lay claim to originality in designing this beauty, as they insist he had it in outline from the great Jefferson, who, in his sixth query of his Notes on Virginia, expresses himself in the following elegant manner. 'The truth is that a pigmy and a patagonian, a mouse and a mammoth, derive their dimensions from the same nutritive juices.' Again, a sentence or two after, 'But all the manna of heaven would never raise a mouse to the bulk of the mammoth.' These sentences they affirm must have been in the eye of Mr. Kiddnap, and that by them he must have modelled his own. Their candour and justice will not permit them to deny that, in this instance, the disciple has surpassed his master, and reached a point of exquisite refinement, which the original has not attained. In like manner as some of the finest inventions of Homer expand with new graces by the striking attitudes and flowing drapery in which Virgil's genius displays them, I find this beauty of alliteration very popular among all my democratic friends. 'My mind,' said one of them, speaking to me upon this subject, 'often sinks under the majesty of this form of speech, so happily exemplified in the writings of this illustrious head of our sect. Of what infinite talents must not he be possessed, who is able to give thought alphabetical arrangement! What a wide range of intellect, commanding the whole circle of science from alpha to omega, or, to speak more intelligibly, from A, to and-per-se-and. Great writers, like great heroes, have ever been scrupulously precise in marshalling their instruments. Frederic of Prussia not only watched over the great concerns of his camp, but also was attentive to the minutest part of the dress and uniform of his soldiers. Now what is alliteration in style, but words dressed in uniform, which have as great superiority, in point of effect, over the common slovenly mode of composition, as a regular army of Prussian blues would have over a beggarly mob, collected from docks and kennels, on any patriotic emergence. I cannot but hope, therefore, that, before I die, under the sanction of our present chief magistrate, who is, doubtless, in the chair for life, to see some folios written, in which every word shall begin with the favourite letter, and from which every one, not having the established character, shall be driven with as much contempt, as Frederic would have driven from his organised battalions a rustic in shirt-sleeves.'

With respect to that passage, in the preceding extract, which speaks of not taking 'from the mouth of labour the bread it had earned,' my democratic friends are of opinion, that it is, so literally adopted from an expression of the great and original Jefferson, as to amount to a plagiarism, altogether unpardonable, were it not for that conclusion of the sentence, for which Mr. Kiddnap is intitled to the whole credit. They are in rapture at the new idea, he has inserted, of not taking 'from the belly of industry the butter it has churned,' and are chagrined that a thought, at once so natural and so obvious, should have escaped the eye of their admired leader. 'For,' say they, 'all the democrats in the ancient dominion have butter to their bread, so that the latter could not well be taken out of the mouth, without the former came along with it.' Besides, as the design of Mr. Jefferson was, undoubtedly, to show power in one of its most odious exercises, the thought of Mr. Kiddnap, they think, is much more striking, and, of consequence, must proportionally, interest the bosom of philanthropic humanity, or of humane philanthropy, (I forget which expression they used), to see the hand of tyranny plucking, not simply bread from the mouth, but bread and butter from the belly of labour.

The only part of this passage, to which any of my democratic friends objected is the word 'churn.' Some of them thought it was not happy, in the relation in which it stood, inasmuch as the butter must have been churned, before it got into the belly, and they did not recollect any figure of speech, by which this word, could be applied to the processes of digestion. One of my friends, however, more acute than the rest, vindicated Mr. Kiddnap, by observing that he thought the expression correct enough. For as it appeared by Mr. Jefferson's own words, that the mouth might EARN the bread, he did not see why the belly might not, with equal propriety, be said to CHURN the butter. It is true that the design of the stomach is to digest the butter, and not to churn it, and so also it may be said, with no less justice, that the design of the mouth is to eat the bread and not to earn it. For his part, he thought Mr. Kiddnap was correct, and had the sanction of the highest authority.

The remainder of this extract, they agreed on all sides, was a perfect piece of composition, whether considered with respect to style or sentiment; altogether worthy of the writer, the party, and the man; so that it deserved to be printed on white satin, and form the ornament of chimney pieces and side-boards; an honour which only one or two democratic works have ever before merited.

I have thus given to the public the first transcript from the work under review. In the scope and execution of which, I trust, its taste and curiosity have been abundantly gratified. And I dare promise that the other parts of this rare work will be not less worthy of its attention and esteem. I have also thought it best to suffer this, as I shall future extracts, to be accompanied by the remarks of democrats of taste and discernment; reserving my own opinion to be given at the last. For as I profess not to be of the same sect with Mr. Kiddnap, I am fearful if I should print my own opinions only, without taking notice of the favourable sentiments of his friends, lest it should look like taking advantage of the review of a literary work to inforce political principles and prejudices: than which nothing is more distant from my views. The course I have taken in this, I shall follow in all future numbers. The friends of Mr. Kiddnap, when their opinions are known, shall first be heard on the merits of his work. But I shall reserve to myself the privilege of expressing my own opinion when a proper occasion offers. There is no character of which I am so ambitious as that of an impartial critic.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Ariel, road of Croix, September 8, 1780.

I dare say, my dear friend, my silence for so long a time must have an extraordinary appearance to you, and have excited in your mind various conjectures not much to my advantage. I will now endeavour to make some atonement, by confessing the truth. I have been ashamed to write you an account of the strange variety of events that have taken place, and detained me in port, from the tenth of February until this date.

I wish to pass over these events, for the present, in silence, choosing rather to suffer a little ill-natured misconstruction, than to attempt explanations before the matters are brought to a proper and final decision. I hope it will then appear that I have been not very fairly treated, and that my conduct has been blameless. M. De C— pursued his resentment to such a length as obliged me in April to pay a visit to the Minister, greatly against my will at that moment, for I then thought myself neglected, and not very well used by him; but I was most agreeably undeceived by the very friendly reception I met with. My every demand was granted respecting the prizes; it became me, therefore, to be very modest. I found that I had C. alone to thank for the altercations at the Texel. He sought to dishonour me, but could not. I had the happiness to be feasted and caressed by all the world at Paris and Versailles except himself. He, however, looked guilty; we did not speak together, not because I had any determined objection, for I love his family, but he could not look me in the face, and fled whenever chance brought us near each other.

Without studying it, I enjoyed over him a triumph as great as I could wish to experience over Jemmy Twitcher. His majesty ordered a superb sword to be made for me, which I have since received, and it is called much more elegant than that presented to the Marquis de la Fayette. On the blade is this inscription, 'Vindicati Maris Ludovicus XV. remunerator strenuo vindici.' His Majesty has also written, by his Minister, the strongest letter that is possible in approbation of my conduct, to the President of Congress, offering to invest me with the cross, an institution of military merit, which I carry with me, for that purpose, to the Chevalier de la Luzerne. The Minister of the Marine has besides addressed a very kind letter to myself, and I have also had the like honour shewn me by the other Ministers. I continue to receive constant marks of esteem and honourable attention from the court, and the ship I now command was lent to the United States in consequence of my application. Nothing has detained me from sailing for this month past, but that my officers and men are still without wages or prize money. There is a strange mystery in this, which, when explained, must surprise C. who pretends to exercise authority over these monies, will I fear persist in withholding them till he obliges me to lay a second complaint against him before the Minister; and if I am reduced to the necessity of this step, he will not come off as well as he has hitherto done, on the score of betraying secrets.

I will take care of your packets, and, as I expect to remain but two or three days longer, I hope to hear from you through the hands of our friend R. M. of Philadelphia. Let me know how Mr. Round Face, first letter, that went lately from Paris to the Hague, is proceeding? I understand he is gone to Amsterdam. I wish he may be doing good. If he should, inadvertently, do evil, as a stranger, I shall, as his fellow-citizen, be very sorry for it, but you, being a native, will hear of it. I confess I am anxious about his situation. The man has a family, and these troublesome times, I wish he were at home to mind his trade and his fire-side, for I think he has travelled more than his fortune can well bear.

Present my respects to Madame, and the virgin muse. I got many little pieces addressed to me while near the court, but I made very little return. When I revisit Europe, and find a moment to see you at the Hague, I will be obliged to you if you please make a C— of my brother knight, for his unremitting attention to me while at the Texel. I have written but twice to your Satan. I am, my dear philosopher, with unalterable regard, your

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF ROBERT DODSLEY.

[Concluded.]

The intrinsic merit of Cleone, as a moral and interesting drama, is universally acknowledged. 'When I heard you read it,' said Dr. Johnson to Mr. Langton, as reported by Mr. Boswell, 'I thought higher of its power of language. When I read it myself, I was more sensible of its pathetic effect. If Otway had written this play, no other of his pieces would have been remembered.' Dodsley himself, upon this being repeated to them, said, 'It was too much.'

It will not, indeed, stand in competition with the tragedies of Otway or Southerne; but it is not, upon the whole, inferior to any that have been brought upon either stage for the last fifty years, except 'Douglas.' It is equally free from the bombast and rant of a 'Barbarossa,' and from the flowery whine and romantic softness of 'Philoclea,' but at the same time it wants the majesty of diction, and high reach of thought, essential to the dignity of a perfect tragedy. The plot is too thin; the scenes are too barren of incidents, at least of important ones, and the language, in general, too much, though not altogether destitute of poetry. It contains, however, some happy expressions and striking sentiments. The circumstance of Siffroy's giving his friend directions concerning his wife, has some degree of similarity to Posthumus's orders in 'Cymbeline.' In the two last acts, he appears to the greatest advantage: Cleone's madness, in particular, over her murdered infant, being highly pathetic.

This tragedy has lately been revived by Mrs. Siddons; but so strong were the feelings which her exquisite performance of Cleone excited on the first night of acting, that the house was thin on the second night, and the play was dropped.

In 1760, he published his last separate work, the Select Fables of Æsop, and other Fabulists, in three books, with the Life of Æsop, and an Essay on Fable, 8vo. This work added greatly to his reputation. It is indeed a classical performance, both in regard to the elegant simplicity of the style, and the propriety of the sentiments and characters. The first book contains ancient, the second modern, and the third original fables; the stories in the third book are wholly invented by Dodsley and his friends. The Life of Æsop, by M. Mezeriac, is the only Life of Æsop that is consistent with common sense; that of Planudes being a ridiculous medley of absurd traditions, or equally absurd inventions. The Essay considers the fable regularly; first, with relation to the moral; secondly, the actions and incidents; thirdly, the persons, character, and sentiments; and, lastly, the language. This is one of the first pieces of criticism, in which rules are delivered for this species of composition drawn from nature, and by which these small and pleasing kind of productions that were thought to have little other standard than the fancy, are brought under the jurisdiction of the judgment. Dodsley has been so eminently successful in his design, that the propriety of his remarks cannot be disputed, except only in a single instance; in which, alluding to the well-known fable of the 'Fox and the Grapes,' he says, 'a fox should not be said to long for grapes;' because the appetite is not consistent with its known character. It is not so in the east. Dr. Hasselquist, in his 'Travels,' observes, that the fox is an animal common in Palestine; and that it destroys the vines, unless it is strictly watched. Solomon also says, in 'Canticles' ii. 15. 'Take us the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vines, for our vines have tender grapes.' Before he committed the Essay to the press, he subjected it to the revision of his literary friends, and especially of Shenstone.

In 1761, he published a collection of Fugitive Pieces, by Spence, Cooper, Lord Whitworth, Mr. Burke, Mr. Clubbe, Dr. Lancaster, Dr. Hill, and other elegant writers, in 2 vols, 8vo.

In 1763, he published the works of his amiable and ingenious friend Shenstone, in 2 vols, 12mo; to which he prefixed a short account of his life and writings, and added a description of the Leasowes.

His 'Description of Persefield,' in a letter to Shenstone, is preserved in Hull's 'Select Letters,' between the Duchess of Somerset, Lady Luxborough, Mr. Whistler, Miss. Dolman, Shenstone, Dodsley, &c. in 2 vols, 1778.

In the course of his profession, Dodsley acquired a very handsome fortune, which enabled him to retire from the active part of business, which devolved on his brother and partner, Mr. James Dodsley, the present respectable bookseller in Pall-Mall. During the latter years of his life he was much troubled with the gout, to which, at length, he fell a martyr, while he was upon a visit to his friend Spence, at Durham, Sept. 5, 1764, in the sixty-first year of his age. Spence paid the last kind office to his remains. He was buried in the Abbey church-yard of Durham, and the following inscription was engraved on his tomb-stone.

If you have any respect
For uncommon industry and merit,
Regard this place
In which are deposited, the remains of
MR. ROBERT DODSLEY;
Who, as an author, raised himself
Much above what could have been expected
From one in his rank of life,
And without a learned education;
And who, as a man, was scarce
Exceeded by any in integrity of heart,
And purity of manners and conversation.
He left this life for a better,
Sept. 25, 1764,
In the 61st year of his age.

A second volume of his Miscellanies was published in 8vo, 1772. The volume contains Cleone, Melpomene, Agriculture, and the Economy of Human Life. The editions of the Economy of Human Life are too numerous to be specified. His Agriculture, Melpomene, and other poems, are now, for the first time received into a collection of classical English poetry.

His character was very amiable and respectable. As a tradesman, he preserved the greatest integrity; as a writer, the most becoming humility. Mindful of the early encouragement which his own talents met with, he was ever ready to give the same opportunity of advancement to those of others; and on many occasions he was not only the publisher, but the patron of genius. There was no circumstance by which he was more distinguished, than by the grateful remembrance which he retained, and always expressed towards the memory of those to whom he owed the obligation of being first taken notice of in life. Modest, sensible, and humane; he retained the virtues which first brought him into notice, after he had obtained wealth sufficient to satisfy every wish which could arise from the possession of it. He was a generous friend, an encourager of men of genius, and acquired the esteem and respect of all who were acquainted with him. It was his happiness to pass the greatest part of his life in an intimacy with men of the brightest abilities, whose names will be revered by posterity; by most of whom he was loved as much for the virtues of his heart, as he was admired on account of his writings.

As an author, he is entitled to considerable praise. His works are recommended by an ease and elegance, which are sometimes more pleasing than a more laboured and ornamented manner of writing. His prose is familiar, and yet chaste. His Essay on Fable will be a durable monument of his ingenuity. In his dramas he has always kept in view the one great principle, delectando pariterque monendo, some general moral is constantly conveyed in each of his plans, and particular instructions are displayed in the particular strokes of satire. The dialogue, at the same time, is easy; the plots simple; and the catastrophe interesting and pathetic. In verse, his compositions sufficiently show what genius alone, unassisted by learning, is capable of executing. His subjects are well chosen and entertaining; the diction is chaste and elegant; the sentiments, if not sublime, are manly and pleasing; and the numbers, if not exquisitely polished, are easy and flowing.

Of his poetical production, his Agriculture, a Georgic in three cantos, is the most considerable. The subject is such as must be grateful and entertaining to every Briton; and though, in the execution, there are imperfections impossible to be overlooked by a critical eye, yet there are a number of beauties in it deserving of applause; and those who may have reason to condemn the poet, will find ample cause to commend the patriot. Indeed, to write a truly excellent Georgic, is one of the greatest efforts of the human mind. Perfectly to succeed in this species of poetry, requires a Virgil's genius, judgment, exquisiteness of taste, and power of harmony. The general economy of this Georgic is judicious; it contains several exalted sentiments; and the descriptions are often delicate and well expressed. But, at the same time, the diction is frequently too prosaic, many of the epithets are inadequate, and in some places, sufficient attention is not paid to the powers of the versification.

In the first canto, after having generally proposed his intention, addressed it to the Prince of Wales, and invoked the Genius of Britain, he proceeds to consider husbandry as the source of wealth and plenty; and therefore recommends it to landlords not to oppress the farmer, and to the farmer that he should be frugal, temperate, and industrious. After giving an account of the instruments of husbandry, he describes a country statute, and introduces the episode of Patty, the fair milk-maid. The next objects offered to view are the farmer's poultry, kine, hogs, &c. with their enemies, the kite, the fox, the badger, and such other animals as prey upon the produce of the farm, or impede the industrious labours of the husbandman; and we are shown how the cultivation of the former, and the destruction of the latter contribute alternately to provide him with business or amusement: whence we are led to contemplate the happiness of a rural life; to which succeeds an address to the great to engage them in the study of agriculture. An allegorical explanation of nature's operations on the vegetable world, with a philosophical system, built on the experimental foundation laid by Dr. Hales, concludes the canto. The address to the Genius of Britain is pleasing, and the description of the Fair Milk-maid is exquisitely beautiful.

The second canto begins with instructions for meliorating soils, according to their diversity, whether they consist of sand, loam, or clay. Mr. Tull's principles and practice are particularly taken notice of, and those of the Middlesex gardeners. Directions are also given for various manures, and other methods are pointed out for the improvement and inclosure of lands; the respective uses of the several forest trees are distinguished; the advantages arising from plantations pointed out; and rules are presented for their successful cultivation. To these succeed some observations on gardening, wherein the taste for straight lines, regular platforms, and elipt trees, imported from Holland at the Revolution, is exploded. These are succeeded by a few compliments to some modern gardens, Chiswick, Richmond, Oatlands, Esher, Woburn, and Hagley; a description of those of Epicurus, and a celebration of his morals. The apostrophe to the Genius of Gardens is happily introduced; and the description of the Gardens of Epicurus is rich and luxuriant.

In the third canto are described hay-making, harvest, and the harvest-home; a method is prescribed for preventing the hay from being mow-burnt, or taking fire. Other vegetable, fossil, and mineral productions peculiar to England are praised. From the culture and produce of the earth, we have a transition to the breeding and management of sheep, cows, and horses; of the latter there are descriptions according to their respective uses; whether for draught, the road, the field, the race, or for war. The portraits of the two last, which are eminently beautiful, conclude the poem.

Of his other poems, his Melpomene may be considered as the greatest effort of his poetical genius. It cannot indeed vie in sublimity and enthusiasm with the lyric compositions of Dryden, Akenside, Collins, Gray, and Mason. It has a more moderate degree of elevation, and poetic fire. It is animated without being rhapsodical, and joins ardent sentiment and picturesque description, to correctness, harmony, and happy expression. His picture of Despair, in the Region of Terror, is finely drawn, and only inferior to that of Spenser. The portrait of Rage is equally happy in the designing, and the expression. In the Region of Pity, the image of a beautiful maid expiring on the corse of a brave lover, who has been killed in vindicating her honour, is affectingly picturesque. That of a too credulous and injured beauty, is equally striking and beautiful, and pregnant with a necessary moral caution.

Of his Art of Preaching, in imitation of Horace's 'Art of Poetry,' the rules are well adapted, and exemplified, and the versification is smooth and elegant. His Songs, in point of tenderness, delicacy, and simplicity, are not inferior to any composition of that kind in the English language.

Most of his smaller pieces may be read with pleasure. His just retort on Burnet, for calling Prior in his 'History of his Own Times,' one Prior, is probably remembered by most readers of poetry.

LEVITY.

AUTHENTICATED ETYMOLOGIES.

When the seamen on board the ship of Christopher Columbus after a series of fatigues came in sight of S. Salvador, they burst out into exuberant mirth and jollity. 'The lads are in a merry key,' cried the commodore. America is now the name of half the globe.

Antiquarians say, that an old Negro at Cape Cod, whenever his master required any thing of him, would exclaim, 'Massa chuse it.' Thence in time the name of Massachusetts.

The girls of Palmyra, when romping with the fellows, often cried out. 'The boys tear us.' This gave rise to the word Boisterous.

The city of Albany was originally settled by Scotch people. When strangers on their arrival there asked how the new comers did? the answer uniformly was, 'Albany.' The spelling we find a little altered, but not the sound.

When Julius Cæsar's army lay encamped at Ticonderoga, near two thousand years ago, the deserters were commonly tied upon a battery ram and flogged: When any culprit was brought out, the commanding centurion would exclaim. 'Tie on the rogue!' The name we see has worn well,

A fat landlady who, about the time of the flight of Mahomet from Mecca, lived between New-Orleans and the Chickasaw cliffs, was scarcely ever unfurnished with pigeon sea pie; and thence got the name of Mrs. sea pie. The enormous river Mississippi owes its name to this fat landlady.

In the reign of Dermot O'Mullogh in the kingdom of Connought about the beginning of the second century, a noisy fellow of the name of Pat Riot made himself very conspicuous. The word Patriot has come down to us perfect and unimpaired.

When Nebuchadnezzar took the tour of Asia, coming to the eastern part of it, he was one day asked by the cook, 'if his imperial majesty could relish a chine of pork?' With a brow frowning dark as Erebus and in a voice of thunder the monarch cried, Chine! ha! The affrighted cook fled, and the exclamation became the name of the first kingdom upon the face of the earth.

The term Hurricane is supposed to take its rise from one Harry Kane, a turbulent Irishman who lived at Antigua. Indeed the very name Antigua is now well known to be derived from an avaricious old female planter who once lived on the island and was always called by the sailors, Aunt Eager.

When the French first settled on the banks of the river St. Lawrence, they were stinted by the intendant to a can of spruce beer a day. The people thought this measure very scant and every moment articulated a Can a day! It would be ungenerous in our readers to desire a more rational derivation of the word Canada.

A jolly West-Indian, whenever the neighbouring girls came to his plantation insisted on their sipping his choicest syrups and reiterated the terms 'My Lasses;' thence the name of that syrup. Few words have aberrated from their primaries less than this.

A tipling hussey of Grand Cairo in the reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus, was forever frequenting public houses and sipping gin and brandy without paying a single farthing; and by this prudent management obtained the name of Polly Tick.—The elder Scaliger, Duns Scotus, and Erasmus, all declare, that the well known word Politick, or Policks, is derived from this artful trollop.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE FINE ARTS.

[In the following article the amateur will meet with much pleasing information respecting the more celebrated paintings of Sir BENJAMIN WEST, an American genius, who, most unaccountably, prefers the banks of the Thames to the banks of the Delaware, and chooses to tint historic canvas, under the patronage of his KING, rather than to paint sign boards for some republican major in the militia, or cover with Spanish brown the dead flat of some Quaker, out of pure brotherly love and affection.]

Thee, West, the various powers of art obey,
The great, the graceful, terrible, and gay;
With equal ease thy skillful pencil roves
Thro' flowery fields, with Venus and her doves,
Gives us the classic scene, the sober gloom,
The learned tone of Archimedes' tomb;
In warmer tints bids gayer scenes arise,
Bids fair Calypso charm in airy dyes.
Who can, unmov'd, thy Regulus behold?
Who see that scene, and yet his praise withhold?

Where, nobly stern of soul, the chieftain stands
Unmov'd, 'mid weeping, supplicating bands;
Turns from the scenes that nurs'd his early years,
Though love and friend-hip court his stay with tears,
Though Carthage bids her fires of torture burn,
And on her shores death waits for his return.
See too where WOLFE, the dying hero, lies,
Who beams expression though from fading eyes,
Who calls on glory with his parting breath,
And grasps the laurel in the arms of death.
Yet not to scenes of earth alone confin'd,
The fire and ardent temper of thy mind
Give thee the secrets of the abyss to spy,
Upon the seraph wings of extacy;
To paint what he, in Parnos, who heard cry
The warning voice, that sounded from on high,
Saw in the apocalypse, when Heaven reveal'd
Visions till then from mortal eyes conceal'd,
When he, the conqueror, went forth; when, to slay,
Went forth the Power that takes all peace away.

NOTES RELATIVE TO THE PAINTINGS OF MR. WEST.

The following notes pretend to no critical knowledge. They were simply dictated by the admiration which was created in me by those talents which produced the pictures here noticed. It may not be improper to mention that I fixed upon the paintings here more particularly described, rather because they conveniently offered themselves as proofs of versatility of talents, than on account of any pre-eminence they may have over the rest of Mr. West's works.

NOTE I.

Cicero discovering the tomb of Archimedes to the Magistrates of Syracuse.

This picture is classic; and the air, and character of the features, the introduction of the lictors, and Consular chariot, the costume, the buildings, the scenery, in short all the component parts are purely so. The combination of forms, and the general air of the buildings, and surrounding landscapes are such, that while we behold them, we imagine ourselves carried back to the age in which the discovery here represented actually took place and planted, amid the sages who are the actors in the scene. Every thing is perfectly in character with the solemn dignity which belongs peculiarly to scenes of this nature. The clouded sky; and the smoke of Mount Ætna, mounting with difficulty, and labouring through a heavy atmosphere, are in perfect concord with the subject. Indeed there is not the form, or character of foliage of a tree, the shape, or colour of a fragment of stone, or the course or tone of a streamlet of water, that does not tend to advance the prime object of the painter.

It has been said, but surely without foundation, that this picture is in the manner of Poussin. It certainly has that composed solemnity which is almost personified in his pictures, and the subject is such as Poussin loved to paint; and this is all the resemblance. The composition of Poussin's groups is generally diffuse, much dispersed, and, if I may so express myself, stringy; and the character which he gave to all his figures, upon all occasions, was a transcript of some statue or bas-relief: he rather loved to paint the simple elements of a passion, and to represent a general idea of man, than to discriminate between this or that national character; and in his pictures we only know from the symbols, and allegory, which he introduced, whether we are on the banks of the Jordan, the Nile, or the Tiber. In Mr. West's picture, the composition of the principal group, is well knit and firm; and the character given to all the personages is such as suits them individually.

The point of time chosen for the picture, is that on which Cicero points out to the astonished and admiring Syracusians the tomb of the philosopher at the entrance of a grave, w are busily employed, with proper implements, in removing the trees, and shrubs that concealed it. We are informed that the tomb of Archimedes, was marked by a sphere and a cylinder; but, as these forms would not of themselves possess sufficient consequence for the purposes of the painter, he has raised them upon a sarcophagus. Behind the group in which Cicero is conspicuous, waits his chariot, preceded by the lictors. Further back in the picture are several spectators, some mounting the eminence on which the principal figures stand. In the distance is the city, from the gates of which the inhabitants, who may be supposed to have heard of the discovery, are rushing out—Mount Ætna occupies the remote distance.

NOTE II.

THE CALYPSO.

The style of Albano does not form a stronger contrast with that of Michael Angelo, than does 'the Calypso' with 'the tomb of Archimedes'; nor is the latter of these pictures less admirable than the former, for the manner in which every thing is made subordinate, to one predominant character, and a strict observance of the subject.

The point of time chosen is that on which Telemachus, and Mentor first meet Calypso and her nymphs, after the shipwreck. Telemachus seems to address the goddess with awe, and diffidence; but in the severe frown, and stern regard, which accompany the eye of scrutiny with which Mentor beholds her, we recognize the penetration and distrust of the concealed Minerva. Calypso is stepping before her nymphs, with that majestic air which Fenelon makes her assume on the occasion. Behind the principal group, are other nymphs dancing and playing on the timbrel.

All crude and raw tints are kept out of the picture, and it appears to be pervaded by a soft and tender atmosphere, which governs the whole with most complete harmony. The light is not an open sunshine, but such as is given by the watery rays of the sun, when flowing from behind a cloud after rain. The manner in which the principal group is composed and borne out by its own shadow, deserves the highest commendation. The sky, the distance, the waves still heaving, and feeling the influence of the past storm, are all happily coloured, formed, and touched. The pencilling of the foliage in the trees is admirable, and totally unlike that in the 'tomb of Archimedes.'

NOTE III.

The 'Regulus,' and the 'Wolfe' are too well known to the lovers of art, to need any comment. Those who suppose that the latter of these pictures has derived the general admiration, it has met with, from the circumstance of the faces being all portraits, must have as little knowledge, as taste, and judgment in matters relative to the art. I was sorry to find the following note appended to one of Dr. Beattie's Essays—'An historical picture, like West's death of Wolfe, in which the faces are all portraits of individual heroes, and the dresses according to the present mode, may be more interesting now than if these had been more picturesque, and those expressive of different modifications of heroism. But in a future age, when the dresses become unfashionable, and the faces are no longer known as portraits, is there not reason to fear that this excellent piece will lose its effect?' Surely Dr. Beattie does not mean to say that the picture does now receive its effect, as he terms it, from the circumstance of the faces being portraits, and the dresses being fashionable.

I might quote Rubens as an instance that modern dresses may be introduced even into the company of the gods, and goddesses of ancient Greece; though not without censure from many. But does Dr. Beattie, or do those who shall assent to his opinion, when it may be defined, think that only one style of drapery is to be given to the personages of an historic or dramatic painting; that Mr. West should have wrapped the limbs of his Wolfe, his Moncton, and the other figures of that painting, in the blue, red, and yellow blankets of Florence, or in the seraglio trappings of Rubens? And that (in order to secure himself, in future ages, applause as strong as that which has been showered upon the picture in the present) he should have changed the face of Wolfe, because it had not the ideal beauty, for the features of Mr. Townley's Pericles, or the hat of the former for the more classic helmet of the latter? Or can it be supposed by any one that the subject is improper for the pencil? I know that Sir Joshua Reynolds was persuaded to think so before he saw the picture; but the greatest men are obnoxious to error; and I know that when he did see it, when he beheld the wonderful powers of composition, the irresistible force of nature, of expression, and truth that it contained, he needed no arguments to induce him to change his opinion.

Heroes have been hitherto so monopolized, by the proud accoutrements of Chivalric pomp, by the tunic, the breast-plate, the morrion, and the habergeon, that it certainly required some boldness to combat the erroneous opinion that had gone abroad, deduced falsely from principles that could not support it. A hero in boots, and breeches, undoubtedly requires that some management should be bestowed upon him before he can impress us, with the veneration we should feel for him, when arrayed in the prescriptive habiliments of the heroes of antiquity. The cocked hat of one of our Generals has not so imposing an air, as the helmet of a Greek; and, in sound at least, the surremides Agais have an advantage over the 'well booted Hessians;' and even if the forms of different parts of ancient and modern dress, should be passed over without a comparison, the modern attire may lose something of its consequence from being familiar to our eyes; while the ancient, as with the generality of mankind, according to Tacitus, omne ignotum pro magnifico est, gains as much from being too rare for common, or frequent inspection. I can readily allow myself to be persuaded, that if the target and the helmet were as frequent in our streets, as are the parasols, and plumed hats of our ladies, we should (setting aside gallantry) behold the latter with at least as much respect as we should be inclined to pay to the former.

But the judicious painter can conceal, or even turn to his advantage, by particular incidents of light and shadow, those objects which common opinions deem to be unfavourable to his art. An example of this is before us in the picture now mentioned. The hat of the general is placed upon the ground, so as to be of great service in breaking the flatness of a large mass of light, the stock round his neck, answers the same purpose; both of the objects operating in the painting, as a discord introduced into a musical composition; like that, too, they arrest the attention, and fix it upon particular points.

I dare hope and believe that this picture will be instrumental in overthrowing a great, and injurious prejudice: it has already been imitated, and has given a new light to the historic painting of almost all Europe. What the objections may be that can be set in array against the subject, I know not; it is not merely historic, it is dramatic, as circumscribed by historic truth; and every subject of this kind, be its accompaniments, its accidents what they may, is proper for the pencil. Must we only paint Romans and Greeks? Can no human being, be the hero of a picture until he has ceased to live for a thousand years?

We have sufficient proof from other paintings far inferior to this, that the dresses of a picture cannot influence its fate, unless it is bad in other respects, who can believe that the scene in which Calas and his daughters are the chief actors (by Chodowiecki) will ever cease to affect and interest? yet the draperies are less favourable in that work to the purposes of the artist (according to received notions) than the 'Wolfe.' But, like Mr. West, Chodowiecki knew that the object of the dramatic (or, if you will have it to be a simple history, the historic) painter is, to make, form, composition, and colour, but the vehicles of passion and expression, of truth and nature.

WITH A GLOSSARIAL INDEX.

Sweet SWAN of Avon, what a sight it were
To see thee in our waters yet appear.
With all those flights upon the banks of Thames,
That so did take Eliza and King James!
But stay...I see thee in our beni-phure
Advanc'd, and made a constellation here....
Shine forth, thou STAR OF POETS, and, with rage,
Or influence, chide, or cheer the drooping stage.

TERMS.

The first complete edition, in America, of Shakspeare will be contained in sixteen volumes, duodecimo.

It will be printed in a style, eminently beautiful, on a fine cream-coloured woven paper, with a type entirely new and cast for the purpose, by Messrs. Binny and Ronaldson.

The Proprietors pledge themselves, that it shall surpass the London edition in neatness of mechanical execution, and rival it in fidelity and correctness.

It will be printed under the immediate direction and superintendence of an Editor, assisted by several men of letters.

The price, to subscribers, will be one dollar and fifty cents per volume, in boards; to non-subscribers, one dollar and seventy-five cents.

The inferior copy of the last London edition, in 21 vols. boards, sells for FIFTY-ONE DOLLARS; more than double the price of the proposed edition, which the Proprietors have resolved shall, from its cheapness, as well as elegance, deserve the notice of the Public.

To consult the economy or the taste of different Purchasers, an edition will be printed in a compressed, cheap and portable form, without the notes, in 8 vols. 12mo. price one dollar per volume in boards.

It is contemplated to print one volume every month, from the time of commencement, until the work be completed.

The Proprietors sanguinely hope that the liberality of the Public will be conspicuous in the support of a work of singular magnitude, to which intense labour and great expense are necessarily incident.

Dr. Toulmin will soon publish a small volume entitled "Addresses to young men." The subjects on which they turn are sobermindedness, religion, the pursuit of Knowledge, company, conversation, sympathy towards the sex and marriage, and on application to trade, on professional subjects of interest and importance to the manners and happiness of youth.

A new and improved edition of Byron's short Hand, edited by Mr. Molineux of Macclesfield is preparing for publication.

Clio, or a Discourse on Taste. Addressed to a Lady. A new Edition, illustrated by Notes, Anecdotes, and Quotations, adopted to the present Era, By J. Mathew, Esq. A Deputy Lieutenant of the County, and late Captain in the South Battalion of Middlesex Militia; Author of Letters, written during the war in Indian, Political Strictures, Poems, &c.

Few Works have been more popular, or ran through a greater number of Editions, than Clio: It has, however, for some years been out of print, and since the days of its Author, such a variety of revolutions have occurred in the circumstances of the world, that some elucidation appeared necessary in order to produce the effect intended by the original publication. In the humble hope of contributing in a slight degree to this object, the present edition is respectfully offered to the Public, with the Addition of Notes on some part of the Text, which appeared not perfectly applicable to the present Era; Anecdotes of deceased and living personages adduced as examples of asserted facts; and Quotations from Authors who have written on the subjects, of Taste, Genius, and the Fine Arts. The ease and familiarity of style in which the Work is written, cannot fail of being pleasing to every person of real taste; and from being entirely free from abstruse disquisition, or quotations in the learned languages, it will probably prove peculiarly acceptable to the Ladies, to whom it is more particularly addressed.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

A Political writer in England, thus describes the situation of two of the Continental Powers. Spain is intirely under the influence of France. The Spanish government has been, hitherto, suffered to remain neutral in the war, because, no doubt it appeared its services might be, thus, more effectually useful to France, than if it had openly but unwillingly taken part in the hostilities against England. How long this neutrality may be suffered to continue seems uncertain.

Germany remains, for the present, tranquil wherever it is not oppressed by the armies of France, or subjected otherwise, to inconveniences in consequence of the precautions which England is obliged to take against the dangers of naval enterprizes from the German ports in the power of France. Austria augments its troops and makes every defensive preparation which its revenues will bear without alarming the jealousy of those states by which it is viewed with fear or rivalry. Prussia, on the one hand fearfully cajoling France; on the other hand, still striving to rise to a new ascendancy over the house of Austria, maintains, also a great army in perfect discipline. Bavaria having lately risen to new importance among the powers of the German empire keeps up also a great military force, and watches the movements and designs of its neighbours with assiduity. The smaller powers remain in a certain subjection to the views of those three greater ones and to the influence of France. On the other hand, there is not, now, an appearance as if any state in Germany would interfere in the present war.

The perfectibility of human nature is said to be one of the favourite tenets of the creed of Mr. Jefferson. To make a trial which shall test the correctness, of this opinion, a very favorable opportunity offers in our lately acquired territory of Louisiana. Here is ample scope for an experiment. The pupils would be the children of nature, the savages of the forest, whose minds are unadulterated with the prejudices of civilized life, unshackled with its useless restraints, and unembarrassed with too much regulation. Mr. J. might make himself president for life of this Utopia, and perhaps realise some of his fondest dreams.

"No more shall nation against nation rise,
Nor ardent warriors meet with hateful eyes,
Nor fields with gleaming steel be cover'd o'er,
The brazen trumpet kindle war no more;
But useful lances into scythes shall bend,
And the broad falchion in a ploughshare end."

The lambs with wolves shall graze the verdant mead,
And boys in flowing bands the tiger lead;
The steer and lion at one crib shall meet,
And harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet;
The smiling infant in his hand shall take
The crested basilisk and speckled snake,
Pleas'd the green lustre of their scales survey,
And with their forkey tongues shall innocently play."

We are happy to preceive that the London Booksellers, have announced the publication of the first vol. of the Annual review or history of Literature for 1802, to be continued annually. A. Aiken, Editor.

The plan of this work, is such as to combine the characters, both of a review and a history of Literature, and it is hoped that, upon the whole, its execution will be found, to be not unworthy of the rank, to which it aspires. The division into chapters corresponding with the various branches of human knowledge, each of which is preceded by an historical introduction, will, we doubt not, be acknowledged to be equally advantageous as novel. Even for temporary purposes, and for an increased interest in the present perusal, an orderly arrangement is preferable to a miscellaneous, and disproportionate mixture; and for future research, for the ease and convenience with which it may be consulted respecting any particular work, or class of Literature it possesses a clear superiority over all other similar publications. From the compressed, yet handsome manner in which it is printed, this single volume contains as much as is comprized in the three volumes of any monthly series; by which the double advantage is secured of diminishing the expense to the Purchaser, and occupying less space in the Library. The publication of this first volume, has been so long delayed by a most unfortunate accident, and by the Editor's inexperience in the details of management, that we must forego, in the present instance, the merit which it would otherwise have possessed as an early review of books. Arrangements have, however, been made, which for the future will obviate this disadvantage; and we do not mean to deceive the public, when we announce, that the second and all succeeding volumes will make their appearance in the month of March, in every year. The Proprietors and Editor have only to add, that as no pains have been spared, nor expense declined, in procuring the assistance of men in every respect well qualified for the office, they boast that this work will in no respect be found inferior to any other critical publication.

This vol. is a large royal Octavo, Price a Guinea *in Extra boards covered with green paper.

The following whimsical letter appeared in one of the English papers the last year, and we understand that the author's eccentricity obtained him the hand of the fair one to whom it was addressed.

Miss,

You demand of me my lineage, my birth, parentage, &c. Briefly then, I am an Indian—one of the aboriginals of America—descended from a sachem of known valour and merit—my father, a chief of one of the small western tribes, and, in his own country, passes for a great man. His coat of arms is a tomma-hawk and scalping knife, which are considered, in America, of equal rank with the Lion and Unicorn of Great Britain. My mother is a descendant from one of the great families of the south, and, if ever such a nation did exist, is probably of Amazonian extract. She, like all other Americans, is of a good stature, handsome featured, long black hair, and a fine bright copper complexion. The barbarity of your English customs has clipped my hair till it insensibly became a crop. I hope my descent may not be frowned upon by your ladyship. If I am not quite so much of the copper complexion as you might expect from this description, I can only say that European polish has taken it off. This, my dear lady, is all I know of myself, except that I am excessively enamoured of you—and, unless you prove more kind to my wishes, I certainly shall recross the Atlantic, and drown myself in the Muskingum or Wabash.

The motto of the English arms is 'Honi soit qui mal-y-pense.' A Yorkshire wag, reading it on the sign of a public inn, rendered it thus—'Honey, suet, quills, and malt pens.'

The motto of the English ambassador's (Mr. Merry) coat of arms is 'Toujours Gai,' always merry.

* The annual subscription of the monthly critical Journals in boards is £1. 19, and this vol. contains an equal quantity of matter.

The Editor of the National Aegis, a democratic paper, thus candidly appreciates the worth of Connecticut wit and humour. "We are always pleased with sterling wit and pungent satire, wherever it may be found, and whatever may be the subject. We cannot, therefore, withhold our tribute of applause from the anniversary ode in the Connecticut Courant, intitled 'Sketches of the Times.' It is a legitimate offspring of the sportive muse, which brought forth Hudibras, and presided at the birth of MacFingal. Without approving the invective, or subscribing to the political sentiments of the author, we feel ourselves at liberty to laugh at his wit, and to admire his genius."

THE SAILOR'S FAREWEL.

By Dr. Ogilvie.

Hark! the hollao, that calls us away!
Tom, fill up a bumper in haste;
While the ship lies unmor'd in the bay,
Let us drink to the days that are past.

Let us drink, jolly boys, ere we part,
To our mates that carouse on the shore,
To the friend whom we lodge in our heart;
To the nymph whom we prize as our store.

Adieu to the hut in the vale,
To the secret recess in the grove;
To old Ned, with October so stale;
To Molly, the maid of my love:

To the joys of the feast and the glass,
Where beauty displays all her charms;
To the song and the buxom young lass,
That melts in the sound in your arms.

See the mainsail that floats on the wind,
Hark! they heave up the anchor!—Gee ho!
Our friends stand assembled around,
While the shores all re-echo—hillo!

Let the heart of each Britain rejoice
At the shouts that resound from the main;
'Tis the spirit of England, brave boys,
That swells in the slow rolling strain.

Farewel to our dear native home,
And our sweet little pastimes of yore;
O'er the wide spreading ocean we roam,
And may see the old hamlet no more.

Yet the heart of a sailor can feel
For his friends, for his country's repose;
To these he presents the smooth peel;
And the rough oak beneath—to their foes.

Ye breezes, blow fair from the land!
Thou Power, on all nature impress'd,
Who holds the wild winds in thy hand,
O smooth the rough billows to rest.

They fill the loose sails as they glide;
The landscape recedes from the view;
In our broad wake, we furrow the tide—
Ye shores of old England, adieu!

SONNET.

THE VILLAGE SABBETH.

The farm-house left, from upland hills and dells,
The rustic troop crowd thro' the church-yard lane;
With lively chime resound the busy bells,
As wind their footsteps to the ivy'd fane.
Dress'd in their Sunday shoes, their milk-white frock,
The lisping youngsters trudge with shining face;
The curate, watchful shepherd of his flock,
Smiles on his charge with unaffected grace.
His partner, doctor, of the peasant train,
Her offspring by, showers blessings as she goes;
Their little hands huge books of prayer sustain,
Their cheeks more ruddy than the damask rose!
Best emblems of the golden age!—how few,
Scenes of tranquillity, like your's pursue.

THE HOPEFUL YOUTH.

A man who saw his son quite handy
Toss off a glass of strong French brandy;
Neddy, cried he, ah don't do so,
For liquor is our greatest foe.
But we are taught to love our foes,
Quoth Ned, so, father, here it goes.

Recal, Clarinda, to thy breast,
The moments past and o'er,
When tho' we were, ah! too, too blest,
We sigh'd for something more.

When I was doating and content,
And thou, Clarinda, dear,
With new desires my soul was rent,
And thine with jealous fear.

Oh, had we with discretion lov'd,
And sometimes thou deny'd,
We ne'er the sick disgust had prov'd,
Nor o'er past fondness sigh'd.

Ah, parricide delight, the flame
That gave thee birth, is cloy'd,
The traitor bliss, like Judas, came,
And with a kiss destroy'd.

The subjoined retort courtois was occasioned by a cynical allusion in a late Port Folio.

With learning's magic spell,
Shall gentle ladies charm you,
When ignorance can tell—
A simple rule to charm you?

What nymph, endow'd with senses,
Employs scholastic art,
(With nouns, and moods, and tenses),
To conjugate—the heart?

Your sophistry illusive,
Unletter'd belles can reach:
And arguments conclusive,
As ruby lips will teach.

CANZONET.

By John Edmund Harwood.

Ask why a blush o'erspreads the rose,
Its velvet leaves in crimson dyed;
Why, round, the busy zephyr blows,
And waves the flower in stately pride:

Ask why the lilies, drooping shed
The dew-drop from each pallid leaf;
Why each reclines its beauteous head,
As weigh'd to earth with bitter grief:

Emma vouchsafed the rose a kiss!
The modest lily she disdain'd!
Who would not weep such joy to miss?
Who would not blush, such joy obtain'd!

LITERARY MAGAZINE.—A new monthly publication has made its appearance in Philadelphia. It is termed the Literary Magazine, and is edited by a gentleman whose talents are acknowledged to be of a superior order. As the author of a novel called Wieland, he acquired considerable celebrity, and we find from the second number that the subject on which that work was founded is to be pursued in the present periodical publication. It will be recollected by the readers of Wieland that the extraordinary power of ventriloquism has a very material agency in producing the surprising incidents interwoven in that story. The memoirs of Carwin the Biloquist, which are commenced in the magazine, for November, will it is presumed possess more than common interest.

While it is to be regretted that every attempt to diffuse miscellaneous information and entertainment by publications of this sort have hitherto been found unprofitable to those who have made effort, it is also to be hoped that the success of the present undertaking will remove the stigma consequently attached to the taste and literature of this country.

[N. T. Morn. Chron.]

Anecdote.—Two men of the sword, one from Virginia, the other from Kentucky, meeting at an Inn, in Pennsylvania, over a bottle of wine, an altercation took place, which ended in a challenge from the Virginian, and was accepted by the Kentuckian. The seconds were chosen, and the preliminaries agreed on; which were, that they should stand back to back and march, and neither fire till both had wheeled. They took their stand, and both marched; the Virginian turned, and saw his antagonist still marching forward, and cried out 'where are you going?' to which the other answered, casting his eye over his right shoulder, 'I am going to Kentucky, sir.'

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Philander's 'accomplished fair' must, in our opinion, display more airs and graces, before she can make any conquests in public.

'Verses on a violin' are destitute of harmony.

The 'acrostic on spring' is of such a versatile and accommodating character, that it would apply, with equal propriety and success, to a very chilly season.

We would cheerfully oblige S. O. if his request was within our plan.

The greatest obligation we can bestow on 'Sydney,' is to suppress his production.

'Past twelve o'clock' came too late for insertion.

H, who dates his poetry from Cambridge, is invited to a regular correspondence.

The correspondent who, some time since, favoured us with one of the most pertinent speculations on the cession of Louisiana we have ever perused, and shortly after transmitted an anecdote respecting the first Earl of Chatham, will oblige us by continuing his speculations.

The dialogue between X and Y is incomprehensible. It may be wit at Washington, or excite a smile at New-Orleans, but it has a very grave face in Philadelphia.

A correspondent avers that his performance was not originally intended for the press, therefore, agreeably to the first intention, it shall not be sent to our Printer.

The epitaph, sent us by S, has been repeatedly printed in all the news-papers.

Climenole usefully and pleasantly derides the democrats. His stile is in the manner of the Dean of St. Patrick's, and his wit is a thorn in the side of jacobinism.

SONNET.

TO WILLIAM COWPER, ESQ.

Written in the year 1792.

Cowper! to thee, whose comprehensive mind
Looks nature through, whose animated lyre,
By plastic genius to thy hands consign'd,
No vulgar thoughts, no vulgar strains inspire,
My thanks sincere I pay—not that thy muse,
Borne on mao-lian wing, has dar'd to soar—
Not that thy vivid fancy-fashion'd views
Breathe the rich spirit of poetic lore,
But that fair freedom's self the theme supplies,
O'erlooks thy labours, and thy work refines,
Bids thee lament the trade where mercy dies,
And coward justice all his rights resigns.
Oh! when will Britain hear her awful voice,
Oh! when shall Afric's sons rejoice!

In various talk th' instructive hours they pass,
Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last,
One speaks the glory of the British queen,
And one describes a charming Indian screen,
A third interprets words, and looks, and eyes,
At every word a reputation dies,

With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that.....POPE.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

IT was one of the wise precepts of Pythagoras to his disciples, that, after their labours were over, they should conclude by a careful review and examination of the events of the day. Conformably to so excellent an instruction, to-night, before I retired to rest, I sat down to consider the manner in which my evening had been spent. I had been in a large assembly of young persons of both sexes convened for their own amusement, who seemed to possess the power, as well as the inclination, to please. Yet I could not but regret that all the attractions of beauty and fashion should have been lost by an injudicious disposition of them, and that the want of something to do, or to engage their attention, should have repressed the pleasure which such meetings are calculated to afford. Being myself, on these occasions, a mute and a mere 'looker-on here in Vienna,' I had leisure to survey the manœuvres of the company; and as the forms of a tea-party have never yet been recorded, for the benefit of posterity, it may not be superfluous to describe them. About half after seven we had all assembled: the ladies were disposed in prim array round the room, like jars for the inspection of purchasers, whilst the gentlemen occupied the fire-place. In this situation the parties remained for the space of half an hour reconnoitring each other; the beaux viewing and criticising the appearance of the belles, who, if an occasional whisper, and its attendant giggle, can be trusted, were equally particular in their observations. After these preliminary arrangements, the object of the congregation was discovered by the introduction of the tea, which discomposed for a while the placid gravity of the entertainment, and obliged both parties to exercise the cup and the spoon for a considerable time. Observing the avidity with which this drink was swallowed, I plucked my neighbour by the sleeve to request an explanation, but he only replied that it had been so time immemorial, and quoted, in the punning spirit of the time, 'Et parum comis sine te juvenas Mercuriusque.' But its effects were soon visible. Stimulated by its influence, a valourous knight issued from the crowd which defended the fire, and boldly advanced to a damsel. By degrees a lodgement was formed in a chair, which separated two ladies, the youths acquired courage, adventured across the room, and advanced to the encounter. The weather in all its forms was now discussed. The fair, the foul, the misty, the rainy, the foggy, the cloudy, the hazy, the state of the walking on the past and preceding day, together with the possibility of a clear or a wet day were subjects which received, as they deserved, a marked attention. A few, indeed, ventured a bolder flight, but they soon fell alike unsupported and disregarded. But lest our interest in the affairs, which are thus passing, should cease, a fresh supply of refreshments came to cheer and enliven us. These at once stimulate, and afford subjects for conversation. Thus the brilliant wits made an easy transition from kisses of flour to kisses of flesh, and the punsters almost raised a laugh in descanting on the comforts of comforts. We were now to be regaled with the concord of sweet sounds, but on which of the ladies the choice was to fall still remained in the hands of fate. All wished to avoid the arduous undertaking, and if the rosy cheeks of the fair ones did not evince the contrary, I should have thought myself in a hospital or a rookery. Not one but had been dismally afflicted with disorders, or who did not vow that she rather screamed or croaked than sung. Much solicitation at last produced a song, during which every one was bound in silent rapture. The end of the song gave an opportunity of expressing the astonishment of the hearers. The connoisseurs called it bravissimo, whilst those who did not venture on a superlative, contented themselves with a smaller portion of admiration. To assist the music in the humane office of beguiling the weariness of the company, cards were introduced, and these did seem to engage and amuse a few, but still the many were in a state of hopeless despondency, to extricate themselves from which, after many attempts to keep themselves awake, the company gradually retired, till at length the entertainment is concluded, and the parties dispersed.

Such was a tea-party, the bare recital of which shews the littleness and inanity which must necessarily attend it; whence it is derived our antiquarians seem at a loss to determine. If it be not entertainment sui generis, from its Dutch complexion I should readily discover its native country, and were every gentleman provided with a chair, (a consummation devoutly to be wished), and a pipe, we might easily date its introduction at the time of our German settlements. If neither of these suppositions be correct, I should suspect we had taken the hint from the talks of our Chickasaw tribes, and that, therefore, the custom is altogether aboriginal. Leaving, however, these profound disquisitions to others, to you, Mr. Saunter, I apply for the correction of this fashionable procedure, of which all seem to complain, but which none seem inclined to reform. In the present state of the world it seems necessary that the gay and the fashionable should meet in some way, but the difficulty of finding some employment for them, when collected, is formidable. Rational conversation seems to be the desideratum, but this can never be attained in large companies, where from the nature of the case, we must be constantly in motion, and directing our discourse to a number of persons. Besides, the topics on which we are allowed to converse, at such a place, are necessarily trivial and common-place, and when the stock of conversation, which each one can bring, is exhausted, the company becomes tedious and uninteresting, whilst if some employment were given to the parties, that fund might remain for a much longer time. I think, therefore, we may conclude, that any assembly of which conversation is the only employment will, from its very nature, be dull; and the almost proverbial insipidity of these parties, fully justifies the conclusion. What, therefore, shall be introduced, or, to speak with the logicians, what substance shall we have of which conversation will be the accident? In the present day, a proposal that the parties should bring their work, would startle our belles, for besides that, the duty would lie on their side altogether, (for what have our beaux to do?) many of them might produce an unanswerable objection to showing the labours of their hands. Music or cards are ineffectual to amuse a large company. There remains, therefore, but one resource—that is dancing, which unites all the qualities of a murderer of time, a healthy exercise, and a substitute for conversation, which all seem to like, and without which scarcely any collection of young people are capable of enjoying themselves. To shew, however, my impartiality, I must acknowledge, that some advantage has been derived from these entertainments. Our tea trade has visibly increased since their introduction, our beaux have been incited to the study of astronomy, and I am told that the number of almanacs disposed of is always in proportion to the frequency of tea parties. To conclude, let us, Mr. Saunter, banish these noxious congregations to the huts of the Choctaws or the dykes of Holland, and let our society be no longer haunted by this monster, which frightens away our ease, our pleasure and almost every enjoyment.

NO. 4.

Memorabilia democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science. Interspersed with anecdotes, characters and speeches of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats, by Slaveslap Kiddnap, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651

Washington, printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

It is a great comfort to me, that the public coincides so entirely with touching the merits of the work under

Since my last number was published, I have had frequent occasion to converse with men of both parties, who, although they are at variance in every thing else, agree in this, that it contains a rare and precious specimen of fashionable democratic style. The strain in which Mr. Kiddnap proceeds, in his four ensuing chapters, is not at all less elevated than that which has been so justly admired. But as, in these, he has entered upon a critical and philological inquiry into the name and origin of democracy, in which he has had frequent recourse to Grecian, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Sanscrit writers, all of whom, as was becoming, in a work so solemn as this, he cites in their most ancient versions; and, to prevent erroneous translations in their original languages. I have found it necessary, in consequence of the deficiency of our printer, in these types, to postpone the curiosity of the public, until it shall be conceived expedient to publish an edition entire. The sixth chapter will excite great interest, not only from the subject, which is an inquiry into the causes which make the clergy enemies to democracy, but also from the renowned pen engaged in the task. The public will not need the hints, thrown out by Mr. Kiddnap, to discover the production of one of the first law characters in our union. They, who have read his official letters, and, much more, those laboured essays of his intitled 'the Farmer,' will recognise all those characteristics of style and sentiment, which so eminently distinguish him. Nevertheless, for the satisfaction of the public, and to the end that no reasonable doubt may remain, that the letter, which Mr. Kiddnap has made public, is truly the work of that eminent man, I have carefully collated it with those celebrated essays, and have caused to be marked, in italics, all those expressions relative to the clergy, which may be found as well in this letter as in 'the Farmer.' Whereby I think the most sceptical must be convinced of its authenticity. For, although a similar train of thought will often suggest to minds, equally impressed with their subject, a similarity of expression, yet when the same epithets and ideas, the same turns of expression, and peculiarities of diction, are every moment occurring, and that not only in general combination, but in their minute arrangements, and individual qualifications, no man, I trust, can hesitate to refer both productions to the same original. Besides,—the public will here excuse me if I lay aside, for one moment, my character of a critic, to give vent to a party sentiment, let any man read any number of 'the Farmer,' the tenth for instance, and afterwards this letter to Mr. Kiddnap, and I dare engage he will lay down both with the same irritated and indignant temperature of mind. Nor will the classical reader be able to refrain from repeating the exclamation, which the former works of the attorney-general have never failed to extort from him, Huic Vulcanus erat pater!! For, like the other child of that hard-working god, he eludes the grasp of his adversaries, by vomiting forth words, like clouds, impenetrably dark, through which nothing is revealed but that fiery vengeance, which flames and smoulders, and which is made ten times more terrible by the black opaque which accompanies it:

*Faucibus ingentem fumum, mirabile dictu,
Evomit; involvuntque domum caligine circa,
Prospectum eripiens oculis; glomeratque sub antro
Funeralem noctem, committit igne tenebris.*

But our author is of a different opinion. Like others of his sect, he has brought himself to believe that 'the Farmer' is a most lucid, satisfactory writer, and an equal honour and advantage to the cause of democracy. Lest, therefore, it should be thought that it is my design to prejudice the public, whereas nothing is farther from my thoughts, I shall present the sixth chapter entire. Being determined that no party considerations shall tempt me, in the course of this review, to depart from a rigid impartiality. I would not conceal any laurels which so able a judge as Mr. Kiddnap may think due to any democratic chief.

CHAPTER V.

The reasons which make priests enemies to democracy considered.

"Democracy has had then, as we have shewn, an existence in all periods of society. Every where it has been the solace of oppressed humanity. The wretched outcast of the social compact has ever found it the balm of his woes; and, when all other means of livelihood fail, any man may be assured of support, or of compassion, who will set up for a patriot. Thus, for instance, when that canonized democrat, Abijah Adams, expired, miserably in agony and in want, under the brutal operation of the sedition law, what sympathy soothed his dying pillow! How were the pangs of dissolving nature mitigated by the consolations he experienced! Tears, dropping from the fairest republican eyes, softened even the stones which composed the floor of his prison. The democratic ladies of Boston wept around his couch, and, with their tender hands, closed those eyes, doomed never again to open on the miseries of his country. The clothes, in which he died, being purchased, at twice their worth, by the proprietor of the Boston museum, are, with those of other oppressed patriots, exposed three times each week to crowds of zealous republicans, who thither repair to enkindle their just indignation with the sight of these precious relics of this martyr to liberty. Since then such are the comforts which the exercise of this art yields, and such the honours it attains, strange it is that the clergy have in all ages and countries, where they could act out the spirit of their profession, been among its most zealous and influential opposers. Yet is it not more strange than it is true. Although there are some noble instances of individuals, especially in these southern States, rooting out of themselves the natural antipathies of their sect, yet, it can not be denied, that with a free exceptions, this body of men have been, in all places, where they are encouraged, the greatest terror of all true democrats, and that the interests of the democratic science have received from them, the deadliest blow. The causes of that animosity, which the clergy have universally discovered to democracy, I thought it not improper, in a work of this nature, to explain. But I found myself, on reflection lamentably, deficient in materials, as my observation extends not beyond the Clergy, in the antient dominion, who are, all the world know, the most innocent and harmless creatures imaginable. But recollecting the depressed State of New-England, in this respect, and knowing that there are imperious, and rapacious Clergy, sucked the heart-blood of the people and was the immediate cause of that vice, ignorance and slavery, which abound, (the State of Rhode Island excepted), in every part of the Eastern States, while the present condition of the priesthood, in Virginia, is the cause of that high State of morality, knowledge and Liberty, which, in so much perfection we here enjoy. I resolved to apply for light, on this subject, to a great law character, who, by his situation in the centre of Massachusetts, is enabled to observe, and by his instinctive abhorrence of all tyranny, civil and ecclesiastical, highly qualified to represent the odious and abominable despotism of the Eastern Clergy, in its true colours. This great man was no sooner apprised of my wish, than he undertook the task and has executed it, with all that stern, republican zeal and hardy democratic muscle, for which he is distinguished. In the course of less than three weeks, I received the following elaborate letter, which will supersede the necessity of any farther remarks of mine upon the subject of this chapter. Besides that acute perception and deep research, which distinguish this writer the intelligent reader cannot fail to remark that this letter possesses that exquisite polish of style, which is his peculiar characteristic which consists in an amalgamation of the pomp of Cicero, with the splendor of Lord Bolingbroke. He is no less conspicuous than they for that copia verborum and that plena et exuberantia oratio, which those writers so greatly admired and so successfully executed. I shall not, in compliance with his modest request, annex his name; although it is impossible that excellencies, so unparalleled, should not be traced to the only head in the United States capable of producing them."

It is with extreme reluctance, that I divide this chapter between two numbers. But my printer assures me, that the publication of it entire will occupy more room than he can allot to it, consistently with his engagements to other correspondents. I know the public will be impatient to possess the work of so elevated an artist, on his favourite subject. But the above consideration will, I trust, be a sufficient apology. I cannot, however, close this number without expressing my regret, that so exquisite a strain of pathetic eloquence, as that, which Mr. Kiddnap, has exhausted on Abijah Adams, should not have lighted on a worthier object. I fear that Mr. Kiddnap will be outrageous, as other democratic writers have been before, at hearing, that, according to my last letters from Boston, Abijah Adams, the lamented hero of this bloody tragedy is now alive, and in the full exercise of all his qualities, animal and vegetable; that he eats, drinks, sleeps et olet ut oim. Our author has fallen into this error by placing too implicit confidence in the Aurora and other democratic publications, who have massacred poor Abijah in a manner shocking to humanity. The known candour of our author will doubtless, lead him to correct this mistake, in the next edition of his work. Unless, indeed, Adams, should before that event luckily die, in the course of nature, in which case to alter the phraseology a little, and represent him as lingering three, four, or ten years, as it may happen, under the effects of his imprisonment will have, in a democratic view, the happiest tendency.

The following letter addressed to the Editor of a British Magazine, is worthy the attention of our readers.

SIR,

"Many observations have appeared within these few years on the subject of the credit of the Bank of England, and the validity of Bank notes. The authors have probably been actuated by pure and patriotic motives; but it can be made to appear most easily, that all their reasonings are unworthy of the smallest attention. Unacquainted with the routine of the business of the Bank, and with the restrictions under which Bank notes are issued, these writers have assumed mistaken data, and deduced false conclusions.

"No mathematical axiom, no self evident proposition, on geometrical demonstration can be more apparent than the Bank of England is, and always has been necessarily solvent; and that every one of its notes must always be worth twenty shillings in the pound.

"This position will be readily assented to on the bare perception of the two following Facts.

"1. The Bank of England holds in pledge substantial and undeniable securities for the whole amount of the notes which at any time it has issued.

"II And every Bank note in circulation has its representative value in the Bank of England."

"These two facts demonstrate the absurdity of all the reasonings, which have been published of late years on this subject."

"However, for the information of persons who are not acquainted with the routine of the Bank business it may be stated as a satisfactory elucidation of the above positions that no note is issued from the Bank, except in the purchase of Bullion, in the discounting of good commercial bills and in loans granted or unexceptionable public or private security."

"At a crisis like the present, it seems to me, Mr. Editor, worth while to set this question in so clear a light, as to prevent its distracting the attention or diminishing the confidence of the country."

I am, sir, your humble servant,

Philo Veritatis."

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

St. Ildefonse, September 21, 1780.

DEAR SIR,

I received your obliging favour of the 18th ult. the 11th inst. and I should have sooner answered it, if my punctuality equalled the pleasure I always have in writing to you. Your situation gives me pain, while it alarms me; and I own it to you that my heart feels a mixed emotion difficult for me to describe, pity and admiration, with a passion that I shall not name, rule it alternately. Your piece on the affair of Charlestown was well-timed, and, without flattery, well written, expede Hérculem. I saw it before you sent it to me, for I have the perusal of most of your gazettes from your M—r, whose politeness hath increased since the late good news; indeed it has happy effects everywhere. Do not be apprehensive of Mr. C—d, although you are told the princess of Asturias smiles on him. I have no American news but what you will find in the public prints. It appears that the union, enthusiasm, and perseverance of the people is such as we could wish. The Count D'Estaing will arrive at Cadiz Sunday or Monday next; when I hope he will find the fleet in forwardness to act as the two courts may judge proper, which as yet remains secret.

I do not fully comprehend what you say in the secret article of your letter; because you have intermixed figures, the sense of which is not contained in the list you sent me. Be cautious, and write me the nature of the rardj—business. You will remember, my dear sir, your promise with respect to my letters—written, as they have been, in the warmth of friendship and confidence, I should like them to be in no hands but your's. Mr. J. presents his compliments. Adieu, I hope better days and better deeds.

Yours sincerely,

W. C.

If you see Messrs. de Neufville, he will commune with you, and I pray you to be in good spirits. You must imitate the example of the old man, mentioned in a book that you do not think much of I believe, keep in this world that your eyes may see our salvation.

Pazy, October 2, 1780.

DEAR SIR,

I received duly yours' several letters of the twelfth, fifteenth, seventeenth, nineteenth, and twenty-first of September. I am much pleased with the Intelligence you send me, and with the papers you have had printed.

Mr. Searle is a military officer in the Pennsylvania Troops, and a member of Congress. He has some commission to execute for that Province, but none that I know of from Congress. He has another letter for you, from Mr. Lovell, which he has shewn me. It is full of expressions of his Esteem; and I understand from Mr. Searle, that you stand exceeding well, with the committee, and with the Congress in general. I am sorry to see any marks of uneasiness and apprehension in your letters. Mr. Chaumont tells me that you want some assurance of being continued. The Congress itself is changeable at the pleasure of their electors, and none of their Servants have, or can have any such assurance. If therefore any thing better for you, and more substantial should offer, no body can blame you for occupying it, however satisfied they may be with your services. But as to the continuance of what you now enjoy, or of some thing as valuable in the service of the Congress, I think you may make yourself easy, for that your appointment seems more likely to be increased than diminished, though it does not belong to me to promise any thing.

Mr. Laurens was to sail three days after Mr. Searle, who begins to fear he must be lost, as it was a small Vessel, he intended to embark in.—He was bound directly to Holland.

I enclose some Extracts of letters from two French Officers of distinction in the Army of M. de Rocheambault, which are pleasing, as they mark the good Intelligence, that subsists between the Troops, contrary to the reports circulated by the English. They will do perhaps for your Leyden Gazette.

With great esteem and affection I

Am ever,

Your faithful friend and servant.

B. FRANKLIN.

October, 2, 1780.

DEAR SIR,

I received your double dated letter of the first and third ult. with that pleasure that I always receive any thing from you. I feel for your situation, and have so often expressed it that you cannot doubt it now. All our news of late has been good, and I wish I could give you such as would be personally agreeable to you. You know, my dear apostle, that I left congress before any appointment for Holland was in agitation, and, therefore, all that I could do was to remind the members of congress of your long services and attachment. I did this to many, and yet, to my mortification, I find, that, in the appointment for that country, you appear to be forgot; but as my intelligence is vague, I would not have you to count much upon it, and above all not to give way to melancholy or despair. If this should be the case, write to congress a modest and exact state of your situation previous to and since you engaged in our affairs. Communicate to no one my advice. But speak to Mr. Laurence, whom you will see in Holland, and, perhaps, before you receive this. I hope he is a just man, and I am sure he is generous and liberal; cultivate him assiduously, for in our enthusiasm for the * * * parts of human nature and their affairs we must not forget that we are all men, and stand in need of the assistance of men, independent, as you and I are, in every idea of a public nature.

I am sorry, on the public account, for what you tell me of the person at Amsterdam. I have found often that public persons consult more private feelings than public interest. I shall be sorry to think this of the person in question; but as I have no immediate correspondence with him, you will oblige me in giving me a detail of his motions, connections, &c. a few Louis d'ores employed in this way will not be amiss, and I will repay them to Messrs. de Neufville's order. This is merely for my personal satisfaction, without a doubt or suspicion.

Mr. C—d is still here. Please to insert that he was not permitted to stay at St. Ildefonse in your gazette, and, at the same time, mention, in your own way, that Mr. Jay remained there, and that your humble servant appeared at court frequently, and was generally well received, which is fact, and the insertion of such an article is meant only in opposition to falsehoods from the other party and their friends. You will also insert the following article, from the Newbern gazette—July, Bodies of troops from all quarters assemble to form the army under the command of his excellency general Gates, who will soon be in condition to block the English in their late vaunted conquest of Charleston, and drive them from the small extent of country they possess in Georgia.

This army, while it represses the rash attempts of our invaders, will contribute to facilitate the operations of the Spanish arms in the Floridas. where we have every thing to hope from the active and enterprising character of gen. Galver, who commands in that quarter. We should be unjust to that gallant officer if we did not mention the attachment that he has always discovered to the common cause, and in all his concern which regard the interest of the United States, and particularly to such of their inhabitants as have stood in need of his protection. The conduct of this governor discredits all the false ideas with which our ancient tyrants endeavoured to inspire us with respect to Spanish policy, and we look forward with pleasure to the time when we shall have no other neighbours on that side of the continent than the subjects of his catholic majesty. You will word this as you please, but send it to the first gazette. Although I am not in the secret, I believe great and brilliant designs are meditated. Adieu. DISCIPULUS.

P. S. Put this letter on the fire, and there to be seen by none but yourself.

DEAR SIR,

Russy, October 9, 1780.

I received yours of the 29th September and 3d October. It is a very good addition you made to your memoir for the ministers of Russia and Sweden. I am glad to find you are again on such good terms with the ambassador, as to be invited to his comedy. I doubt not of your continuing to cultivate that good understanding. I like much your insertions in the gazettes—such things have good effects.

Your information relative to the transactions at Petersburg and in Denmark are very interesting, and afforded me a good deal of satisfaction; particularly the former. Mr. Searle will have the pleasure of seeing you. I recommend him warmly to your civilities. He is much your friend, and will advise Mr. Laurence to make you his secretary, which I hope you will accept. I have given it as my opinion that Mr. L. can no where find one better qualified, or more deserving. The choice is left to that minister, and he is empowered to give a salary of 500l. sterling a year. I am in pain on account of his not being yet arrived; but hope you will see him soon. I request you would find means to introduce Mr. Searle to the Portuguese ambassador. Pray consider the inclosed papers, and, after advising with your friend, give me your opinion as to the manner of the application to the States General, whether I should make it thro' their ambassador, or directly with a letter to the G. P. or in what other manner. You know we wrote to him formerly and received no answer. With great esteem, I am your faithful friend,

B. FRANKLIN.

P. S. You say nothing of Mr. Adams. How do you stand with him? What is he doing?

NOTES RELATIVE TO THE PAINTINGS OF MR. WEST.

[Concluded.]

NOTE IV.

The opening of the four first seals. From the Revelation of St. John.

Subjects of this nature lie only within the grasp of great minds. All things necessary to be represented in them are ideal, and can have their prototype only in the mind of the artist. All the benefit that he can derive from external sources, is assistance in the modification of those forms which must circumscribe his ideas: and every thing must be so ordered by him, that coalitions of forms merely possible, may be taught to wear the appearance of probability, and be offered to us in a manner so plausible, that we do not revolt from them as extravagant, or reject them as absurd.

The difficulty of treating this subject in a manner worthy of its sublimity must be apparent, upon reading the words of Scripture:

'And I saw when the lamb opened one of the Seals; and I heard, as it were the voice of thunder, one of the four beasts saying, come and see. And I saw, and behold a white horse; and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him; and he went forth conquering, and to conquer. And when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, come and see. And there went out a second beast that was red: and power was given to him that sat thereon, to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another; and there was given unto him a great sword. And when he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, come and see. And I beheld, and lo, a black horse: and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. And I heard a voice, &c. And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, come and see. And I looked, and behold, a pale horse; and his name that sat on him was Death; and Hell followed with him: and power was given unto him over the fourth part of the Earth, to kill with the sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth.'

On approaching this picture, the eye is carried to the centre of it, where, laying waste all before him, and around him, Death, on the pale horse, drives over a group that already feels his power. An infant, naked, dead, livid, is thrown over its mother, who lies prostrate in mortal agonies, already suffused with a pale deadly hue. Another infant, with a countenance full of terror and affection, clings to her; her head is supported by a man, who, with woe and despair forcibly depicted in his features, interposes one arm between the object of his care and Death, on whom he fixes an imploring eye. At the feet of the woman is a man falling backwards, endeavouring to support himself on one arm, and covering his head with the other. Behind this groupe, and forming an appendage to it, is Famine, characterised by his exhausted cup, his ghastly, and hungering countenance, abdominal contraction, and limbs palsied and incapable of motion. Still farther behind, is a female, the full personification of woe and misery. Over, and in the midst of this group, in his dreadful course, is Death; 'black as night, fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell, and shakes a deadly dart.' But the painter has not given the trite and vulgar darts generally placed in the hand of this king of terrors; his shafts are fire, and his darts are the sudden lightning. The pale horse that bears him, is almost as much an object of terror as his rider. He seems to be the horse 'whose neck is clothed in thunder, the glory of whose nostrils is terrible, who swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage. Hovering over Death, and in his train, are a throng of hideous monsters, the fiendish character of whose expression plainly marks them as the progeny of Hell; and by the fiery glow that flashes in the gloom, from which they are emerging, the imagination is impressed with an idea of the continuation of their train, and is carried into infinite space. To the right, in shadow, is he that sat on the black horse, with the balances in his hand; and further to the right, taking a course different from that of Death, is he that sat on the red horse, that had power to take peace from the Earth, and the conqueror on the white horse; the one pouring forth his destructive shafts, the other threatening with the sword. In the distance, is carnage by land and by water. The other side of the picture is covered with the destruction of the beasts of the Earth. This part is connected with the middle group, by a horse that crouches down in terror, under the feet of the pale horse that carries Death. The fury of the lions, that are rushing on their prey, the dismay of the wretch who attempts to draw his sword, and the headlong descent of him that has been tossed on the horns of the bull, are admirably conceived and expressed. They are the prominent features of the left side of the picture.

The composition is, as is usual with Mr. West, excellent, and the disposition of the different groups such as is calculated to shew the parts, which ought to be brought forward, even if the distribution of light were less skilful than it is. The colouring is such, as the subject demands, grave and severe, yet not harsh or crude, but properly tempered by a partial introduction of warmth. The colouring of the woman and her infant is in the very tones of mortality, and her garments are the robes of death. The pervading tone is well sustained throughout, and aided by the dismal heaviness of the sky, and the gleams that seem to shoot athwart the horizon. Although the picture has been wrought with great boldness and impetuosity of pencil which the subject demands, the drawing is correct and fine, and is kept in due bounds.

Perhaps Mr. West has never been so happy in expression as in parts of this picture. Nothing can be better conceived than the savage and unrelenting fury of Death; it speaks as well in his action, as in his face; it breathes through him, from the stormy forehead and cruel eye, down to the extreme tension of the strained foot; it is announced as well by the whirl and brandish of his arm, as by the open nostrils, and the fell exultation of this mouth. His eye, like his arm, has no single scope, and destruction not less than universal, seems to be his purpose. The horse has a terrific wildness, which the features of that animal might be supposed incapable of expressing. The agony of the last pangs that separate the soul from the body, is working in the face of the prostrate woman, yet half smothered, and struggling through the veil of stupefaction; the expression in the face and attitude of him that supports her, can be conceived by those only, who, having seen the picture, are able to recollect it; and the earnestness of sorrow and solicitude in the living child, can only be equalled by the character of morbid fleshiness that is so ably kept up by its dead mother.

In the dead serpent, and the dove mourning over its mate, the painter has given us an epitome of the whole picture, and by suggesting to us the powers and qualities which those animals have, and represent in their symbolic acceptance, has in one spot comprised the subject, as it were, into an encheiridion.

Such is the general outline of this picture; a picture that trembles with destruction, and havoc, and woe, and terror, and dismay. In it the Artist has employed various instruments and a multiplicity of engines, each working in its own manner, but all tending to one object, and all calculated to unite their powers in forcing one irresistible idea upon the mind, and stamping it upon the imagination.

NOTE V.

The resting of the ark, and the subsiding of the waters. Mr. West, by his manner of treating this subject, has given to it a wonderful dignity; shewing, that as well in painting, as in poetry, simplicity is a branch of the sublime. The component parts of this picture are in the ark, the bow set in the cloud, the memorial of God's covenant with Noah, the waters, and, placed in the front of the picture, a group of the bodies of those who have perished in the flood, and with them, the victim of his own snares, the serpent, whose head the seed of the woman was doomed to bruise.

The form of the ark is such as suits not the purposes of the painter without some particular management. It is here placed in a commanding and impressive situation, in the midst of clouds, high in the centre of the picture, immediately under the rainbow, which has an introduction purposely anticipatory. Shrouded in obscure dimness, in 'disastrous twilight,' the form of the ark has something undetermined about it, from the prismatic reflections that play and glimmer round it. The raven is represented as passing to and fro, and the dove, self-poised over the waters, is gathering in her beak the first emerging germ of vegetation.

NOTE VI.

Each of the pictures already mentioned, is in a style peculiar to itself; and indeed so much attention does Mr. West pay to his subject, and so thoroughly does he study it, and adapt his design, his composition, his colouring, and even his handling of the pencil, to it, that every variety of subject meets in him with an appropriate variety of style.

I shall briefly mention two other pictures, which bear not the least resemblance to each other in character of style, or to any of the pictures I have before noticed.

The first is a picture, painted some years ago, now retouched, and which was lately about to be placed in the Foundling Hospital. It represents the action of the point of time on which our Saviour says, 'Verily I say unto you, whoever shall not receive the kingdom of Heaven as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein.' The remarks that follow apply to the picture as it now stands, and not as it was formerly, for I understand that it is materially altered, as to general tone, effect, force, and expression. It was originally painted in a low key, and the drapery of the Saviour, which was then white, formed the principal light. The painter thought the mass heavy and dull, and, giving to the Saviour, the blue and red draperies in which he is generally represented, transferred the principal light to the body of the child, and the white drapery in which he is held. The flesh of the child is painted with the utmost purity of colour, and height of light, and the white of the drapery is unbroken; this pure light, with the bright red drapery of a fanciullo, who holds the child, forms the key of the picture, and the whole is worked up to it. Although this is the principal light, yet the attention is forcibly carried to the Saviour, by his situation in the picture the colours of his drapery, his attitude, his arm raised towards Heaven, the glory that plays around him, and by the shaft of a column that is placed immediately behind him.

This picture may be said to be painted, in what Agostino Caracci called lo stil decoro. Every thing in it is placid and tranquil, except a pharisaical face in shadow, which by its stormy workings, serves to give value to the prevailing calm of the picture. The child is the union of grace, loveliness, and innocence: the character of the head of Saint Peter, who stands nearest to the eye, demands particular notice; the bones of the skull, and the form of the forehead, are marked with truth and precision. But nothing can equal the expression of the Saviour's face; a cloud of soft melancholy spreading over it, shews him the man of sorrow, he who was acquainted with grief, from his youth up; but it is not a selfish sorrow; there is compassion in it; and benevolence, and mercy, and patience, and long-suffering dawn through it.

Those who see this picture will not think it over-rated by me, if I affirm, that for the appropriate fulness of pencil with which it is worked, it may vie with any production of modern art.

The last picture that I shall mention is 'Fitz-gerald rescuing Alexander III, of Scotland from the attack of a stag.' Little as the title promises, this picture is perfectly heroic, as much so as if, for Alexander, we had the body of Patroclus; for the assailing stag, Hector; and for the preserver of the king, Menelaus; as much so as if, for the Scotch footmen and horsemen, we had Greeks and Trojans; and for the river and the castle, Scamander and Troy-town.

Although this painting represent an accident that happened to the Scotch monarch when hunting, though there are men, and horses, and dogs employed in the scene, it bears no more resemblance to the hunts of Rubens, than the Iliad, or any other poem celebrating a particular event, bears to the relation of a common place occurrence. I mean not to draw a comparison, though this picture need not shrink from one. I only speak of the subject. No one, perhaps, but Rubens, could have succeeded in giving motion, character, and energy, to such an unwieldy mass as the Hippopotamus; but still the hunt of that animal is merely a hunt in the general signification of the term; nor can the crocodile, disturbed in the chase, and roused from his lurking place, or the prostrate wretch about to be devoured, though introduced with all the accustomed felicity of Rubens, alter the nature of the subject. His men are neither Egyptians, Asiatics, nor Europeans; indeed, they bear no more of national character about them than do any other of the human beings painted by Rubens. All the skill of that wonderful man, exerted upon a subject of this nature, without reference to a particular action (heroic, as is this represented by Mr. West), would fail to give birth to emotions so powerful, and of so high a class as those he might awaken by employing equal skill upon an heroic subject. Mr. West's picture, then, certainly classes higher than any of the hunts of Rubens.

The national character which is so strongly depicted in the Irishman and in the Scots, is so far from lessening the interest, created by the picture, that it heightens it. Strongly marked as it is, it is so strongly modified as to serve all the purposes of the painter. I cannot, therefore, join the opinion of those who may think that Mr. West would have done well in taking the idea of his Alexander from a bust of his namesake of Macedon; his hero Fitz-gerald from a Disco-bolus; his horses from any exhibited in a Venetian antisala; or his dogs from a bas-relief of Diana hunting.

CRITICISM.

[The following article from a provincial paper is with the fullest approbation republished in the Port Folio. We are always delighted with every species of ridicule employed against that jargon, so unhappily prevalent in this country.]

AMERICANISMS.

In every language irregularities and anomalous expressions are to be found. The caprice and affectation of innovators give birth to spurious terms and phrases, which are readily adopted by the illiterate, and gradually obtain a general currency.

Fond of novelty, and incapable of determining the legitimacy of a word or idiom, the bulk of mankind admit, without examination, the productions of vanity and ignorance to the same privileges and honours as the genuine offspring of erudition.

The fewer irregularities there are, however, in any language, so much the better:—It is so much the more simple, and by consequence the more intelligible: so much the more easily learned by those to whom it is vernacular, and the more easily attained by foreigners.

As the English is the prevailing language in the United States, it certainly behoves the inhabitants to speak it, and especially to write it, with purity; that is, according to the established manner, and approved models of writing and speaking in the country whence it came. That its purity, however, is often violated, is obvious to every one in the least acquainted with the nature and grammar of the language. For instance, the preterite of the neuter verb to lie, is very frequently used for the present of that verb. Do we not often hear such expressions as the following? The paper lays on the desk. The book lays upon the table. The wood is laying in the cellar. The cloth is laying where you left it, &c. And do we not often read in the newspapers, that such a vessel lays at such a wharf? or, that whilst such a vessel was laying too? In these and similar instances, lies and lying, the present of the verb and participle, should have been employed. The verb to lay is active, and therefore inadmissible in such expressions.

LAY,

The adjective BAD

assumes, in the mouth of an American, a much better meaning than is attached to it by an Englishman. The former says, I need a coat very bad, when perhaps there is not a worse in town. But don't mistake him. Far from wanting a bad coat, he intimates by this phraseology that he needs a new one. To express the same idea the Briton would say, I need a coat very much.

A captain informs us, in a late New-York paper, that in a heavy gale he got his canvass exceedingly torn, and that during the rest of his voyage he needed sails very bad. Unluckily for him he got what he wanted, a set of very bad sails, and was therefore some weeks longer in getting to port. Had he said that he wanted sails very much, he had spoken plain English.

The comprehensive term creature is restricted in this country, by a singular fatality, not to an order, or class, or genus of created existences, but to a single species of animals. The horse, and horse alone, is here dignified or degraded, I don't pretend to say which, by the exclusive appropriation of the epithet creature.

The idea that this term belongs to the horse alone, has taken such a hold of some people's minds, that they conclude the bare word horse is not sufficiently definitive without it.

In a late advertisement, the subscriber tells us that 'two horse-creatures were taken up on his plantation,' &c. Apprehensive, no doubt, lest we mistake his horses for cows, he very wisely takes the determining epithet creature to the dubious term horse, and thus prevents all hesitation respecting his meaning.

Some years ago a gentleman who had lately arrived in this country from Scotland was going on a visit to a farmer's. Having occasion to pass through a corn-field hard by the house whither he was going, he observed some geese busily feeding. A considerable time after reaching the farmer's he recollected the innocent plunderers, and told that he had seen a great number of creatures eating the corn as he came along. At the alarming news a regret was hastily expressed that he had not told sooner, out rushed a man, woman, and child to repel the destructive invaders, when lo! the formidable herd of horses which they expected to find, proved to be an insignificant flock of geese. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Basle, October 18, 1800.

MY DEAR SIR,

We have been employed both yesterday and to-day in visiting the public Library, and private cabinets of painting, and natural history. In the last we saw a putrified Elephant's tooth which was found in this Canton. Whether it belonged to one of those which Hannibal lost in his passage over the Alps, or whether it is the evidence of a climate having once been enjoyed by the high country favourable to the existence of that animal, I shall leave to others to determine.

In the library are preserved some paintings by Holbein, which far exceed any of that artist's works that are to be met with in England. His portrait of his friend Erasmus is an admirable picture. We were shewn an edition of that learned man's book in praise of folly, which belonged to Holbein, who had illustrated the subject by numerous drawings on the margin with a pen and common ink. A number of manuscript letters written in Latin by Erasmus to the person who became his heir, are also shewn as curiosities.

As I am on the subject of Holbein, I mention to you that I have seen his celebrated Picture of Death, which he, or, as some suppose, one of his scholars, painted on the wall of a grave-yard. It is rather curious than interesting, or well painted, and the inhabitants talk of pulling down the wall, to make room for some new houses.

The custom of painting historical and other subjects upon the outside of houses prevailed very much at Basle, if I may judge by the number of such decorations now to be seen. The walls of the court of the town-house are covered with these paintings, which are now very shabby from the loss of their colours by time and exposure to the weather.

We saw also among the manuscripts the proceedings of the celebrated council of Basil (the German name for Basle) taken down at the time by a cardinal, one of its members. Pius II, who presided in this council, founded at that time the university of this place. The library contains about fifteen thousand volumes.

The singular custom which has prevailed from time immemorial of all the clocks in Basle being an hour in advance of true time, exists no more. Its origin is not well accounted for, but the inhabitants tell you that some long time ago a conspiracy was formed to betray the town, which being discovered by one of the band, the town clock was set an hour forward, so that when midnight, the hour of attack, came, instead of twelve, the clock struck one, which so confounded the conspirators, that, conceiving their scher discovered, they abandoned it altogether, without daring to assemble. Many attempts were made to correct this ridiculous custom, but the inhabitants would not permit the change till the arrival of the French, who, with the strong hand of power, effected such a revolution in all the clocks of the Baslers, that they now go like those of other people.

Lauffenbourg, October 9.

We left Basle this morning, and crossing the Rhine by the bridge I mentioned, travelled along its banks in one of the heaviest showers I have seen in Europe, we crossed the river again at Rhinefeldt by a covered wooden bridge, and arrived here just before night. The first part of our day's ride lay through what was formerly called the circle of Swabia, and partly through the Black forest, whose pines were rendered infinitely gloomy by the rain, and formed a striking contrast with the foliage of the trees, which, at this season of the year, were of every tint. The valleys and plains were charmingly cultivated, and the verdure was of the freshest kind.

This short ride along the meanders of the Rhine presented to us a number of beautiful scenes. The splendid garb of autumn was everywhere to be seen, and decked every shrub with her fanciful colouring.

Our chamber in the post-house is most uncomfortable, as we can scarcely turn round in it. Instead of a coverlid or blanket, we find on ourselves a species of light downy pillow, or rather bed, which is extremely light and warm, but there is no medium temperature; we must be either chilled without, or thrown into a violent perspiration with it.

Before it grew too dark we walked down to the Rhine to see its falls, or rather rapids; they are, however, of no consequence. They are rendered interesting from a very melancholy accident which befel two young Englishmen, Lord Montague and his travelling companion, who, after examining the current, thought they could shoot it; and, notwithstanding the intreaties of their servant, and the remonstrances of the inhabitants of the town, imprudently ventured to pass in an open boat; they had scarcely got safe over the foam, before they were caught in a vortex which carried them down. They were never seen afterwards, though the place was dragged immediately, and their servant remained three weeks to search for their bodies. The servant who waited on us at supper was an eyewitness of this unhappy occurrence, and gave us the preceding detail.

Schaffhausen, October 10.

A romantic, though well cultivated, country borders the Rhine to this place, which presented, by turns, the grandest as well as the most rural scenes of nature. We came from Lauffenbourg to Waldshut to breakfast. This last is a small walled place, in the circle of Swabia, and is one of the Forest-towns. We saw there some singularly dressed peasants of the Foret moire, whose hats were turned up all round like scalloped shell.

At Waldshut the Rhine is still broad, but its banks very high; a little way above it, on turning suddenly round a point, we found it narrow, and continue so to this place.

We embraced the first moment of sunshine, after our arrival, to ride as far as the famous cataract of the Rhine, about two miles down the river. It is certainly a very grand cascade, but it did not equal my expectations; and, divested of the surrounding scenery, such as the castle of Lauffen, which hangs over it, from the top of a high rock, on one side, and the mills on the other, it would, I think, not be considered superior to the Great falls of the Patowmack. It is, however, a fine object. The river passes Schaffhausen with great rapidity, and of as deep an azure as the ocean; its velocity soon brings it to the precipice of Lauffen, in the midst of which two high pointed rocks seem to threaten obstruction to its passage; this resistance only increases its rage; it dashes against them, and, bursting into a vast cloud of foam, tumbles furiously on every side, and, at last, precipitating itself in numerous white sheets into the pool below, sends up a mist of spray, and a noise of thunder.

Our carriage stopped at a little Village on the top of the right bank, where we got out, and descended by a steep path to the shore of a little bay, formed by the eddy of the stream. We frequently admired the different beauties of the fall, from the various points of view, in one of which we observed that the smallest of the two rocks was absolutely perforated by the constant beating of the waters. A part of the river had been drawn into a mill race, which, after performing its functions, was left to tumble down the rocks, and its humble, yet picturesque cascade formed a curious contrast to the foaming sheets of the grand cataract.

In part we had much pleasure in viewing a different effect, and having wind about, we crossed to the other side, though not without some danger from the up and down motion of the waters, which were in a perfect agitation from the descending force of the falls. The skill of our boatman, however, conducted us safely to the bottom of the rock, on which stands the Castle of Lauffen, (formerly a chateau baillival of the republic), and afterward to a small gallery, which is boldly built just under the cataract, and from which the view of the water, coming as it were from our heads, was very sublime. We were so near that the spray wetted us completely in a few seconds, and compelled us to quit the place.

You have often heard of the bridge of Schaffhausen, celebrated for being supported only by its geometrical construction without piers, in the manner of some of the bridges in Massachusetts and New-Hampshire. The magistrates, however, thought proper to have a pier of stone placed under it; and it has long been a doubt whether it rested on it or not. This celebrated bridge no longer exists, as the French burnt it when they came, to prevent the Austrians from passing the Rhine; it was three hundred and forty-two feet long, and covered, as are all the bridges I have seen in Switzerland, except those at Basle and Lauffenbourg.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAHS.

The republic of Algiers, the republic of America, and the republic of the Seven Isles, so happily established by Buonaparte, that illustrious friend to free Governments, are the most conspicuous Commonwealth, which the politician can now seek for, in a map of the World.

Dr. Johnson remarks, the breakfast is a meal, in which the Scots, whether of the lowlands or the mountains, must be confessed to excel us. The tea, and coffee, are accompanied not only with butter, but with honey, conserves and marmalades. If an epicure could remove by a wish, in quest of sensual gratification, where ever he had supped, he would breakfast in Scotland.

EPITAPH.

Here lies John Sullen, and it is God's will
He that was Sullen shall be Sullen still,
He still is Sullen: if the truth ye seek,
Knock until dooms day, Sullen will not speak.

ON MR. MILES.

This tomb-stone is a milestone—Hal! how so?
Because beneath lies Miles—who's miles below.
A little man he was a dwarf in size,
But now stretch'd out at least Miles long he lies,
His grave, though small, contains a space so wide,
It has miles in length, and miles in breadth beside.

ON MR. THOMAS ALL.

Reader, beneath this marble lies
All that was noble good, and wise;
All that once was form'd on earth,
All that was of mortal birth;
All that liv'd above the ground,
May within this grave be found:
If you have lost or great or small,
Come here and weep, for here lies All.
Then smile at death enjoy your mirth
Since he has took his all from earth.

Here lies John Shore
I say no more
Who was alive
In Sixty-five.

Lines written on a Blank leaf of a History of the French Revolution.

I hate mock Freedom's frantic noise,
Her canting, philanthropic voice,
Those crocodile effusions!
Practis'd upon the Rights of Man,
By every Gallic Charlatan,
With magical delusions.

Amid the necromantic glare,
Deceit conceals a hidden snare,
Envelop'd deep in gloom:
Proscriptions, dungeons, and the cord,
The axe, the dagger, and the sword,
A Royal Martyr's tomb!

Thousands in horrid caverns pine,
Or crush'd in pits their breath resign,
Or sink beneath the wave:
Blown from the cannon thousand fly.
Are these the fruits of Liberty,
Or, deeds that mark the brute?

The following jeu du mot was sent by a young lady to her lover, whose name was Nott, a few weeks before their marriage. The nuptial knot was fastened soon after the discerning lover decyphered its import.

Why urge, dear Sir a bashful maid
To change her single lot?
When well you know, I've often said,
In truth, I love you, Nott.

For all your pain I do, Nott, care,
And trust me, on my life,
Though you had millions, I declare,
I would, Nott, be your wife.

LINES,

On reading a paragraph, stating the marriage of Mr. T. Young, to Miss Ann Beard, both of Islington, near London.

No more let Scandal's busy tongue
Deride the youth of Tommy Young;
For that no longer need be fear'd,
Since Tommy now hath got a Beard.

Tho' rous'd, reluctant, from repose,
Again to combat Freedom's foes—
Still eager to degrade us;
We'll teach the stilted pride of France.
Tho' single handed we advance,
We need no force to aid us.

And should the foe, his fate allow
To touch our coast, with hostile prow,
And waft his minions o'er;
He'll find, to check his vain career,
'Tis hard to gain an acre here,
As erst on Egypt's shore.

THE KISS AND THE BLUSH.

My gentle Grace, I did but seek,
From off that delicate fair cheek,
To steal a kiss: and lo! your face
All o'er with shame and anger glows!
What have I done, my gentle Grace,
But turn'd a lily to a rose?
And well you know, we all declare
That face too delicately fair.

Your cheeks—your forehead too—were flush'd!
Your neck, and e'en your bosom blush'd!
And shame may clime the larger part
In that fair neck, and all above;
But the blush so near the heart,
O let it be a blush of love!
Pygmalion thus lit up with life,
The Statue that became his wife.

THE DRUNKARD BURIED ALIVE.

FROM FONTAINE.

All have their secret faults—not man,
Not woman, are from imperfections freed,
Which neither shame, nor terror, can Eradicate. For proof this story read—

A very toper, who well lov'd his glass,
Was inj'ring fortune, health, and mind;
For drunkards, tho' their parse be full, alas,
Will soon its bottom find!
Once with a jovial set he carried on the game,
Till all his senses were in liquor drown'd;
The friends retired—his wife, a prudent dame,
Stretch'd on the floor his senseless body found,
And caus'd it to be plac'd within a tomb,
Where, in the midst of silent gloom,
The bloated drunkard lay,
Till all the fumes had work'd away.

When waking he observ'd the den of death—
There sees a coffin standing at his feet,
And there a pall and winding-sheet—
He scarce thro' fear could draw his breath!
What's here? he cries, my wife is sure a widow!
This said, his spouse, dress'd out like dame Aleco,
With visage mask'd, and accent feign'd,
Approaches, and presents a soup which well
Might Satan suit. All this enough explain'd
That he was now a citizen of Hell.

What art thou? he to the spectre cries,
The caterer of Satan, she replies:
I am entrusted with Hell's stock of meat,
And to the shades supply the food they eat.
Here he exclaims, before he well had time to think,
Why what the devil, don't they drink?

From the Toy Shop of

MESSRS VERBAL & TROCHEE.

The following lines from the pen of Mr. Sheridan were obligingly handed us by a friend, who had preserved them to the poetical department of a newspaper, of '77 or '78. Our friend was so delighted with it, he said he had imagined it the most finished piece of poetry of the kind he ever read. We think this no vain conceit, but a pretty correct opinion; and considering that in most of the modern songs composed in shapallic measure, we seldom find any thing to admire, we are the more pleased with this exception, which is in the highest degree elegant. The smooth and easy march of the verse, the harmony of the numbers, the sweetness of expression, and the figurative beauties (among which the 'grotto' the 'willow,' &c. must be ranked in the highest class of personified objects,) can be equalled only by the refined sensibility, which reigns through the whole.

We believe our readers would be well satisfied, if we could always present them such rare productions of British genius, instead of our own 'coarse homely manufacture.' But it is necessary for us further to remark, that Mr. Sheridan, the celebrated orator, meeting Miss Linley (afterwards Mrs. Sheridan) in the entrance of a grotto, took the liberty to offer her some advice, with which he apprehended she was displeased. We hope we do not transgress, the laws of delicacy if we ask our readers what they imagine must have been the Lady's feelings, whatever her station in life, when, on entering her grotto, the next day she found this beautiful performance, left her by a man of Mr. Sheridan's just celebrity and elevated standing in society.

Uncouth is this moss-cover'd grotto of stone;
And damp is the shade of this dew-dropping tree;
Yet I this rude grotto with rapture will own,
And willow! thy damps are refreshing to me.

For this is the grotto where Delia reclin'd,
As late I, in secret, her confidence sought;
And this is the tree kept her safe from the wind,
As blushing she heard the grave lesson I taught.

Then tell me, thou grotto of moss-cover'd stone,
And tell me, thou willow, with leaves dripping dew,
Did Delia seem vex'd when Horatio was gone?
And did she confess her resentment to you?

Methinks now each bough, as you're waving it, tries
To whisper a cause for the sorrow I feel;
To hint how she frown'd when I dar'd to advise,
And sigh'd, when she saw that I did it with zeal.

True true, silly leaves so she did I allow?
She frown'd, but no rage in her looks could I see;
She frown'd, but reflection had clouded her brow;
She sigh'd, but, perhaps, 't was in pity to me.

For well did she know that my heart meant no wrong.
It sunk at the thought of but giving her pain;
But trusted its task to a faltering tongue!
Which err'd from the feelings it could not explain,

Yet oh! if indeed I've offended the maid,
If Delia my humble monitions refuse;
Sweet willow, next time she visits thy shade,
Fan gently her bosom, and plead my excuse.

And thou, stony grot, in thy arch may'st preserve
Two lingering drops of the night-fallen dew;
And just let them fall at her feet, and they'll serve,
As tears of my sorrow entrusted to you.

Or least they unheeded should fall at her feet,
Let them fall on her bosom of snow, and I swear
The next time I visit thy moss-cover'd seat,
I'll pay thee each drop with a genuine tear.

So may'st thou, green willow, for ages thus toss
Thy branches so dank o'er the slow-winding stream,

And thou, stony grotto, retain all thy moss,
While yet there's a poet to make thee his theme.

Nav more—may my Delia still give you her charms
Each ev'ning, and sometimes the whole ev'ning long
Then, grotto, be proud to support her white arms
Then, willow, wave all thy green tops to the song.

The federalists have long been accused of a fixed determination to change the constitution; and the democrats have constantly professed a firm attachment to that important charter of our liberties.—But, mark their practice:—The moment they gain a sufficient ascendancy, they are contending with all their might to effect a material alteration in that national compact. We derive, however, some consolation from a writer in the Political Observatory, who has applied to his communication the signature of "A Farmer." This sagacious writer gravely assures us, in his concluding paragraph, that, 'should an alteration be made in one particular, all the rest of the constitution will remain precisely as it was before, unsullied in its excellence and unimpaired in its obligation.' Here is a discovery no less gratifying than it is ingenious. It is like the valuable medicine lately discovered, which, if rightly applied, the inventor assures us, will be the means of snatching thousands of constitutions from the jaws of death.

SECOND THOUGHT BEST.

From the French.

Liris, whom shepherds on the Saine,
Count the first beauty of the plain,
By Damon left forlorn,
Cried—'did he every saint invoke
With vows made only to be broke,
Charms such as mine to scorn?

Since heaven's just anger he defies,
And from my arms perfidious flies,
To court a homelier maid;
Repent he may when 'tis too late,
Revenge shall soothe my hapless fate,
On yonder river laid.'

Quick to the eddy stream she goes,
Upon her cheek pines every rose,
Tears trickle from her eye;
Fix'd on her doom, disdains to shrink,
But, rising o'er the sedgy brink,
Heaves a despairing sigh.

Check'd by the grim approach of Death,
Aghast she stood; then, out of breath,
Ran to her flocks again—
'Good God! she said, was I so mad
To risk the only life I had!—
Lovers enough remain.'

Our Subscribers and Agents are very respectfully apprised, that, henceforth, the price of the Port Folio is fixed at SIX DOLLARS. This augmentation is but an act of justice to the Editor, who, for three years, has published this paper, with an expense so large, and an income so small, that prudence requires a small addition to the premium of labour. The price of workmanship and materials are so high, that the Port Folio cannot be afforded for less than SIX DOLLARS; and the most captious, or most sceptical Subscriber, may, on a fair examination, satisfy himself, that the price of this Miscellany, far from being exorbitantly dear, forms an annual volume, cheaper than any contemporary work of a similar description, published either at home or abroad.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN ELEGY

In memory of the late William Brown, Esq.

'Tis night! the funeral torch obscurely burns,
The bell of death prolongs its solemn sound;
The hollow gale the lingering note returns,
And echoes o'er the plain the groan profound.

Perhaps some hoary saint, the cloisters gloom,
A prey to grief, and unattun'd to earth;
Or heedless youth, unconscious of his doom,
Hath fled to glut the carnival of death.

Alas! more lov'd and wept than these the swain,
His doating parent's hope, and sisters' pride;
The fond companion of the letter'd train,
And ah! more honour'd of a lovely bride.

Such was the man I fondly call my friend,
Rich in esteem, and skill'd in useful lore;
Peaceful his course, domestic bliss his end,
And humbly blest his basket and his store.

Bright was his prospect while the morning ray,
At early dawn, a twinkling lustre gave;
And brighter grew, till orb'd in perfect day,
He dropp'd at life's meridian to the grave.

What then avail the treasures of the mind,
The fancy free, the soul that genius warms,
The soft emotions of a heart refin'd,
And sacred friendship, what thy boasted charms?

Where leads the pomp of princes? where the pow'r

That, with a nod, decrees an empire's doom!
The airy path where pleasure's vot'ries soar?
Illusive all! to darkness and the tomb.

Death, like the prouder tyrants of the world,
To grace a triumph marks no vulgar foes;
In higher spheres his errless darts are hurl'd,
Nor threats the victim ere he gives the blow.

Thy virtues, Brown, too justly plac'd thee there,
But vain the blow, could unaffected worth,
Or the sweet incense of the orphan's tear,
Or widow's pray'r call back the sleeping earth.

Warm was his manly heart, his reason strong,
To force conviction, or bid mercy flow;
The patriot's ardour kindled on his tongue,
And bade the slumbering throng admire and glow.

No venal wishes linger'd round his heart,
Nor burning envy, nor corroding care;
That flame alone that virtue's beams impart,
Like heaven's own fire, burnt unconsuming there.

But why should such a friend attempt his praise,
Or bid the muse his mouldering urn bedew;
Why wakes not *Alfred's lyre to sweeter lays,
For Alfred's lov'd, and science mourns him too.

Yet thou, once happy partner of his joys,
May'st claim the partial tribute of a tear;
And call my feeble thought from idler toys,
To sorrow-soothing strains....and mark them here.

Sweet to thy memory be endearments past,
And ever fresh the bays his virtues won;

* Alfred, the poetical signature of a gentleman, whose habits of intimacy with the deceased, and whose distinguished poetical talents would have eminently qualified him for that task, which the writer has, with diffidence, attempted.

By thee preserv'd from every wasteful blast,
To grace the temples of his infant son.

And ye, sweet tendrils of the broken vine,
No more as erst in fond affection blest;
Your little arms around your sire entwine,
And cling for succour to his yielding breast.

Nor e'er again a faithful father's care
Shall lead your ductile minds to virtue's ways;
Nor guide your steps; nor lure your tender years,
In soothing strains, from error's devious maze.

How oft a guest at social eve I've seen
His little flock their youthful sports forego;
With earnest heed inclin'd and wistful mien,
To catch instruction from some tale of woe.

These scenes are o'er! peace to his gentle shade,
No more let friendship, with unlicens'd eye,
Or unavailing grief, pursue the dead,
They rest in peace—the living claim the sigh.

And oh! fair mourner, may indulgent heav'n,
That ne'er forsakes the widow nor betrays,
Preserve unstain'd thy flock in mercy giv'n,
To bless the noon and ev'ning of thy days.

And when the golden bowl shall burst in twain,
The silver chord's vibrations all be o'er;
Then may thy kindred heart in friendship join,
Where death divides, and pain afflicts no more.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The following verses by the late Daniel Webb, Esq. are highly extolled by the British Critics.]

TO MIRA,

ON HER WEDDING-DAY.

Assume, my verse, thy wonted art,
While all in expectation stand,
Can'st thou not paint the willing heart,
That coyly gives the trembling hand?

Can'st thou not summon from the sky
Soft Venus and her milk-white doves?
Mark—in an easy yoke they fly,
An emblem of unsever'd loves.

Now, Mira, art thou pale with fear;
Look not, thou sweetness, thus forlorn;
She smiles, and now such tints appear,
As steal upon the silver morn.

Quick, Hymen, to the temple lead,
Cupid, thy victory pursue:
In blushes rose the conscious maid,
Trust me, she'll set in blushes too.

Well may the lover fondly gaze
On thy bright cheek, and bloom of youth,
Impatient of the calmer praise
Of sweetness, innocence, and truth.

Yet these shall to thy latest hour,
These only shall secure thy bliss,
When the pale lip hath lost its power,
These shall give nectar to the kiss.

[To the industry of Athenæus we are indebted for a hymn to Health, which Dr. Johnson has lavishly commended in his Rambler. Mr. Webb has translated it as follows.]

First born of heaven! for without thee,
Bless'd Health, the gods themselves would be Oppress'd by immortality.
Come then, thou best of blessings, come,
And make my humble roof thy home;
Propitious come, and shed a ray
Of gladness on my setting day.
For if there be in wealth a charm,
If joys the parents bosom warm,
Whate'er the good, to thee 'tis given
To perfect every boon of heaven.

If diadems the fancy please,
Thy hand must make them sit with ease;
Lost, without thee, were Cupid's wiles,
And Venus owes thee half her smiles.
Whate'er we hope, whate'er endure,
Thou giv'st the enjoyment or the cure;
Where'er thou spreadst thy balmy wing
Ills vanish, blooming pleasures spring.
All wishes meet in thee alone,
For Happiness and Health are one.

[The inefficacy of rural beauty to please during the absence of a mistress, is among the common places of amatory poets. The language of the heart is so universal that the similarity of this sonnet to a passage in Langhorne, will not surprise:

"What are streams or flowers,
Or songs of blithe birds? What the blushing rose,
Young health or music, or the voice of praise,
The smile of vernal suns, the fragrant breath
Of ev'ning gales—when Delia dwells afar?"

SONNET FROM THE PORTUGUESE OF CAMOENS.

Silent and slow now fresh'ning breezes blow,
Where groves of chesnut crown yon shadowy steep,
And all around the tears of ev'ning weep,
For closing day, whose vast orb, westering slow,
Flings o'er th' embattled clouds a mellow glow,
While hum of folded herds and murmur ring deep,
And falling rills such gentle cadence keep,
As e'en might soothe the weary heart of woe.
Yet what to me is eve, what evening airs,
Or falling rills, or ocean's murmur ring sound,
While sad and comfortless I seek in vain
Her, who, in absence, turns my joy to cares,
And, as I cast my listless glances round,
Makes varied scenery but varied pain.

[Moore in his translation of a famous ode of Anacreon has emulated every beauty of the original.]

'Twas night, and many a circling bowl
Had deeply warm'd my swimming soul;
As hush'd in slumber I was laid,
Bright visions over my fancy play'd.
With virgins, blooming as the dawn,
I seem'd to trace the opening lawn;
Light, on tiptoe, bath'd in dew,
We flew and sported as we flew.
Some ruddy striplings, young and sleek,
With blush of Bacchus on their cheek,
Saw me trip the flow'ry wild
With dimpled girls and slyly smil'd;
Smil'd, indeed, with wanton glee,
But, ah! 'twas plain they envied me,
And still I flew—and now I caught
The panting nymphs, and fondly thought
To kiss—when all my dreaming joys,
Dimpled girls and ruddy boys
All were gone! Alas, I said,
Sighing for the illusions fled,
'Sleep, again my joys restore,
Oh, let me dream them o'er and o'er.'

EPIGRAM.

SENTIMENTAL CHARITY.

Such fine spun pain does Want excite,
When beggars near Penurice stray,
From fear of fainting at the sight,
She turns her head another way.
Her generous notions partial call
The hand that grants a penny;
So, as she cannot give to all,
She never gives to any.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 83.

Si vis ut loquar, ipse tace.....MART.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

IN your twenty-sixth number you have published an essay on ingratitude, under the signature of Harley. In this essay one circumstance has been omitted, which, I apprehend, contributes more than any other to check the generous exertions of a grateful mind, and to fix the soul in that torpid insensibility to an act of beneficence which, but too often, falls under every one's observation. The circumstance which I allude to is the pleasure which some people take in boasting of the favours which they have conferred. A person of this disposition cannot hear of the prosperity of his neighbour without informing you of the many and great favours which he himself has conferred upon him. Or, if he should so far restrain himself as not to enter into particulars, you may, at least, expect a hint that he owes much of his advancement in life to the assistance of his friends, and that the time is not far elapsed when he was in a different situation, but some people easily forget their benefactors, or other sly insinuations, the drift of which is obvious to the company. You may recollect a pretty epigram of Martial, which turns upon this thought, and, perhaps, an English imitation of it may afford your readers some entertainment.

Thy generous actions, Posthumus, imprint
On the warm tablet of my faithful breast,
Live, and shall ever live; should'st thou inquire
Why then my tongue ne'er owns the grateful fire?
Know that whene'er I tell thy favours o'er,
I'm answer'd—Oh! we've heard all that before.
Sure in this cause one speaker may suffice,
Be silent, and I'll praise thee to the skies:
But give me leave to whisper in thine ear
A truth thou may'st with much advantage hear,
The babbling giver, emulous of fame,
Destroys the greatest gift, defeats his darling aim.

The propriety of these observations may be placed in a more striking light by exhibiting the character of Ventoso. This man possesses a considerable estate; he is by no means aviricious, but his liberality proceeds rather from vanity and a love of praise, than from that nobleness of soul which seeks no reward but the pleasure of performing a generous action.

There are few of his neighbours whom he has not, at one time or another, obliged by his favours and disgusted by his loquacity, for the one always follows the other as invariably as night succeeds to day. Hence it happens, that, instead of enjoying the fame which he fancies is due to his beneficence, he is constantly surrounded by a crowd of mean sycophants, who soothe his pride in his presence, and laugh at his follies behind his back. Notwithstanding this he believes himself beloved and esteemed by all that know him, and will talk with the greatest self-complacency of the many benefits he has conferred, and the many charities to the promotion of which he has contributed.

It was but the other day that a useful, charitable institution being mentioned in his hearing, aye! says he, that institution cost me two hundred guineas at its first establishment, besides the many different contributions which my reputation has since compelled me to advance. The character of generosity lays a heavy tax upon the purse, too heavy, indeed, for every one's estate to bear. Thus he goes on, exposing his vanity and folly, yet pleasing himself with the idea that he supports the character of a generous man, notwithstanding the heavy tax which it lays upon his purse. He knows not, poor man, that the silence of his hearers is not the silence of attention but of disgust; he knows not that he is rendering himself ridiculous by the very means which he uses to appear amiable.

Those who gape for fame ought to be disappointed, in order to teach them to have a better motive for their conduct; and we generally see the justice of mankind will not suffer any one to praise himself, and, at the same time, to enjoy the praises of others.

I am, &c.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

To the lovers of the belles lettres how peculiarly pleasing is it to peruse the history of the preservation and revival of learning in the latter end of the fifteenth century, under the patronage and by the example of the Medici family; especially of Lorenzo the Magnificent: to whose uncommon assiduity of research, and unquestionable genius and taste we of the later ages have been so much indebted. The amount, however, of our gratitude, and its direction to the proper object, was in a great measure unknown to ourselves until, a few years ago, we were favoured with a "Life of Lorenzo de' Medici, by Wm. Roscoe, Esq." a work, which, as the author of the Pursuits of Literature very justly says, 'places its author in the very first rank of English classical historians.' But Lorenzo not only contributed to the restoration of learning by his patronage of learned men, but by his example also. His learned biographer says, that, as a poet, his claim to high rank is indisputable: comparing his sonnets and other pieces to those of his great predecessors, Dante and Petrarca, he says, 'that though they do not possess the terseness of the former, or the polish and harmony of the latter, yet they have a boldness of colouring superior to either. And his successors, say Ariosto, Tasso, Guarini, &c. by imitating this feature of his writings, and uniting it with the correctness of Petrarca have thereby exhibited in their works the highest degree of perfection Italian poetry has attained. His representation and combination of material and external objects are vivid and distinct; he arranges the affections and passions of the human mind; gives them a visible and substantial form, distinguished by their attributes, their insignia, and their effects.' In the knowledge and use of the prosopopœia Mr. Roscoe thinks the moderns excel the ancients—the attribution of sense, he says, to inert objects is indeed common to both, but that still bolder exertion which embodies abstract existence, and renders it susceptible of oracular representation, is almost exclusively the boast of the moderns.' He then goes on to observe 'that few authors, who preceded Lorenzo de' Medici, have exhibited many striking instances of those embodied pictures of ideal existence, which are so conspicuous in the works of Ariosto, Spenser, Milton, and others, who have formed their taste upon the poets of Italy.

It may not be unpleasant to quote an instance of Lorenzo's use of this figure in representing jealousy, and of the poetry to the Italian scholar.

Solo una vecchia in un oscuro canto,
Pallida, il sol fuggendo si siede,
Tacita sopirando, ed un ammant,
Dun incerto dolor cangiante havea;
Cento occhi ha intesa, e tuttiversan piante
E cent' orecchie la maligna dea;
Opel ch'... e ch'è none trista ode e vede;
Mai dorma ed ostinata a se sol crede.

Sad in a nook obscure, and sighs deep,
A pale and haggard beldam shrinks from view;
Her gloomy vigils there she loves to keep,
Wrapt in a robe of ever-changing hue;
A hundred eyes she has that ceaseless weep,
A hundred ears that pay attention due;
Imagin'd evils aggravate her grief,
Heedless of sleep, and stubborn to relief.

Speaking of the Tuscan lingua contadinesca, or country dialect, Mr. Roscoe says 'it abounds with phrases highly natural and appropriate, though incompatible with the precision of a regular language; and observes that specimens of it were found in the writings of Boccaccio. The idea of adapting this language to poetry first occurred to Lorenzo de' Medici, who, in his verses intitled La Nencia de Barberina, has left a very pleasing specimen of it, full of lively imagery and rustic pleasantry. The following are two stanzas of this piece from the appendix:

Ardo d'amore, e conviemmi cantare,
Per una dama che mi strugge il core,
Ch'ogn' oita ch'io lasento ricodare
El curo mi brilla, e par che glesca fore,
Ella non trovadi bellizza pare
Con gl'occhi getta fiacole d'amore,
Io sono stato in citta e cartaella
El mai non vidi guano tanto bella.
Jo sono stato a enpoli almercato,
A prato, a monticelli, a san casciano,
A coll e, a poggibon, a san donato;
El quin a monte insino a dicomano:
Figline, catelfranco ho ricevare,
San pier, el Borgo, Montagna, e Gagliana,
Piu bel mercato, che nel mon e sia,
E' a Barberin dov e' la Nencia mia.

'That the Romans (adds he) had also a distinction between the written tongue, a dialect of the country inhabitants may be inferred from the following lines of Tibullus, lib. 2. Eleg. 3.

Ipsa Venus lætos jam nunc migravit in agros Verbaque aratoris rustica discit amor.

'Few attempts (says Mr. Roscoe, in a note,) have been made in England to adapt the provincial idiom of the inhabitants to the language of poetry. Neither the Shepherd's Calendar of Spenser, nor the Pastorals of Gay possess that native simplicity, and close adherence to the manners and language of country life, which ought to form the basis of this kind of composition. Whether the dialect of Scotland be more favourable to attempts of this nature, or whether we are to seek for the fact in the character of the people, or the peculiar talents of the writers, certain it is that the idiom of that country has been more successfully employed in poetical composition, than that of any other part of Great Britain, and that this practice may there be traced to a very early period. In later times the beautiful dramatic poem of the Gentle Shepherd has exhibited rusticity without vulgarity, and elegant sentiment without affectation. Like the heroes of Homer, the characters of this piece can engage in the humblest occupations without degradation. If to this production we add the beautiful and interesting poems of the Ayrshire ploughman [BURNS] we may venture to assert, that neither in Italy nor in any other country, has this species of poetry been cultivated with greater success. The Cotter's Saturday Night is, perhaps, unrivalled, in its kind, in any language.'

Notwithstanding the exertions of the Medici family, (say Lorenzo the Magnificent, his grandfather Cosmo, and his son pope Leo X.) to recover the works of the ancients from the mouldering cells of superstition, or from their Gothic possessors, yet still we have to regret the loss of many valuable works of antiquity, not only of the Greek and Latin historians, but of the comedies of the Greeks. The specimens which another elegant classical historian, Richard Cumberland, Esq. has given us from fragments of the ancient, middle, and new comedies, tend to aggravate this regret.

In the fourth century, when religious zeal, as in the days of John Knox, and some other modern reformers, thought it necessary to destroy every thing that appertained to the objects of their persecution: then it was the fathers of the church, in whose hands these authors were, held it a point of conscience to destroy the idols of the stage, as they had already destroyed the idols of the temple, and to bury heathen wit in the same grave with heathen superstition: their poets and their gods were to be exterminated alike.

To the more enlightened taste, or rather perhaps to the lucky partiality of Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople, alone we owe the preservation of Aristophanes; the translation of whose few comedies that remain we cannot but wish, with the author of the Pursuits of Literature, may be undertaken by Mr. Cumberland; from the specimen he has given in his translation of The Clouds, he considers Mr. C. as the best fitted for the task as a Greek scholar and as a poet—

*For Athens Cumberland seems born alone
To make her comic patriot all our own.*

P. of L. Part 4.

Mr. C. in his annals of the Greek dramas regrets much the loss of the works of the authors of the new comedy, as he calls it, beginning with Menander. The comedies of this author, since they were all translated by Terence, and since all the comedies of merit of this age were translated by Terence and Plautus, (for the comic schools at Rome, in their highest glory, seem to be formed upon the new comedy of the Greeks) leaves us some room to hope that they may yet be recovered by the discovery of some new Herculaneum.

Of Menander, whom Plutarch and Quintilian concur in praising so highly, Mr. Cumberland has translated several fragments, one of which, preserved by Plutarch, may be acceptable:

If you, O Trophimus, and you alone
Of all your mother's sons, have nature's charter
For privilege of pleasures uncontroll'd,
And that some god hath ratified the grant,
You then, with cause, may vent your loud reproach,
For he hath broke the charter and betray'd you:
But if you live and breathe the common air,
On the same terms as we do, then I tell you
And tell it in the tragic poet's words,*
Of your philosophy you make no use
If you give place to accidental evils,
The sum of which philosophy is this—
You are a man, and, therefore, fortune's sport,
This hour exalted, and the next alas'd:
You are a man, and though by nature weak,
By nature arrogant—climbing to heights
That mark your reach, and crash you in the fall;
Nor was the blessing you have lost the best
Of all life's blessings; nor is your misfortune
The worst of its afflictions; therefore, Trophimus,
Make it not such by over-strain'd complaints,
But to your disappointment suit your sorrow.

Fragment from Philemon, the rival of Menander.

If what we have we use not, and still covet
What we have not, we are calld by fortune
Of present bliss,—of future—by ourselves.

[To the judicious lover of that elegant simplicity, which never wearies in the works of Xenophon, Julius Cæsar, Phædrus, Addison, Parnell, and Prior, every effusion from the pen of GOLDSMITH is eminently agreeable. The following original paper has never appeared in any edition of his 'Essays,' but the critical reader will instantly perceive that it is genuine, and will cherish the fugitive as the legitimate offspring of GENIUS and GOLDSMITH.]

Of all men, who form gay illusions of distant happiness, perhaps a poet is the most sanguine. Such is the ardour of his hopes that they often are equal to actual enjoyment; and he feels more in expectation than actual fruition. I have often regarded a character of this kind with some degree of envy. A man possessed of such warm imagination, commands all nature, and arrogates possessions of which the owner has a blunter relish. While life continues, the alluring prospect lies before him; he travels in the pursuit with confidence, and resigns it only with his last breath.

It is this happy confidence which gives life its true relish, and keeps up our spirits amid every distress and disappointment. How much less would be done, if a man knew how little he can do! How wretched a creature would he be, if he saw the end as well as the beginning of his projects! He would have nothing left but to sit down in torpid despair, and exchange employment for actual calamity.

I was led into this train of thinking, upon lately visiting the beautiful gardens of the late Mr. Shenstone, who was himself a poet, and possessed of that warm imagination, which made him ever foremost in the pursuit of flying happiness. Could he have but foreseen the end of all his schemes, for whom he was improving, and what changes his designs were to undergo, he would have scarcely amused his innocent life with what, for several years, employed him in a most harmless manner, and abridged his scanty fortune. As the progress of this improvement is a true picture of sublunary vicissitude, I could not help calling up my imagination, which, while I walked pensively along, suggested the following reverie.

As I was turning my back upon a beautiful piece of water, enlivened with cascades and rock work, and entering a dark walk by which ran a prattling brook, the genius of the place appeared before me, but more resembling the god of Time, than him more peculiarly appointed to the care of gardens. Instead of shears, he bore a scythe, and he appeared rather with the implements of husbandry, than those of a modern gardener. Having remembered this place in its pristine beauty, I could not help condoling with him on its present ruinous situation. I spoke to him of the many alterations which had been made, and all for the worse; of the many shades which had been taken away, of the bowers that were destroyed by neglect, and the hedge rows that were spoiled by clipping. The Genius, with a sigh, received my condolence, and assured me he was equally a martyr to ignorance and taste, to refinement and rusticity. Seeing me desirous of knowing farther, he went on:

'You see, in the place before you, the paternal inheritance of a poet; and to a man, content with little, fully sufficient for his subsistence, but a strong imagination, and a long acquaintance with the rich are dangerous foes to contentment. Our poet, instead of sitting down to enjoy life, resolved to prepare for its future enjoyment; and set about converting a place of profit into a scene of pleasure. This he at first supposed could be accomplished at a small expense; and he was willing for a while to stint his income, to have an opportunity of displaying his taste. The improvement in this manner went forward; one beauty attained led him to wish for some other; but he still hoped that every commendation would be the last. It was now, therefore, found that the improvement exceeded the subsidy, that the place was grown too large, and too fine for the inhabitant. But that pride which was once exhibited could not retire, the garden was made for the owner, and though it was become unfit for him, he could not willingly resign it to another. Thus the first idea of its beauties contributing to the happiness of his life was found unfaithful; so that instead of looking within for satisfaction, he began to think of having recourse to the praises of those, who came to visit his improvement.

In consequence of this hope, which now took possession of his mind, the gardens were opened to the visits of every stranger; and the country flocked round to walk, to criticise, to admire, and to do mischief. He soon found that the admirers of his taste left by no means such strong marks of their applause, as the envious did of their malignity. All the windows of his temples, and the walls of his retreats were impressed with the characters of profaneness, ignorance, and obscenity. His hedges were broken, his statues and urns defaced, and his lawns worn bare. It was now, therefore, to shut up the gardens once more, and to deprive the public of that happiness, which had before ceased to be his own.

In this situation the poet continued for a time in the character of a jealous lover, fond of the beauty he keeps, but unable to supply the extravagance of every demand. The garden, by this time, was completely grown and finished; the marks of art were covered up by the luxuriance of nature; the winding walks were grown dark; the brook assumed a natural sylvage; and the rocks were covered with moss. Nothing now remained but to enjoy the beauties of the place, when the poor poet died, and his garden was obliged to be sold for the benefit of those who had contributed to its embellishment.

The beauties of the place had now for some time been celebrated as well in prose as in verse; and all men of taste wished for so envied a spot, where every urn was marked with the poet's pencil, and every walk awakened genius and meditation. The first purchaser was one Mr. Truepenny, a button maker, who was possessed of three thousand pounds, and was willing also to be possessed of taste and genius.

As the poet's ideas were for the natural wildness of the landscape, the buttonmaker's were for the more regular production of art. He conceived, perhaps, that as it is a beauty in a button to be of a regular pattern, so the same regularity ought to obtain in a landscape. Be this as it will, he employed the sheers to some purpose; he clipped up the hedges, cut down the gloomy walks, made vistas upon the stables and hogsties, and showed his friends that a man of taste should always be doing.

The next candidate for taste and genius was a captain of a ship, who bought the garden because the former possessor could find nothing more to mend, but unfortunately he had taste too. His great passion lay in building, in making Chinese temples, and cage work summer-houses. As the place before had an appearance of retirement and insipid meditation, he gave it a more peopled air; every turning presented a cottage, or ice house, or a temple. The improvement was converted into a little city, and it only wanted inhabitants to give it the appearance of a village in the East Indies.

In this manner, in less than ten years, the improvement has gone through the hands of as many proprietors, who were all willing to have taste, and to show their taste too. As the place had received its best finishing from the hand of the first possessor, so every innovator only lent a hand to do mischief. Those parts which were ~~formerly have been only~~ formerly have been only walks which led naturally, have been twisted into serpentine windings. The colour of the flowers of the field is not more various than the variety of tastes that have been employed here, and all in direct contradiction to the original aim of the first improver. Could the original possessor but revive, with what a sorrowful head would he look upon his favourite spot again! He would scarcely recollect a dryad or a woodnymph of his former acquaintance, and might, perhaps, find himself as much a stranger in his own plantation as in the deserts of Siberia.

Respected Fellow-Citizen,

It is an abundant matter of advantage, pleasantness and gratification to me that you enable and allow me to discharge the duty which, in common with every republican, I owe to my fellow-citizens of the United States, to aid them, looking around for light and help, on that interesting and important inquiry which you are about to institute in that solemn and immortal work you have undertaken, thought, and determined upon. From that work republicanism cherishes a hope that it shall be placed on a prosperous basis, and will acquire that stability consistency, and splendor, which will long adorn, forever adorn, your envied name in America. That I am selected as an humble tool by you in this task, is a thing of which I am justly proud. It is singularly pleasant to me to have an opportunity to represent the causes and the reasons which have enabled that horrible monster a hierarchy, the most deformed, as it is the most bloody of the English constitution, to organise sedition, and to anathematise, by vulgar rashness, and sacerdotal prejudice, the unexamined and untried measures of government, rudely, suddenly, prematurely and wickedly. My bowels yearn, my heart bleeds, my stomach sickens, while I recur to all the miseries which these wolves in sheeps' clothing daily have, are and will inflict upon my native land, country and state. I have but one request to make, in respect to the sentiments I am now about to display and unfurl; and this is that you would consider them only as a general recognition of principles, and depository of facts, of which you are to make use for the sole purpose of giving excitement to the friends and success to the projects of republicanism, but that you would, by no means, make public the name, or alphabetical signs, by which I am known, designated, and marked. I possess, I trust, a dignified, a proud, integrity, an invincible attachment to truth, a soul exalted by a habit of candour, inquiry and fairness, a mind independent and composed, with innate propensities to war against injurious prejudices, error and baseness, sufficient for stemming the torrent of party and outrage, yet I would willingly, except in cases directly connected with elections, expose myself to the shafts of calumny and detraction, which the priesthood in New-England would pour upon me from their strong holds. Should I be known as the author of this stricture or scrap, I should expect nothing better than to be torn piecemeal in a thousand ecclesiastical invectives, to be hurled headlong from their desks like a birch canoe down the cataracts of Niagara, or vomited forth from the craters of their pulpits, like a red hot stone from the mouths of Vesuvius, Stromboli, or Etna. Relying, therefore, upon your honour and attachment, I proceed boldly to develop the effects of a priesthood, publicly patronized, and the causes which conspire to make the clergy foes, enemies, and opponents to democratic republicanism, or, as it may be, perhaps, better expressed, republican democracy.

Any man who will turn his attention upon human nature and look through the fog or false medium through which objects are made to impress the eyes of men, will find three great principles constantly operative, and dragging after them the thoughts, acts or words of individuals. These are avarice, or love of money, goods, chattels, bills, or credits; pride, or anxiety for distinction, place, or pre-eminence; ambition, or desire of power, influence, or popularity. All men are, more or less, infected with these, according to their circumstances, situations, habits, sentiments, feelings, hopes, fears, wants, possessions, and inclinations. These dispositions exist, in nature, in the relations and fitness of things, in the aptitude and tendency of principles, to reasons, aims and ends, and the clergy, partaking of the frailties consequent upon the fall of Adam, are not less hurried along by these furious guides into the miry ditch. By attending to these principles you will easily understand why they are such prostituted and noxious creatures why, as I have fully hinted in my 'Farmer,' and more particularly expressed myself, they are such 'fomenters of feuds, sharpening their tongues with more cruelty than the dagger of the assassin, why they have stabbed characters in the dark, and, like common scolds, called their opponents by hard names;* why they are propagators of sedition, slanders, libels, and modern federalisms;† why they are guilty of such 'adverse combinations, oppugnations, disrespect, reproach, and systematic revilings, in essence and nature, sedition, treason, and rebellion.†

And, in the first place, you, an enlightened free, and happy democrat of the ancient dominion, will scarce be able to credit, or conceive the extravagant oppression and misery, to which the avarice of this body of men has reduced and sunk our poor priest-ridden people; who lie prostrate under the payment of the rents, tithes, taxes, and assessments, which, by law, they impose and levy for their support. Thus, for instance, there is scarcely a clergyman, in the wide extent of N. England, who does not receive the scandalous, enormous, and oppressive salary of one hundred pounds lawful money, Massachusetts's currency; that is to say, three hundred and thirty-three dollars, thirty-three cents, money of the United States; or, to express it more intelligibly to you, in the coin, or circulating medium, of your own native state, equal to seven hogsheds of the best James River Tobacco. A salary, which many poor and pining democrats would rejoice to possess, and the attainment of which would put joy between the teeth of very many mouths of labour. In addition to this, the wretched parishioners are, not unfrequently, obliged to drag to the parson's house, twenty cords of wood annually, all cut out of the parish lot, or paid for out of the parish chest. To complete this disgraceful narration, they take, in right of their office, most commonly, possession of a parsonage house, whereto is annexed tillage land, enough for a kitchen garden, and pasturage, sufficient to support a horse, and a cow, and a cosset sheep. The laws of the country also give them perfect security and protection in all these rich revenues, rights, immunities and possessions. To this, however, the wise, happy, virtuous, and highly republican state of Rhode-Island forms an honourable exception. There it has been judicially and most justly determined, that a clergyman cannot maintain an action for his salary. But in Massachusetts, to its disgrace, it is otherwise, as is aforesaid. There not only they can recover their professional dues, but what is more they are relieved from all taxes. Such are the scandalous sacrifices, by which the people of this my native commonwealth pamper the avarice of this body of men. The consequences are such as might naturally be expected. By their wealth, riches and extravagant rents and incomes they are enabled to influence elections, to bribe and corrupt the people, and to mislead them from the true highway of democracy. For, out of these rich revenues, they have scarcely ever more than a wife and seven children, although I have known some have ten, to support. So that the surplus is ample, as you cannot but see, to produce all those nefarious, wicked, and mischievous effects, combinations, and oppugnations, herein hinted at, and, in my Farmer, exhibited, and, at large, insisted upon.

* Farmer, No. 2:

† Ib. No. 10.

But the avarice of this body of men is not more insatiable, than their pride is exorbitant. This they exhibit by the pomp and splendor of their dress and demeanour. All of them keep a horse and most, a second a chaise, in which they have been known, in the wantonness of sacerdotal competency and presumption to ride over—pigs, which, in the confidence of innocence and simplicity, were reposing in their paths; thereby indicating, by a malignant innuendo, or figurative procedure, their enmity to democracy, in their treatment of an inoffensive animal; long represented, by wicked and malicious foes, as its type, symbol, or representative. On the first day of every week, they dress themselves in black silk, or superfine broad-cloth, having two peices of choice cambric, suspended under their chins; they lean upon velvet, and hold in their right hand a book, ornamented with black morocco and sometimes with gold leaf. With such anti-republican dress and demeanour do they dazzle the people and astound and make them stare at the gorgeous trappings of a New-England hierarchy.

But more terrible and destructive, than either the pride or the avarice of the clergy, is their ambition, or their love of popularity, power, weight and influence. To gratify this, their ruling passion, their means are not less nefarious, than their ends are criminal. Instead of exhibiting that universal philanthropy, which, embracing all mankind, in the arms of benevolence, has not time, room, or opportunity to relieve the individuals of which the species is composed, these men circumscribe all their offices of love and affection to the sphere of their own parish, and so insinuate themselves into the hearts of their parishioners. Thus, for instance, they no sooner hear of a sick one, than they visit him; they no sooner know of an unfortunate one, than they hasten to him; and there, under pretence of affording consolation or advice, they never fail in the weak, and distressed moments of the human heart, to insinuate their pernicious maxims and strengthen their dangerous influence. With the same view, they call together, once or twice, every month, all the children to what is called 'a catechising.' Here they take occasion to instil into their young and tender minds, those habits, manners, and principles, which render the people of New-England, so generally, wretched, poor, and depraved, and the absence of which, renders so elevated and pure, the democrats of the ancient dominion. The effects of this influence are nowhere more conspicuous, than in the manners and conduct of the children of these States; who scarcely ever suffer an aged person to pass, in the streets of our country villages, without making a curtesy, or a bow; both sure marks of slavish minds and a servile education, and nowhere to be seen, except in countries, where the spirits of both parents and children are broken, and their necks galled, by the yoke of an imperious hierarchy. To the same pernicious influence may be attributed the utter neglect and idiotic contempt, in which almost all our young men hold horse-racing, cock-fighting, billiard-playing and those other, like, republican sports, the pride of the youth of your happy land. Instead of these many exercises, they are shut up from their childhood in a narrow room, and subjected to the anti-republican domination of a master. The constitution of these schools is, alas! an unlimited monarchy. Instead of a republican representation of the boys, whereby the feelings and the local interests and rights of each individual can alone be considered, through the medium of a single assembly, all power is deposited in the hands of a despot, who restrains their natural liberty, or punishes the exercise of their unalienable rights, by those ancient instruments of despotism, the rod and the ferula. These and a thousand other, like, infringements and oppugnations of democratic principles may be traced to the fear and vile bondage, oppression and slavery, in which all classes are holden in New-England by this domineering order.

But I will not keep open wounds, which bleed so plentifully any longer, and which bleed the more for not having bled sooner. From what I have written you will easily collect the reasons and causes, why the clergy are such dangerous enemies to the peace, prosperity, power and pre-eminence of genuine democracy, and why they must be vanquished, trodden down, dissipated, destroyed and frowned upon, if we ever hope that investigation, government, philosophy, morals, and the ever watchful principle of a public and individual interest, assuming their native energies, will repair the losses sustained, and progress to the triumphs of grandeur and of sovereignty in their struggles for freedom and for placing sound democratic principles, in the Eastern States, on a firm basis.

With homage and respect

I am &c.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF RICHARD JAGO.

[This elegant, and feeling writer, deserves all the candid criticism of his Biographer. We have read his longest Poem with peculiar pleasure. It is entitled 'Edge-Hill,' deriving its name from the boundary line between the counties of Oxford and Warwick, and memorable, as the scene of the first engagement, between loyalty, and rebellion, in the reign of Charles I. The Author's opinion of that malignant mob of fanatics and rebels, who, in their mad paroxysm of democracy, spilt the blood of their Sovereign; defaced the noblest institutions; oppressed the best men; exalted the worst; made hypocrisy a trade, religion a drab, liberty a jest, and totally annulled the public peace and private happiness of a whole country, is clearly expressed, in these lines.

..... Here, thy subjects first, IMPERIAL CHARLES,
Dart'd in these fields, with arms, their cause to plead.
Where once the Romans pitch'd their hostile tents,
Other Campanias fair, and milder Alps
Exploring, now a nobler warrior stood,
His country's Sovereign liege! Around his camp
A gallant train of loftiest rank attend,
By loyalty and love of regal sway
To mighty deeds impell'd. Meanwhile below
Others no less intrepid courage boast,
From source as fair, the love of Liberty!
Dear Liberty! when rightly understood,
Prime social bliss! Oh! may no fraud
Usurp thy name, to veil the dark designs
Of vile ambition, or licentious rage.]

But the popular part of Mr. Jago's reputation will rest upon those little Poems, dear to humanity, which have been devoted to the best purpose of rescuing the inferior orders of animated nature, from the capricious cruelty of man. His 'Elegies' are most amiable in their sentiment, and most elegant in their expression, and will probably save the life, and vindicate the freedom of many a feathered songster.]

Richard Jago was born October 1. 1715. His family was of Cornish extraction; but his father, the Rev. Richard Jago, was Rector of Beauchert, near Henley in Arden, in Warwickshire. He married Margaret, the daughter of William Parker, Gent. of Henley, 1711, by whom he had several children. The poet was his third son.

He received a good classical education under the Rev. Mr. Crumpton, an excellent country school-master at Solihull, near Birmingham in Warwickshire; where he formed an acquaintance with several gentlemen who were his school-fellows; among others with Shenstone. A similarity of taste and of pursuits soon brought on an intimacy between these two poets, which continued without abatement till the death of Shenstone.

'From the acquaintance,' says Mr. Graves, in his 'Recollection of some particulars in the Life of Shenstone,' 'which I had with Mr. Jago, and some others who were bred under Mr. Crumpton, he seems to have given his pupils a more early taste for the English classics, than was commonly done in grammar schools at that time.'

About 1732, he was removed from the school of Solihull, and entered as a servitor, of University College, Oxford; where he was privately visited by his school-fellow Shenstone, then a commoner of Pembroke College, who introduced him to the acquaintance of his fellow collegians, Anthony Whistler, Esq. of Whitchurch, Oxfordshire, author of the 'Shuttle-cock,' and several original poems in 'Dodsley's Collection,' Mr. Robert Binnel, author of some learned notes in Grainger's 'Tibullus,' and Mr. Richard Graves, the present rector of Claverton in Somersetshire, author of 'The Spiritual Quixote,' 'Euphrosyne,' 'Columella,' 'Peter of Pontefract,' and other ingenious performances.

On the humiliating situation in which he was placed at University College, his friend Mr. Graves makes the following liberal and indignant reflections, in his 'Recollection, &c.'

'Mr. Shenstone had one ingenious and much valued friend in Oxford, Mr. Jago, his school-fellow, whom he could only visit in private, as he wore a servitor's gown; it being then deemed a great disparagement for a commoner to appear in public with one in that situation; which, by the way, would make one wish with Dr. Johnson, that there were no young people admitted in that servile state in a place of liberal education.

'Servitors, or Sizars as they are called in Cambridge, were probably appointed when colleges were first established, and when there was a scarcity of fit persons to supply the learned professions, that a greater number might have the advantage of literary instruction, by the poorer waiting on the more affluent students.

'But what good end can it answer in those times, when every genteel profession is overstocked, to rob our agriculture or our manufactures of so many useful hands, by encouraging every substantial farmer or mechanical tradesman, to breed his son to the church?

'If now and then a very uncommon genius in those walks of life discovers itself, there are seldom wanting gentlemen in the neighbourhood, who are proud of calling forth, and if necessary, of supporting, by a subscription, such extraordinary talents.

'Mr. Jago, however, who was the son of a clergyman in Warwickshire, with a large family, and who could not otherwise have given his son a liberal education, may be thought an instance in favour of this institution.

'But I make no doubt, that a respectable clergyman, as Mr. Jago's father was, might, by a very slight application to the head, or fellows of almost any college, have procured some scholarship or exhibition, for a youth of genius, and properly qualified; which, with a very small additional expense, might have supported him in the university, without placing him in so humiliating a situation, which in some future period of his life (when, perhaps, his parts might have raised him to some eminence in the world), might put it in the power of any purse-proud fellow collegian, to boast that he had waited on him in the college; though, perhaps, all the obligation he had lain under to such a patron, was the receiving sixpence a week, not as an act of generosity, but as a tribute imposed upon him by the standing rules of the society.'

He took his degree of Master of Arts, July 9. 1738, having taken orders the year before, and served the curacy of Snitterfield, near Stratford upon Avon.

In 1744, he married Dorothea Susanna Fancourt, a daughter of the Rev. Mr. Fancourt, of Kilmcote in Leicestershire.

For several years after his marriage, he resided at Harbury; to which living he was instituted in 1746. At a small distance lay Chesterton, given him about the same time by Lord Willoughby de Broke; the two together amounting to about 100*l.* a year.

Before his removal from Harbury, he had the misfortune to lose his amiable companion, who died in 1751, leaving him a numerous family of small children, and from such a loss the most inconsolable widower.

In 1754, Lord Clare, afterwards Earl Nugent, who had a great regard for him, by his interest with Dr. Madox, Bishop of Worcester, procured him the Vicarage of Snitterfield, where he had formerly been curate, worth about 140*l.* a year; whither he removed, and where he resided the remainder of his life.

In 1759, he married a second wife, Margaret, the daughter of James Underwood, Esq. of Budgely in Staffordshire.

While he was engaged in the duties of his profession as a country clergyman, which he performed with exemplary diligence, he found leisure to indulge his early propensity to the study of poetry; and carried on a constant correspondence with his friend Shenstone, on the subject of their literary studies and poetical compositions.

It appears from Shenstone's 'Letters,' published in 1769, that he communicated from time to time to Mr. Jago and Mr. Graves, the detail of his improvements at the Leasowes, an account of the visits he received from people of rank, and the ordinary occurrences of his life. His eleventh 'Elegy' is addressed to Jago. He appears also to have lived in intimacy with Somerville, Mr. Hylton, Lady Luxborough, and other friends of Shenstone.

In 1742, his Elegy on the Blackbirds was published by Dr. Hawkesworth in the 'Adventurer,' and attributed to West. It was afterwards inserted in 'Dodsley's Collection,' with his name.

When it first appeared with his name in Dodsley's Collection, a manager of the Bath theatre boasted in the circle of his acquaintance, that he was the author of it, and that Jago was a fictitious name which he had adopted from the celebrated tragedy of 'Othello.'

It is remarkable, that Dr. Johnson, in his 'Life of West,' leaves this affair still dubious; when it is demonstrable, from the very letters of Shenstone to which he refers, that Jago was the real author.

The case seems to have been thus: As Shenstone was fond of communicating any poetical productions of his friends, which he thought would do them credit, he probably gave a copy of Jago's elegy to the Lyttleton family at Hagley, where West frequently visited. And as West thought it worthy to appear in the 'Adventurer,' he might send it to Dr. Hawkesworth without mentioning Jago's name which was then very little known in the world. So that Dr. Hawkesworth might well imagine that West himself was the author of it, as Dr. Johnson has hinted.

However this may be, there is a living evidence, Mr. Hylton, the editor of his poems, who is able and ready to support indisputably, Jago's claim to this beautiful elegy, as well as to the others of the Swallows and Goldfinches.

In 1767, he published his Edge-Hill or the rural prospect delineated and moralized, a poem, in four books, 4*to*, which completely established his poetical reputation.

In 1768 he published his Labour and Genius, or the Mill-Stream and the Cascade, a Fable, written in the year 1762, and inscribed to the late William Shenstone, Esq. 4*to*. It consists chiefly of encomiums on the genius and taste of Shenstone.

In 1771, he was presented by Lord Willoughby de Broke, to the living of Kilmcote, before mentioned, with near 300*l.* a year, and resigned the vicarage of Harbury.

During the latter part of this life, as the infirmities of age came upon him, he seldom went far from home. He amused himself at his leisure, in improving his vicarage-house, and ornamenting his grounds, which were agreeably situated, and had many natural beauties.

After a short illness, he died on the 8th of May 1781, in the 66th year of his age; and was buried according to his desire, in a vault which he had made for his family in the church at Snitterfield.

He had children only by his first wife; three sons, who died before him, and four daughters, three of whom were living in 1784.

His poem of Edge-Hill, Labour and Genius, Elegies, &c. were reprinted, as they were corrected, improved, and enlarged by him, a short time before his death, with Adam, or the Fatal Disobedience, an Oratorio, compiled from the Paradise Lost of Milton, and adapted to music; and some additional pieces, never before printed, in one volume 8*vo*. under the title of poems, Moral and Descriptive, by the late Richard Jago, M. A. with a preface, containing an account of his life and character, by his friend Mr. Hylton, which has been chiefly followed in this account. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1784, for the first time received into a collection of classical English poetry. The Oratorio is omitted in this edition; because it is merely a compilation from the 'Paradise Lost,' in the language of Milton, adapted to representation. An Oratorio, on a similar plan, intitled, 'Paradise Lost,' was presented to the world, by the amiable and ingenious naturalist and poet Mr. Stillingfleet, in 1760.

The character of Jago appears to have been truly amiable and respectable. To his learning, taste, and good sense, Shenstone, Graves, &c. bear ample testimony. His moral and intellectual character has been so accurately delineated by the friendly pencil of Mr. Hylton, as to render the after-strokes of a casual hand unnecessary.

'Mr. Jago in his person,' says Mr. Hylton, who knew him well, 'was about the middle stature. In his manner, like most people of sensibility, he appeared reserved amongst strangers; amongst his friends he was free and easy, and his conversation sprightly and entertaining. In domestic life, he was the affectionate husband, the tender parent, the kind master, the hospitable neighbour, and sincere friend, and both by his doctrine and example, a faithful and worthy minister of the parish over which he presided.'

'To do justice to Mr. Jago's character as a poet, would require the pen of a more able writer. It may safely be asserted, however, on the authority of the public approbation which they have already met with, that the pieces on which we rest his poetical fame, viz. his poem of Edge-Hill, his fable of Labour and Genius, and his Elegies on the Blackbirds, &c. are all excellent in their kind.'

'The poem of Edge-Hill, though the subject is local and chiefly descriptive, yet he has contrived to make it generally interesting, by his historical narrations and digressive episodes; and by his philosophical disquisitions or moral reflections; particularly the philosophical account of the Origin of Mountains, which is equally curious and poetical. His description of the Earl of Leicester's Entertainment of Queen

Elizabeth, at Kenelworth Castle, which is truly characteristic of that pedantic age; as the moral reflections on the ruins and departed grandeur of that superb structure, is in the best manner of Young, in his 'Night Thoughts.' The story of the youth restored to sight, from the 'Tatler,' is told with so many natural and affecting circumstances, as makes Mr. Jago's poetical much superior to Sir Richard Steele's prose narration. The historical account of the important battle of Kington or Edge-Hill, contains some curious facts not generally known, as well as very suitable reflections, religious and moral, on the fatal effects of civil discord.

'The fable of Labour and Genius, the subject of which was suggested by Mr. Shenstone, is told with some humour, and great clearness and precision, with a very useful moral forcibly inculcated.

'In the beautiful elegy on the Blackbirds, as well as in the others of the Swallows and Goldfinches, Mr. Jago's original genius appears, and as Thomson says, he has

..... touch'd a theme

Unknown to fame, the passion of the groves.

'Among the additional pieces, which now make their first appearance, the Roundelay for the Stratford Jubilee, in particular, is beautifully expressive and characteristic of Shakspeare's versatile genius and multifarious excellence.'

These observations might be still augmented, by a more minute examination and development of the beauties in his Edge-Hill and Elegies, which, if he had written nothing else, are sufficient to entitle him to a classical distinction among the poets of our country.

As a descriptive poet, he evinces a picturesque imagination, a correct judgment, and a delicate taste, refined by a careful perusal of the ancient classics. His Edge-Hill ranks with the 'Cooper's Hill' of Denham, the 'Grongar Hill' of Dyer, and similar compositions of other writers, who have proved their powers in loco-descriptive poetry. It is written in blank verse, and exhibits a specimen of great strength and harmony in that metre. The diction is elegant and poetical. He discovers no want of ease or fancy; and shows a goodness of disposition in every part of his work.

'The title is Edge-Hill,' he informs us, in his introduction, 'a place taken notice of by all the topographical writers who have had occasion to mention it; for its extensive and agreeable prospect, and farther, unhappily distinguished by being the scene of the first battle between the forces of King Charles and those of the Parliament, under the command of the Earl of Essex, in the year 1642. These two circumstances of natural beauty and historical importance, coinciding with the affection of the writer for his native country, lying at the foot of this celebrated mountain, presented to his mind a theme for poetical imagery too pleasing to be resisted by him. His business, therefore, was first to select a stock of materials fit for his purpose, and then to arrange them in the best manner he could. Both these points he endeavoured to effect, not only by consulting his eye, but also by considering the character, natural history, and other circumstances of such places as were most likely to afford matter for ornament or instruction of this kind; forming from the whole, by an imaginary line, a number of distant scenes, placed in the most advantageous light, and corresponding with the different times of the day, each exhibiting an entire picture, and containing its due proportion of objects and colouring.'

'In the execution of this design, he endeavoured to make it as extensively interesting as he could, by the frequent introduction of general sentiments, and moral reflections; and to enliven the descriptive part by digressions and episodes belonging to, or deducible from the subject; divesting himself as much as possible of all partiality in matters of a public concernment; in private ones, following with more freedom, the sentiments and dictates of his own mind.'

That poetry which is employed in rural description, lies under many disadvantages. Though there is a variety, there is likewise an uniformity in the works of nature, which renders it difficult to embellish such subjects that have not been exhibited by former writers. Hence it arises, that he who has perused one descriptive poem of this kind, is often struck with a seeming repetition of ideas; and more sensibly so, where the places described have no previous seat in his own imagination. The poet who describes, or the reader who peruses descriptions of scenes familiar to him, will easily find the distinct images awakened by general terms; but he who is to impress a local picture in his fancy, merely from the combination of words, will find little novelty in these reiterated descriptions of country prospects. The poem of Edge-Hill is local; and though it is embellished with strong painting, apt allusions, historical incidents, and moral reflections yet its descriptions are not always adapted exclusively to the place it professes to celebrate. Like the descriptions of Thomson, they do not always apply to any particular spot, or raise any ideas of locality, but more frequently please, by exhibiting the general views and effects of nature. The different times of the day, Morning, Noon, Afternoon, and Night, produce an agreeable diversity of description. Pathetic reflections, and moral instructions, are often happily introduced, in places where one expects only painting and amusement. Through the whole poem, the description of places, and images raised by the poet, are still tending to some hint, or leading to some reflection upon moral life or political institution, that have a relation to the object. But the moralizing of his rural paintings, is sometimes attended with quaintness, and a forced manner. Nor is it difficult to investigate the causes. All moral truths are of an abstracted nature; and when we attempt to illustrate them by objects of the senses, the transition from the natural simplicity of the latter, to the refinement of the former, is incompatible with that ease which we expect to find in poetical descriptions, and interrupts that attention which we are always inclined to afford. The digressions and episodes arise naturally from the subject, and enliven the description; but the episode of the blind youth in the third book, is perhaps too long. Where episodes are introduced, in works of this kind, they should be related in no very tedious or circumstantial manner; because we are not willing to be long detained from the principal subject. The famous story of the Lady Godiva of Coventry, will be read with pleasure. The rules he lays down for the situation and construction of a rural seat, are worthy of the genius and taste of Shenstone. They show him to have been a man of true taste and good observation.

Of his Elegies on the Blackbirds, Goldfinches, and Swallows, the extensive popularity is the best eulogium. They are characterized by an amiable humanity, and tender simplicity of thought and expression, which justly entitle him to the exclusive distinction of the 'poet of the birds.' They have received the highest applause from Dr. Aikin, in his ingenious and entertaining 'Essay on the application of Natural History to poetry.' Grame, Mr. Pratt, and other poets, have successfully employed similar circumstances of fictitious distress in their compositions; but the praise of invention, and the palm of merit, in this species of elegy, belong to Jago.

Respecting his fable of Labour and Genius, the present writer is happy to coincide with the judgment of Mr. Hylton.

His Eclogues and smaller pieces, have considerable merit; but they require no distinct examination, or particular criticism.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

SIR, Amsterdam, October 4, 1780.

I have just received your favour of the third, and thank you for the early information of the arrival of the courier from the plenipotentiaries of this republic at Petersburg. I hope that this republic will agree, without delay, to the armed neutrality: but I should be glad to see a copy of the dispatches if possible, or at least as exact an account of their substance as may be. I should be glad also to learn whether the object of the congress is simply to form a plan for supporting each other, and making a common cause in defence of those principles only which the three northern powers have already adopted, or whether they have in contemplation a more extensive regulation of maritime affairs.

I do not see how this congress can have a peace between the belligerent powers, for its object when the parties who compose it have so positively declared for a neutrality. I wish, with all my heart, that another republic had a minister at the congress, or at least at the court of Petersburg. Neither the cause nor the country of America are understood in any part of Europe, which gives opportunity to the English to represent things as they choose—one sha e sempre la causa di colui che parla soli.

I do not expect peace so soon as next spring, and I should read the interposition of congress at Petersburg in the business. They understand not the subject, it is impossible they should. America is not represented there, and cannot be heard; if they should take into consideration the affair of peace, I should be apprehensive of some recommendations to save the pride, or what they would call the dignity of England, which would be more dangerous and pernicious to America, than a continuance of the war. I do not dread a continuance of war. I should dread a truce ten times more.

If all the powers at the congress at Petersburg would agree together to acknowledge American independency, or agree to open a free commerce with America, and admit her merchant ships and vessels of war into their ports, like those of the other belligerent powers; this I think would be just. Indeed I think that perfect neutrality which they profess requires it. Refusing admittance to the American flag, while they admit that of England, is so far from a neutrality, that it is taking a decided part in favour of England, and against one of the belligerent powers, a power too which in point of numbers, wealth, industry, capacity, military and naval power, as well as commerce is quite as respectable as several of those which are or will be represented in the congress at Petersburg. I have the honour to be, with great esteem, sir, your humble servant,

JOHN ADAMS.

I am very sorry I did not give Mr. Guild a letter to you. He is an American of Maryland, a gentleman of letters, taste, and sense.

SIR, Amsterdam, October 9, 1780.

I should think your safest way would be to inclose your letters to M. de Neufville, who will convey it to his son in London, under cover to some safe hand, known only to him and his son. I am, with great esteem, yours,
M. Dumas. JOHN ADAMS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Zurich, October 12, 1800.

MY DEAR SIR,

I have lately been complaining of rain and mist, the greatest enemies I can have in this picturesque country, but fortunately yesterday morning when I arose I beheld the sky perfectly serene, and hurrying our voiturier, (for there is no such thing as posthorses to be had in Switzerland), to get his animals harnessed to our carriage, we quitted Schaffhausen just as the sun began to illumine the tops of the neighbouring mountains.

The time we took to climb up the long hill which rises on the right bank of the river, with the exorbitant bill of an avaricious landlord, put us a little out of humour, but as soon as we gained the summit we were gladdened by a sight so glorious, that our ill humour was dissipated in an instant, and our hearts swelled with delight at the sublime view which burst, like enchantment, upon our astonished eyes.

On our left, far below us, the Rhine made the desperate leaps I described in my last letter, and the spray, gilded by the mild beams of a morning sun, was scattered in profusion on every thing near it; the vallies and plains, on all sides, were rich in chequered fields and clumps of trees, among which we seen here and there the white Swiss cottages. The hill sides were covered with vines, just receiving the yellow tint of autumn, and a few scattering black pines seemed to contrast with their gay appearance. Such a landscape you will allow to be beautiful, and I assure you the description is not exaggerated. What then must it be when I tell you that the whole boundary of the eastern and southern prospect was the immense chain of Alps, whose summits were glittering with their eternal snows, just receiving the first beams of the sun, far above the clouds. I shall certainly never forget the impressions made upon me by this splendid sight; my sensations were indescribable. This was the first view I had of the glaciers, and it undoubtedly was the noblest that ever presented itself to my eyes, accustomed even as they were to the grand elevations of the vaunted mountains of Scotland and Wales.

As the sun got higher, their high-pointed Alps presented a variety of beautiful reflections. One side offered a stream of radiant white, while the opposite one melted into the purple tint of ether, so as scarcely to be distinguished from the sky or the light shadows of the clouds behind.

The three leagues we travelled to breakfast at Egglisaw were passed almost without obstruction; so charmed were we with the novelty of the objects we beheld. The situation of this little town is extremely romantic, and in any other country than Switzerland would attract attention. We bade farewell here to the Rhine, which we passed by a good bridge (being the tenth time of our crossing it) and ordering our servant to follow with the carriage, set out on foot for Zurich, about fifteen miles distant.

Our road carried us over hill and dale, and through some noble forests, which, since the revolution, have been the scenes of much violence and robbery, instances of which were rare before that event. The grand objects in our view beguiled the time so that when we arrived at the brow of a hill we saw, with surprise, before us the white houses of Zurich and its pretty lake. Our carriage overtook us in the streets, and we repaired to an inn, pleasantly situated on the banks of the Limat, just where it issues from the lake.

Among the letters we had for Zurich, was one for the celebrated Lavater, to whom we sent it with a request for permission to pay our respects to him. He appointed this morning to receive us. We found him in his bed-chamber, to which he has been confined for this year past, owing to the unfortunate event which you have heard of. He related to us the whole affair. He was taking his usual walk on the ramparts of the town, about the time the French arrived. A Swiss soldier, who appeared intoxicated, made up to him, and demanded money; Lavater gave him a crown; the man clapped him upon the shoulder, and appeared very friendly. Immediately on Lavater turning to walk away, the wretch raised his musket, and made a thrust at him with his bayonet, which he received in his breast, a gentleman passing by at the moment, ran up and clasped him in his arms to screen him from another attack; at this instant the soldier drew the trigger, and the ball passed through the arm and body of the venerable Lavater. He says he thought it a fit of frenzy in the man, for till then he appeared the mildest creature imaginable. Since that day, Lavater has been confined to his bed, and has wasted daily. Scarcely an hour passes without his suffering the most painful sensations from his wound; which, he says, resembles exactly those he felt when he was shot, this renders his life irksome to a degree. I saw him repeatedly in very great agony for a few moments, after which he resumed his mild complacent air, and conversed with great calmness upon his situation. He observed that he knew his end was approaching,* and that it would be folly to deny himself that knowledge, but in the meanwhile he was determined to enjoy life while he had it.

In his intervals from pain, he amuses himself by writing, and he says his mental faculties are not in the least impaired. He was gay when we saw him, and talked pleasantly on different subjects. He is now principally employed in writing souvenirs, or little sentences, to be given to his friends to remember him by after his death. He has promised us one, and made us write our names in a book which he keeps to record his acquaintances.

Lavater is a very mild and amiable character, universally beloved in Zurich, and whose loss will be sincerely regretted. The parish of which he is pastor, he says, has made him several handsome presents, and kept him alive, for as he has no property, he must have starved, had not his friends sent him and his daughter, who lives with him, occasional necessities. He is a violent enemy to the Swiss revolution, and hates the French as the cause of it. Whenever he spoke to us of the miseries of the small cantons, he became quite enraged, and said 'their treatment called aloud to heaven for vengeance.' The bold manner with which he always delivered his sentiments, occasioned his being deported. Since his return, however, he has acquired the confidence, the respect, and the esteem of every one by the purity of his life and the virtue of his principles. Never did I behold so perfect a christian, so resigned a man; he enjoys in an eminent degree the triumph of the mind over the body, and looks on death with as steadfast and as indifferent an eye, as if it were only the change from one temporal situation to another.

Lavater, though not an artist, is a connoisseur and man of taste. In his cabinet we met with several good pictures, and were gratified with a sight of the original designs for his celebrated work on Physiognomy. He has lately published a curious picture to exemplify the resemblance which exists between animals and human beings. He takes the head of a frog, and, by gradual changes, which are imperceptible between any

LEVITY.

Mr. Wolff has just published in London 'sketches and observations taken on a tour through a part of the South of Europe.'

We think, say the London Reviewers, Mr. Wolff has been fortunate in his following whimsical description of a scene in the coffee room of Les quatre nations at Marseilles, which we transcribe as a specimen of the entertainment the reader may expect from a perusal of the whole performance.

Strolling into the coffee room of les quatre nations at Marseilles one day at the hour of dinner, I could not avoid remarking the manners of different people, and the effect of various languages, on the ear of a stranger. Several persons were assembled, either at dinner, reading the papers, taking ices, or ordering whatever suited their palate. A little full dressed, hungry meagre Frenchman, losso avec des jambes longues et un nez croché, with his napkin tuck'd under his chin and devouring a sallad with impatient gestures was, at every mouthful, vociferating Garçon, Garçon—The latter arriving out of breath with big drops of symptomatic heat on his brows 'Quid d'iable, garçon est ce donc comme, ça qu'on fait des attentions ici? Il y a plus d'un quart d'heure que j'ai appelé, et personne ne vient! appelez vous cela être bien servi? Qu'avez vous donc pour dîner? Donnez moi la carte sur le champ'—Eh bien, monsieur, la voilà—Ah! voyons un peu—Taking a magnifying eye-glass out of his pocket, which, by the reflexion of the candles, seemed to set the bill of fare on fire.

A blustering German baron, six feet high, surrounded by dishes, none of which seemed to please or satisfy him was muttering to himself Was Teufel donner wetter! hat er mir gegeben, dis kan ich bey meiner seele nicht essen. What the devil, thunder and lightning, has he given? By my soul this is not eatable—Garçon! fien ici tonc—Eh bien! me voila monsieur, que vous plait il?—Ke tiabile Kes que ça qu'on m'apport? Me prend on per en plete sauvage Ke je pis manger ceci ou cela in ci, Ke tous vos otes tiabiles se plats, he?—Mais, monsieur, said the waiter with a humble and submissive tone of voice je vous assure que tout est bon dans notre maison, et—Et quoi tonc, monsieur Hanswurst! foila des raisonnements toujours, tes a domestiques quant on temande kek chose c'est les Carcons de nous faire les tisputes, tes Kerelles donner blicksum allez foo au tiabile, et dit a ton maitre quil fient ici—Tiabile! der verfluchte Kert meint dass man hier mit allez zufrieden seyn mus—The cursed rascal conceives that one must be satisfied with every thing here—At this moment, an English naval officer entered the room, who, going to a table, was recognized by an old acquaintance, his countryman 'ah, George, my worthy, who the Devil would have thought of seeing you in France? How are you? Why, Bedford, damme where do you come from,' replied the other. I though you were safely lodged in old England among the loungers in Bond-Street.—'No, I'm on my travels with my tutor—are you? Well I'm d—d glad to see you, by G— Let's sit down and crack a bottle of 'Burgundy together. Here you waiter, garçon, scaramouch, what's your name, lay the cloth and bring a bill of fare dy'e hear?'—Monsieur said the waiter staring, 'me no understand English'—you don't, hey.—'Why then damme, tell your master to send a fellow that does—Another waiter arriving, 'Here, you son of a land lubber, bring in something decent, to eat. None of your black broths, cursed fricassee of frogs, or half starved rabbits ragoued up into a kickshaw; some Beef, damme, plain wash is good enough for me, by —.' 'Oui, monsieur vous aurez le ros bif toul de suite.'

This interesting conversation, and a volley of expletives was checked by a large New-Found-land dog, who, in following the officer up the room, had stopped on the way, tempted by the sight, and smell of a delicate gigot de mouton, which was visible from the corner of a table occupied by a spruce abbe, and Italian opera-Dancer bien poudré, and dressed for the ballet of the evening, who were warmly disputing whether a gigot de mouton fait a la merveille avec sauce piquante, was, or was not preferable to maccaroni a la parmesan. In the heat of the controversy, the gigot was nearly edged off the table, by the arm of the impetuous abbe; when impatient Caesar, thinking a donation was intended for him, snapped at the knuckle of the gigot, and, with an irresistible pull, brought down dish, mutton, haricot, cloth and plates, on the extended leg of signor scamperino, and ran growling, with the gigot in his mouth, under his master's chair. Up started the abbe, in a rage vociferating—Oh! morbleu! sacristie, quel voleur! Oh! mon gigot! voila un infame chien—je voudrais qu'il l'etrangle. villain! Ah il mio gambi, cried the Italian, rubbing his leg, 'e rotta e non pin ballare—cospetto di Baccho! corpo di Christo! meleditto sia il dog Inglese che ho fatto! Ah! me! son disfortunato e rovinato! Ah! my leg it is broken, and I shall no longer be able to dance—O Bacchus, body of Christ! curses alight on the English dog who did the deed—Oh Lord, I'm undone, I'm ruined! These exclamations, the clattering of the broken dishes and the coolness of the dog gnawing the gigot under the table, attracting the attention of the company, created a general laugh at the distress of the Signor and his friend, the passionate abbe, the latter crying out furiously pour son chapeau, ses gands sa canne, le compte, tout e tant en desordre, ou perdu, in the confusion of a crowded room, where la jolie maitresse at the bar was too deeply engaged in receiving the milles attentions of her admirers, and delivering out bons, bons from a boudoir ome, to attend to any mishap at a distance; her surrounding gallants pressing her to give them ices a la creme, a la pistache, des marons glacés, des verres de limonade, d'orgeat, des bavaroises, une tasse de coffe, des liqueurs de cannelle, anis, girofle noyau de la martinique, de clede amphion, des isles and a thousand other et cetera with which her joli cabinet was replenished. This agreeable confusion of tongues and discordant sounds continued till a boy entered the room, and distributed les petits affiches, announcing the play of the evening, wherein la charmante Porteuille was the chief performer, a piece which had had a run of several nights, but of which tout le monde was still anxious to be spectators. This broke up the sittings, the amateurs quitted their seats with alacrity, the dillatante hopped off in graceful attitudes, and the cognoscenti after taking their pousse caffè, with a grave and dignified air, marched au spectacle.

REFLECTIONS IN SOLITUDE.

Ye, who have pass'd the period of youth,
When young Romance, the child of Fancy, led
Your idle footsteps in pursuit of Love
O'er fields in May, with fresh-blown roses smiling;
Or to the grassy margin of the stream,
Where the young waters, eddying round the trunks
Of fallen oaks, make melancholy music;
Ye, who have sought the wanton child in shades,
And built in solitude, with Fancy's fingers,
The cottage for your fair one, while around
The breeze made sweeter, rustling through the grove;
And vernal flowrets bloom'd with brighter hues,
Tell me the hour extremest bliss was yours?
Or, if inclin'd to list a lover's tale,
My artless numbers, in seclusion flowing,
May touch a chord that winds around your hearts,
May chase Oblivion from her drowsy watch,
And wake Remembrance into life again.
Then shall ye say, if ever love was yours,
That he, the simple sea-boy, needs a storm
To make his home seem pleasant; that the rose
Borrows fresh beauties from the rains of Spring;
Then shall ye say, Love loses half his charms
If short-liv'd quarrels be unknown to Love.
Hard by a village, yet unsung by all,
Save him who first felt transport in its shades,
I found my Mary, dress'd by Nature's hand;
The rose-bud bloom'd upon her youthful cheeks,
Her blue eye sparkled, as the brilliant gem
Which, yet unseen by Av'rice, lies neglected
By Peru's streams, shining thro' morning dews,
Her dark hair floated on her polish'd neck,
Fair in themselves, yet hiding fairer charms—
She was the idol of the villagers!
When from the field the star-light guided them,
Each to his home, they minded not to leave
The nearest path, to call at Mary's door—
With sweet civility, that loves to dwell
In hearts untainted by a tainted world,
Each offered to my girl his rustic boon,
And sought no recompense but Mary's smile!
Yet they were not in love with Mary's charms,
For, when their lips had uttered her dear name,
Those lips would never tremble, and they gaz'd
Upon her eyes, heedless who saw them gaze—
And, when her smiles proclaim'd good-humour's reign
Within her bosom, I have seen them press
Her willing hand, heedless who saw them press—
Ye youthful lovers! say, could this be love?
I knew that Mary lov'd them not, and yet
I could not but be jealous, if she smil'd
On aught but me, and when the flow'rs they brought
Had wither'd I have seen her throw them by;
Still while those flow'rs were fresh they were not sweet
To me. I wish'd that ev'ry tongue should sing
The charms of Mary, yet their honest praise
Has tortur'd me, and made me yield one morn
So far to doubts, which Love is wont to raise,
That, heedless of the bliss I hazarded,
I call'd her false, capricious, e'en striving
To lure the simple rustics to her chains!
She smil'd to see me jealous, but it was
The smile of conscious innocence. She answered not,
But, turning from my tears, she sought the house,
And left me firm in pride's delusive strength.
Such moments oft the ardent lover knows,
They mock the poet's pencil; else, inspired—
It was a summer morn, and on I roved
O'er many a field. I strove to banish far

The image of my Mary from my heart—
Rambling, I combated with Love and Pride.
And while the latter, frowning, urg'd me on
To seek amid the world a prompt relief
For every wound the archer's shafts had caus'd,
I heard the whispers of deceitful Love
Steal on my ears, and felt his galling chains
Twine tighter round me at each step I urg'd
From Mary. I had wandered far from home.
The forests shades accorded with my mood,
And rushing in, a prey to keenest pangs,
I threw my weary limbs upon the grass.
A thousand feelings warr'd within my breast,
And restless, as I roll'd from side to side,
Now curs'd my girl;—now, softly sigh'd her name.
The busy bee humm'd by me, and my eye,
Marking his flight, trac'd him from flow'r to flow'r,
And as he rested on a rose his wings,
I thought on Mary; and I sigh'd in pain,
'How near the honey is the hidden sting!'
The robin's whistle, that, at early morn,
My ears have eagerly drank in, and which,
When Mary smil'd, was sweetest music to me,
Had lost its pleasant measures—lost its sweetness—
I could not bear this warfare in my soul,
But, starting upwards, press'd with hasty steps
To cast my bursting heart at Mary's feet,
And gaze again; tho' I should gaze on frowns!
Where an old oak upon the meadow's bank
O'erhangs its foliage, while its unclad roots
Sip the fresh waters as they murmur by,
I saw her seated; but I saw her there
Unconscious she had stray'd so near my haunt—
What should I do, ye lovers? Where was pride?
Where the firm purpose of a lover's heart?
Could I but sue forgiveness at her feet?
Should I have turn'd my trembling steps to slight
The bliss which Love had thrown upon my path?
Ye, who have felt the rapture of such hours,
Attend the question,—yet remember well
That when she smil'd, I look'd for naught but frowns.

SELECTED POETRY.

[If Horace inclined most to the system of Epicurus, yet he seems to have adopted in their rational and true sense of the doctrines of that engaging moralist, to have considered the inordinate pleasures of sense as destructive of their own object, and to have set a just value on the enjoyments arising from virtue, and the happiness of self approbation. In his loftier odes he in general adopts the sentiments of the stoics; for he knew and felt, that, although pleasure might be a proper subject for a Bacchanalian or amorous song, industry and toil, temperance and fortitude were the only sources of Roman greatness, and the only pledges of its stability. But his rules also for private conduct, his remarks on private life, are, except where the subject is professedly festive, as just in the sentiment as they are elegant in the expression, so that he is properly said by Dacier to be a poet in his philosophy, and a philosopher in his poetry. The subsequent interesting ode, addressed to a rural nymph, recommending plain and simple sacrifices, with purity of heart, is a proof that our gay poet can sometimes be grave. The original is recommended as an exquisite model of sweet Latinity.]

HOR. ODE XXIII.

Translated by W. Boscawen, Esq.

Now, Phidyle, at Luna's birth,
Now lift thy hands to heaven's abodes;
Let incense, freshest fruits of earth,
And swine, appease thy household gods.

So shall no south wind blast thy vines,
Thy corn destructive mildew spare,
So, as the sickly year declines,
Thy young shall 'scape the autumnal air.

Let the devoted herds, that feed
In Algidus, o'erspread with oak,
Or whom the Albanian pastures breed,
Fall by the sacred pontiff's stroke.

But thou with slaughter's crimson stains
Court not within these soft retreats
Thy humble gods; but crown their fanes
With rosemary and myrtle's sweets.

If guiltless hands approach the shrine,
No sumptuous victims can procure
More favour from the powers divine,
Than humble pious gifts ensure.

[In a late Port Folio, we published a version of the following ode of Horace by Mr. Hunt. The following is by another hand, and translated with great spirit.]

Come, friend, with me to Gades' distant shore,
Where fierce Cantabrians spurn the Roman chain;
That barbarous clime, where storms unceasing roar,
And boiling quicksands choak the struggling main.

Where Tyber's walls confess an Argive hand,
Act I the scene of life's concluding stage!
There find these limbs, long toss'd by sea and land,
A bed of comfort for reposing age.

If fate unkind deny this blissful seat,
Thy stream, Galesus, and the rural reign
Of Sparta's sons receive my pilgrim feet!
Where flocks unnumber'd whiten all the plain

Delicious fountains, and enchanting fields!
Oh! may that spot of all the earth be mine!
Not purer honey e'en Hymettus yields,
Not e'en Venafrian olives rival thine.

The zephyrs there of quick returning springs,
Thy rigour, short-liv'd winter, melts away;
There grapes that Aulon from his full lap flings,
Like thine, Falern, matures a warmer ray.

Each grace that Nature's gaudiest garb can lend
To soothe the soul, invites our footsteps there:
There pay the last sad office to thy friend,
There on his glowing ashes drop a tear.

EPIGRAM.

As Jack and Bob together sat,
One night indulging sober chat,
The world, cries Jack, is grown so bad
It makes a thinking person sad.
There's not upon this earthly sphere
One lover true, or friend sincere,
All, all from virtue's maxims stray,
And vice has universal sway.

Hold, hold, says Bob, you run too fast,
Some few you must except at last,
Or, granting what you say be true,
Virtue a stranger is to you.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

I HAVE been referred, by a curious friend, to a paragraph in a village paper, that bears the form of an advertisement, but which is worthy the perusal of other eyes than those of debtors and customers, to whom it imports to be more particularly addressed. I think it should be rescued from the obscurity of an ordinary gazette, to be honoured with a more extensive circulation than has yet been its fate. I admire the concise brevity of its style, and the simplicity and candour of its author, and, under these impressions, I have copied it for the literary patrons of the Port Folio:—

CATHARINE KEISS,

Residing in the corner-house, North Queen-street, informs herewith, that she is married to Frederic Reinert; and that, in addition to her former assortment of store-goods, she has for sale, Groceries, at the most reduced prices: also, Musical Instruments, Notes, Fiddlestrings, &c.

She likewise requests, for the last time, those who are indebted to the estate of Andrew Keiss, deceased, to discharge their respective debts without delay, otherwise she will be under the necessity of resorting to other measures.

January 31, 1804.

The first idea which its perusal presents to the mind is the variety of purposes which it serves. In the short compass of a dozen lines it announces a death; proclaims a marriage; serves as an advertisement of goods on hand, and tells us that wedlock has excited the idea of harmony in the author's mind by enabling her to deal in musical instruments, notes, and fiddlestrings. It informs the world that Catharine Keiss is executrix of one husband, and wife of another, and concludes with pleasant intelligence to the neighbouring lawyers. The sign over Caleb Quotem's door does not announce a greater variety of business.

The next idea which strikes the reader's mind, is the dignified pride, and laudable self-importance of the writer in preserving the name of her former husband—'Catharine Keiss informs herewith that she is married to Frederic Reinert,' she thought herself sufficiently condescending in taking him, but resolves not to take his name, that the public may know that wedlock, with her, was but a secondary consideration, and possibly Frederic Reinert may not be a loser in allowing her to retain her name, for the lucrative considerations of a wife; an executorship; a stock of goods on hand; and musical instruments, notes, and fiddlestrings; together with the privilege of being plaintiff in a multitude of actions. We hope he will be grateful, and afford her no just occasion to substitute the shrill screams of her own pipe for the harmony of her fiddlestrings, and that it may be long before she surprises him by changing her notes.

The third idea which strikes the reader is, that she not only preserves her former name, but also her importance. Catharine of Russia had not more authority over her numerous husbands, than our Catharine appears to have over Frederic Reinert. Although, as she informs herewith, she is married, she is yet determined that she shall not have all the privileges of a husband. For she still has for sale groceries at the most reduced prices; also, musical instruments, notes, and fiddlestrings. She calls on her debtors for payment, otherwise she will be under the necessity of resorting to other measures. Her groceries are sold at the most reduced prices, but as no price is affixed to the musical instruments, notes, and fiddlestrings, we may presume that HARMONY is purchased at her house at the common price, although we hope that Frederic Reinert will not be obliged to pay more for it than others.

A fourth idea which is presented to the mind by this laconic note, may recal to our recollection the epistle of a French lady, which was couched nearly in the following terms:

"My dearest Annette,

Sympathise with your wretched Josephine at the death of her Beaumont, who died about an hour since, and has left me overwhelmed with grief and despair.

Ever yours,

JOSEPHINE."

"P. S. Apropos! send me some rouge."

A cynical writer has remarked that a woman's postscript always contains the material part of her letter, but if this observation be generally correct, yet the postscript of our lady is assuredly an exception, for she certainly was more in want of a husband, than of rouge, unless, indeed, grief, in the short period of an hour, had robbed her cheeks of all their colour, which most probably was not the case, and then, indeed,

'One need not sure be ugly, tho' one grieves.'

Frederic Reinert must certainly be happy in the possession of a wife, who will give him no trouble in the management of her affairs, and we should advise him to act cautiously, as more disagreeable sounds are sometimes heard in a house than any which can be produced by musical instruments, notes, and fiddlestrings.

A REVIEW, POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

NO. 6.

Memorabilia democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science. Interspersed with anecdotes, characters and speeches of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats, by Slaveslap Kiddnap, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651

Washington, printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheatham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

In order to gratify the public, which seems to entertain a just relish for the writings of Mr. Kiddnap, I shall indulge, for the present, more in extract, and less in remarks, than I at first had intended. The following is taken from that chapter which is intitled 'A comparison of the fates and characters of ancient and modern democrats.'

"One can scarcely open any page of history without finding occasion to lament the fates of democratic leaders. A few of them, it is true, have received a recompense for their talents in the gratitude of the multitude, or in the riches or dignities they have attained, but by far the greater number have either lived, condemned by the very populace they have attempted to excite to liberty; or perished, miserably, by sword or pistol, halter or poison. In the circumstances of their death, however, the leaders of the democratic parties do not differ, materially, from those of the aristocratic. It being the common fate of great men to be cut off ignominiously in free states, in their turns, according as one or another faction predominates. But in this aristocratic have always had the advantage of democratic chieftains, that, whilst the former have been immortalized in song or in history, the latter have been either wholly neglected, or held up to contempt or detestation; having their names used as stalking horses by malignant wits, to terrify or amuse the populace. The reason of this procedure, which wants correction, seems to be this, that literary men are, for the most part, needy, and thus dependant on the aristocracy, or else they are anxious for what they call honourable fame, and to be esteemed, as their cant is, of the few. Whence it happens, that, as soon as the democratic influence is extinct, as it usually is, after a short, but splendid, day, all these literary men set themselves about gratifying the aristocracy; and by the means of their histories, poems and annals, load the leaders of democracy with all the odious and abominable epithets they can imagine; thereby transmitting them to posterity as enemies of good order, as ambitious, avaricious, or licentious persons, fit objects of abhorrence and execration. Taking into consideration these misfortunes, so long the bane of the democratic interest, I have lately presented a memorial to Mr. Jefferson, proposing that now, while he is in power, he should new officer to be appointed, to be called Historiographer to the President; whose duty it shall be to preserve an imperishable memorial on white satin, (which, of all democratic materials, is found most likely to get down to posterity) of the life, principles, and manners of the executive, as also of all those heads of department and great men of his party, with whose fame the reputation of democracy is, in this country, chiefly connected. In an especial manner, I proposed, it should be his duty to watch over the joints of the harness, and to strengthen all those weak points of character and conduct at which the aristocracy seem, with most prospect of success, to level their deadly shafts. In this memorial I took also the liberty to suggest the particulars which ought, in my opinion, first, to occupy the attention of the historiographer. Thus, for instance, I thought, he should be required to set about an early disquisition on the chastity of the president. That in this he should do away those odious and abominable stories of black Sall and Mrs. Walker; either expressly, by proving an alibi, or else, in Mr. Jefferson's own manner, by bringing all the females of his family, his cook, his waiting and chambermaid, his milliner and laundress, to give their depositions as to the consummate coolness of his constitution, often tried and always impregnable. Here I stated it would cast a lustre upon the fortitude of this hero, if the deponents would enter a little minutely into details, and give to the public the circumstances of the attack; under what colours he resisted; and particularly whether, at the time of the assault, he was panoplied in his black breeches or his red. The next object to which the historiographer should direct his labours as I suggested in my memorial, is to rescue the literary fame of our president from the dangers which threaten it. Here all the allegations made against him, as a writer, such as egotism, vanity, flimsiness, weakness, falsehood, a love of the wonderful, and of low popularity, should be explained, justified, or refuted. The courage of Mr. Jefferson might also be a subject of special inquiry and illustration. It might easily be shown, that, when he fled to the mountain, he walked backwards, with his face to the enemy; and that his retreat was, on a small scale, not a whit inferior to that celebrated one of Moreau, or of Xenophon and his ten thousand.

But the more fully to repel that scandalous insinuation, touching the derangement of his animal economy on that occasion, it is certainly worthy of the majority of our present congress to appoint a committee of their own body, de braccis inspiciendis, with full powers to send for person, paper, and wardrobe. To the end that the matter may not be kept covered any longer, but that Dr. Mitchell may have an opportunity, with the aid of his chemical tests, to examine the contents, and ascertain whether there be any thing more than the ordinary residuum, after a complete process of digestion, or whether there be, as has been asserted, a supersaturation of noxious effluvia, the effects of fear upon the viscera. An investigation which Dr. M. is, I know, very anxious to make and which is also altogether worthy of his genius. The historiographer might afterwards take in hand the head of department. He might represent Mr. Gallatin, as he is, modest, unassuming, content with his condition, and raised to eminence by merit only. He might also repel that other odious calumny, which alleges he is a foreigner, in thirds, Swiss, Genevan, and French, whereas it can be proved, by good living witnesses, faithful democrats, that he is a native American, born and bred; who has never been out of the country, but is as true a citizen, and speaks as good English as the best of us. In other respects the task of our historiographer would be easy. He would be required only to supply general Dearborn with a portion of intellect, and general Varnum with a quantum sufficit of information. General Jackson might need an apology for his want of religion, as Dr. Mitchell might for his failure on the score of modesty. Perhaps it might be a difficult task to paint Matthew Lion as a gentleman, or to prove Mr. Dawson's manhood, or Mr. Randolph's puberty; yet even here it would be better to have an authorized officer, whose duty it shall be to varnish over defects, than to leave the whole democratic constitution exposed to the effects of those political changes, which, sooner or later, have never failed to prove fatal to it.

"I mention this subject of an historiographer incidentally only; believing it to be the only certain remedy for the evils to which I allude. It being my principal design in this chapter to enforce and explain this observation of mine, that it has been the fate of almost all democratic chieftains to receive cruel treatment from men, calling themselves historians, annalists and the like. The truth of which is made very obvious, by every page of those writings ancient and modern, which treat of the struggles, which take place about the time of popular commotion. I shall illustrate my idea, by a recurrence to the history of a very eminent democrat of antiquity, who has suffered the unjust treatment, before mentioned, and has become undeservedly odious in the opinion, even of men, who, were he now living would, not only be his associates, but willingly, give him their support, as a candidate, for the Vice-Presidency, at least. The person, to whom I refer, is Lucius Cataline. By means of one Sallust, a notorious aristocrat of antiquity, who, in addition to his connection with the wealthy patricians, was a man of the most dangerous talents, he has been delivered down to posterity as a most desperate villain, whereas it is very apparent from even his enemy's own statements, that Cataline was a most worthy and true republican, well versed in the principles of civil liberty and an able and resolute, but, Alas! an unfortunate assertor of the rights of man. In order to make this out to the satisfaction of the public and to rescue from detestation a name, deservedly dear to all true democrats, I shall enter a little minutely into those traits of character, which Sallust has delineated, and render it apparent, how unjustly he has been treated by that historian, and how different a figure, he would have made, had his party been successful; that is, had Cethegus been chosen first Consul, or President of the United States; as the Roman republic would, probably, in such case, have been called.

"The first trait of character I shall notice, is that famous one, 'alieni appetens, sui profusus.'" As to the first part of which, I humbly conceive, it cannot be brought, in this country, as a serious charge against any man. The alieni appetens being the true spirit of commerce. For all property in the world being parcelled out, every thing having an owner, no trade could be carried on, no bargain could be driven, if it were not for that laudable anxiety to make property shift hands; and whether we, democrats, have a higher title to this virtue, than the federalists, I am as yet at a loss to determine. That Cataline was sui profusus, I have no doubt, but how any writer could criminate him, on this account, is the difficulty. Surely a man has a right to spend his own property if he pleases. We are not told that Cataline had either wife or children, who might be brought to want by his profusion. It is true, there are some strong reasons to induce a belief that he was a widower and had stepchildren, dependant upon him, but as he took care to place them in high offices civil or military, no reason can be given, on this account, why he should abridge his natural inclination to expense. Suppose young Cataline was "captus amore Aurelia orestelle" and also "multa nefanda stupra fecerat." What could be more venial in the state of manners, which then existed at Rome, than one or two mistresses; especially as he lavished, for aught appears, only his own property upon them? Upon this part of Cataline's character I have taken an opportunity to converse with Edmund Randolph, Edward Livingston and the Vice-President. The idea of kept mistresses was very shocking to the morals of all those gentlemen; particularly of the last, who shuddered at the suggestion; saying that, in a young country, the bare mention of such a vice might be detrimental. But as to his being sui profusus, they were unanimous that he had a right. There was no just ground of complaint, unless Cataline had been alieni profusus, that is, had squandered the property of other people. In this case, whether he was justifiable, or not, depended upon circumstances. 'For if,' said Mr. Randolph, 'Cataline had been Secretary of State, and had appropriated a few Thousand dollars of the public money, to his private pleasures, it could be vindicated by the most direct precedent.' 'The same would be the case,' said Mr. Livingston, 'if he had made a similar appropriation, out of monies, coming to his hands, as district attorney, or as Mayor of a rich corporation.' 'Or if he had happened,' said Mr. Burr 'to have been appointed administrator to a wealthy stranger, who had died in the country. The heirs being foreigners, there would have been no harm in the world, in spending among free republicans the estate of subjects of a foreign despot.'

Another charge against Cataline is, that he was often seen in company with those, 'qui alienam, ex grande confluxerant.' As if a man, by being in debt, was made a less pleasant companion, or a worse vote, or a less useful instrument. Whereas let any man consider past history, or present experience, and he will find that the best patriots, those, who have been the loudest and boldest, in behalf of the multitude, have been, the most open, those, who were not in the best circumstances, as to money matters. A hectic in the purse never fails to produce an irritability in the nervous system, which, by judicious treatment, is made to terminate in patriotism of the most active and intelligent kind. Indeed very proper and natural is it for those, who have no cares of their own, to watch over, and be solicitous about, the concerns of other people.

"The speech of Cataline to his comrades, as Sallust has reported it, is undoubtedly a noble specimen of eloquence, and has hitherto been unparalleled, in the records of democracy. Yet, without detracting any thing from this great man of antiquity, the speech, delivered by Mr. Burr at that meeting, which was holden in Philadelphia, by our party, previous to the late election of President and Vice-President of the United States, for the purpose of designating candidates for those offices, seems to me not at all inferior, to that of this celebrated Roman. I have a copy of that speech taken, in short hand, at the time; and I shall now favour the public with an extract from it, not so much with the design of giving celebrity to Mr. Burr, as to vindicate that great ancient democrat from the slanders of the aristocracy. That the ensuing extract possesses that terse, pointed, and bold style, peculiar to the vice-president, every one must acknowledge. The propriety of the language and the argument, to the persons present and the occasion, is also very apparent.

But the purpose I have in view, to do equal justice to these bright luminaries of democracy, can alone be effected by making them reciprocally illustrate each other. I shall, therefore, place their respective speeches at once before the public, to the end, that, at one view, it may perceive the conformity of purpose, opinion, language, and character.

For after the establishment of the federal constitution, all power and influence fell into the hands of a few federalists, who created themselves judges, generals, and officers of the revenue. The people and states became tributary to them. While to us, the hardy and staunch republicans, they denied all credit and countenance because we were not of the party of those, who, if the government had been in right hands, would have trembled beneath us. Of consequence, all places of honour and profit are in the hands of a few federalists, or where they choose to distribute them; while we are harassed by difficulties, repulses, executions, and poverty. How long, my brave fellows, will ye endure such an administration? Is it not better to swing for treason, or to be imprisoned under the sedition law, than to lead a tedious and suspected life, insulted by an haughty aristocracy? But, indeed, by G—, victory is in our hands. Republican voters multiply. Irishmen throng in our streets. Against the federalists, enervated by success and riches, every thing conspires. We have only to agree and adhere to our candidates, and all shall be as we wish. For who, that has the spirit of a man, can endure that, by their riches, they can build ships and rows of houses, while some of us, with all our ingenuity, can scarce keep clear of the jail. That they can command two or more mansions, while some of our party, who have been, at least, a month in the country, have not a roof, they can call their own, over their heads, while they purchase bank stock, at one cent, and deferred, and by selling out of one fund and buying into another, amass immense riches, which excite rather than allay their thirst. To most of us there is want at home, and creditors abroad; bad circumstances and worse prospects. In truth what have we left, but this wretched existence? But let us exert ourselves. Behold the election—the election, so long and anxiously expected, is approaching. It places before our eyes office, salary, power, pre-eminence, all these are the rewards of success. Let occasion, opportunity, difficulty, want, and the rich spoils of the treasury, more than any eloquence of mine, animate you. As for me, make use of me, either as president or vice-president. In soul and body I am yours. Of the last office, at least, I trust, I shall not be disappointed, unless indeed I am deceived in your characters, and you prefer to remain private citizens, rather than to become political rulers.*

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE LIFE OF MR. COOPER
THE TRAGEDIAN.

In America, where business is every one's occupation, but few remarkable characters have appeared, and scarcely a biographer has been found to distinguish those few, before the world. However congenial the mystery of money-making may be with a cheerful evenness of temper, it is certainly inimical to genius; and where the opulent lounge would foster, the man of trade frowns on the efforts of imagination: our luxuries are exotic, our entertainments imported, our public spectacles more or less excellent, as they approach the European models, of which they are the distant imitations. The barrenness of our literary domain is not therefore to be wondered at; nor where the soil, tho' so rank has hitherto been so uncultivated, should it surprise, that when a native plant has sprung up, its virtues have not been recorded, or when a foreign one transplanted here, has thriven, though its qualities may have been used and enjoyed, they have not been sufficiently made known, or justly appreciated. The writer of the following memoir, is among the earliest in this country, to attempt the delineation of a living character, and the subjects one of the most eminent of those whose walks of life, have not been political, that have presented themselves to the biographer. The undertaking is made with that diffidence, which respect for the world's voice, and the magnitude of a biographical attempt inspire: the writer's motto is Neminem libenter nominem, nisi ut laudem; sed nec peccata reprehenderem, nisi ut aliis prodessem.

Mr. Cooper was born about the year 1777, of reputable parents: His father was a surgeon, and acquired considerable property in the East, under Warren Hastings's Indian administration—but of the greater part, if not all of this, his widow and children were at his death, which was abroad, defrauded and left destitute. When nine years old, Cooper was taken, out of friendship to his family, and in some sort adopted by Mr. Godwin, the well-known author of the Essay on Political Justice, by whom he was educated and intended for a writer, and no doubt inducted into the visionary democratical sentiments of his instructor. He is probably one of a very few, who have been apprenticed to authorship; and as it is impossible to determine the bent and much more so the soundness and strength of a mind so young, it is somewhat remarkable that a man of Godwin's understanding should train a boy to write books, before it was certain he could ever be induced to read them—What Mr. Godwin's particular method of education was, we do not know; and though when his opinions are adverted to, it should seem it was not a system of restraint, yet when Cooper's readiness on most subjects is considered with his negligent habits for some years past, a belief cannot but be impressed, that the foundation laid, was, of its kind, a good one.

toremata emunt, nova diruunt, alia ædificant; postremo omnibus modis pecuniam trahunt, vexant; tamen summa lubricine divitiis suas vincere nequeunt. At nobis est domi inopia, foris æs alienum; mala res, spes multo asperior. Denique quid reliqui habeamus, præter miseram animam? Quin igitur expergiscimini? Eui illa illa, quam sæpe obstitis, libertas, præterea divitiæ, decus, gloria, in oculis sita sunt; fortuna ea omnia victoribus præmia posuit. Res, tempus, pericula, egestas, belli spolia magnifica, magis quam oratio mea, vos horrentur. Vel imperatore vel milite me utemini. Neque animus, neque corpus a vobis aberit. Hæc ipsa, ut spero, vobiscum una consul agam: nisi forte me animus fallit, et vos servire magis, quam imperare, parati estis.

Such a pupil to such a master must have been roused, and delighted by the French revolution. Cooper was scarcely seventeen when his enthusiasm prompted him to relinquish the pen for the sword, and to seek a commission in the armies of the great Republic, the just-sprouting, sensitive and uncertain laurels of the author were blasted—civic and mural crowns, ovations and sabres d'honneur were much more glittering, and accordingly it was already determined he should engage for the banners of equality and confusion, when the war broke out between England and France, and clouded the brilliant prospects of military promotion and renown in the cause of liberty—Then it was, he turned his attention to the stage, and communicated his wishes to his benefactor; they were received with coldness and regret, and not till after some time assented to, and then with decided disapprobation. His intention however being found invincible, Mr. Holcroft undertook to give him some preparatory lessons. When he was thought prepared, many difficulties occurred, before a suitable place could be procured for his first appearance: at last Mr. Stephen Kemble offered his auspices, and Edinburgh was concluded on. The writer of this sketch has heard Cooper describe with great pleasantry his first interview with the Scotch manager: he was at that time a raw country youth of seventeen. On his arrival in Edinburgh, little conscious of his appearance and incompetency, he waited on Mr. Kemble, made up in the extreme of rustic foppery, proud of his talents, and little doubting his success. When he mentioned his name and errand, Mr. Kemble's countenance changed, from a polite smile to the stare of disappointment: Cooper had been prepared for young Norval; but he was obliged to exchange all his expected eclat for a few cold excuses from the manager, and the chagrin of seeing some nights after, his part filled by an old man and a bad player. During the remainder of the season he continued with Stephen Kemble, without ever appearing. From Edinburgh he went with the company to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, there he lived as dependent, inactive and undistinguished as before, till, owing to the want of a person to fill the part of Malcolm in Macbeth, he was cast to that humble, character—in so inferior a sphere did he begin to move who is now become one of the brightest luminaries of the theatrical hemisphere. His debut was even less flattering than his reception, from the manager had been. Till the last scene he passed through tolerably well, but when he came to the lines which conclude the play

'So thanks to all at once and to each one Whom we invite to see us crown'd at Scone.'

after stretching out his hands and assuming the attitude and smile of thankfulness, slight embarrassment checked him, and he paused, still keeping his posture and look—the prompter made himself heard by every one, but the bewildered Malcolm, who still continued mute, every instant of his silence naturally increasing ten-fold his perplexity—Macduff whispered the words in his ear—Macbeth who lay slaughtered at his feet, broke the bonds of death to assist his dumb successor, the prompter spoke up almost to vociferation—Each Thane dead or alive joined his voice—but this was only 'confusion worse confounded'—if he could have spoken the amazed prince might with great justice have said 'So thanks to all at once'—but his utterance was gone 'vox faucibus hæsit'—a hiss presently broke out in the pit, the clamour soon became general, and the curtain went down, amid a shout of universal condemnation.

After this discomfiture, Cooper returned not a little humiliated to England. Where or what he lived from this time till his appearance on the London boards is not known, though believed to have been among the country theatres, and valetudinary, a chequered life, 'per varios casus, per tot discrimina rerum.' Had he been so disposed, this leisure afforded a fine opportunity for study; probably it was spent at least in mechanical preparation, though Cooper's conduct and belief are very well known to be governed by Biron's sentiment.

'Study is like heaven's glorious sun,
That will not be deep-search'd with saucy looks;
Small have continual plodders ever won
Save base authority from other books.'

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES. SECTION FIRST.

Of the orators who preceded Demosthenes, and of the character of his eloquence.

It is a remarkable fact in the history of the human mind, that there were two republics, which have left, to the whole world, eternal monuments of poesy and eloquence. It was from the bosom of liberty, that the lights of good taste, which still illuminate the civilized nations of our times, were twice scattered over the earth. It is with great impropriety, that some have called, the age of Alexander, that, which commenced with Pericles, and finished under that famous conqueror, whose triumph in Asia, had certainly no part in the literary glory of the Greeks, which expired, with their liberty, precisely at that epocha. Of all the great empires, which preceded his, nothing has remained, but the remembrance, of power overthrown; but the arts of imagination, the taste, the genius, have been, at least the noble inheritance, which ancient liberty has transmitted to us, and which we have collected, from the ruins of Rome and of Athens.

Those arts, so brilliant, carried to so high a point of perfection, had, like all other human affairs, but feeble beginnings. That which remains to us, of Antiphon, of Andocides, of Lysurgus the rhetorician, of Herod, of Lesbos, rises not above mediocrity. Pericles, Lysias, Isocrates, Hyperides, Iseus, Eschynes, appear to have been the most conspicuous in the second rank. Demosthenes stands alone in his. We see, in what remains of Isocrates, a diction ornamented, elegant, of a sweetness, a grace, and, above all, a harmony, studied with a scrupulous exactness, which is, perhaps, carried to excess. His natural timidity, and the feebleness of his organs, kept him from the bar, and the tribune. But he procured for himself, another kind of illustration, by opening a school of eloquence, which was, for sixty years, the most celebrated in Greece, and rendered the greatest service to the art of oratory, as Cicero testifies, in his judgment of the Greek orators. I cannot do better, than to produce this sketch, made by so distinguished a judge, who was much nearer than we are, to the objects of which he speaks.

"It was in Athens," says he, "the first orator existed, and that orator was Pericles. Before him, and his contemporary, Thucydides, we find nothing which resembles the genuine eloquence. It is believed, however, that a long time before, old Solon, Pisistratus, and Clisthenes, had merit, for their time. After them Themistocles appeared superior to others, by the talent of speaking, as well as by political information. In fine, Pericles, renowned for so many other qualities, was also for that of a great orator. It is agreed also, that Cleon, though a turbulent citizen, was, nevertheless, an eloquent man. At the same period, Alcibiades, Critias, Theramenes, present themselves. As there remains to us, nothing of any of these, it is only by the writings of Thucydides, that we can conjecture what was the taste, which reigned, at that time. Their style was noble, elevated, sententious, full, in its precision, but even by that very precision itself, somewhat obscure. As soon as the effect was perceived, which might be produced by a discourse well composed, persons appeared, who offered themselves as professors, in the art of speaking. Georgias of Leontium, Thrasimachus of Calcedon, Protagoras of Abdera, Prodicus of the Isle of Cos, Hippas of Elea, and many others, made themselves names in this way. But their pretensions had too much ostentation; for they boasted, that they could teach, how a bad cause could be made a good one. It was against these Sophists that Socrates arose, who employed in his warfare against them all the subtleties of his dialectics. His frequent lessons formed many learned men. It was then, that morality began to make a part of philosophy, which, till then, had employed itself wholly in physical sciences.

"All these, of whom I have been speaking, were already on their decline, when Isocrates appeared, whose house became the school of Greece, a great orator, a perfect master, who, without shining in the tribunals, without going from home, attained to such a degree of celebrity, as no man, in the same career, has, ever since, reached. He wrote well, and taught others to write well. He knew better than his predecessors, the art of oratory in all its parts; but, above all, he was the first to comprehend, that, if prose ought not to have the rhythm of verse, it ought, at least, to have numbers and harmony appropriate to itself. Before him, they knew nothing of any art in the arrangement of words. When such arrangements were happy, they were the effect of accident; for nature herself inclines us, to enclose our thoughts within a certain compass, to give to our words some convenient order, and to terminate our phrases, most commonly, in a manner more or less numerous. The ear itself perceives that which fills it, or that which is wanting; our phrases are divided by the intervals of respiration, which not only must not fail us, but which cannot even be restrained without producing bad effects."

Cicero speaks afterwards of Lysias, of Hyperides, of Eschynes, and after having given them the praises they merited, he expresses himself thus, Demosthenes combines the purity of Lysias, the wit and refinement of Hyperides, the sweetness and splendor of Eschynes, and as to the figures of thought and the vehemence of discourse, he is above all: in one word, nothing can be imagined, more divine.

The applause of Demosthenes, flows perpetually, from the pen of Cicero, as that of Racine does from the pen of Voltaire. Thus each of them, never ceased to exalt the man, whom he might have dreaded the most, and whom he resembled least. It must be, no doubt, one of the advantages of genius, to feel more sensibly than others, the charm of perfection, because it knows all the difficulty of it; and this attraction ought to contribute to place him above the jealousy natural to rivalry. His pleasure, in that case, prevails over his self-love: he enjoys too much to envy any thing: he is too happy to be unjust.

There are, unfortunately, exceptions to this truth, as to all others; but I am thinking, at this time, only of examples of equity, and that of Cicero is so much the more striking, the justice he does to Demosthenes, is so honourable to them both, as the characters of their eloquence are, as I have just said, absolutely different. Cicero is, of all men, the one, who has carried to the highest perfection the charms of style, and the resources of the pathetic. He delights in his magnificent exuberance. He narrates with all possible address, and pours out his tears with dignity and grace. It is nevertheless this orator, who esteems Demosthenes as the first of men, in the judiciary and the deliberative eloquence, because no man advances so directly and surely to his object, which is to hurry away the multitude or the judges. It is Cicero who extols the superiority of Demosthenes, the elevation of his ideas and sentiments, the dignity of his style, his irresistible energy and victorious vehemence. Fenelon renders him the same homage, and prefers him to Cicero himself, whom he loves however to enthusiasm; such being the fate of Demosthenes, to subjugate, in every kind, both his judges and his rivals.

All the obstacles he had to overcome, and all the effects he made to correct, to promote the flexibility and perfectibility of his organs, and to render his oratorical action worthy of his composition, are well known: but, perhaps, there has not been sufficient attention bestowed on the grandeur, of that singular idea of harranguing on the shores of the sea, to exercise himself, for speaking afterwards before the people. He considered, in a very just point of view, the similitude, between these two powers, equally tumultuous and imposing, the waves of the sea, and the agitations of the people in their assemblies.

Reasonings and emotions, comprise all the eloquence of Demosthenes. Never did a mortal, give to reason, arms more penetrating and irresistible. The truth is in his hands a piercing lance, which he brandishes with equal agility and force, and whose strokes he redoubles, without intermission. He strikes, without giving time to breathe, he pushes, presses, overturns, and is not one of those, who leaves his adversary on the ground, the means of denying his fall. His style is austere and robust; such as becomes a frank and impetuous soul. He rarely embellishes his thoughts; this care seems to be beneath him; he thinks of nothing, but to drive it entire to the bottom of your heart. No man made less use of the figures of diction; none has more neglected the ornaments: but, in his rapid march, he drags after him his audience, where he pleases: and that which distinguishes him, from all the orators, is, that the kind of suffrage which he commands, is always for his cause, and not for himself. We say of others, they speak well. We say of Demosthenes, he is right.

SECTION 2.

Of the different branches, of oratorical invention, and in particular of the manner of reasoning oratorically, as it was employed by Demosthenes, in his harrangue for the crown.

Oratorical invention consists in the knowledge and the choice of the means of persuasion. They are drawn, generally, from things or persons; but the manner of considering them, is not the same, in many respects, in political deliberations, as it is in judiciary questions. In these, what is commonly the point? Such a fact, is it evident? Is it a crime? What law is applicable to it? The age, the profession, the manners, the character, the interests, the situation of the accused, do these render the accusation probable, or improbable? This is the foundation of the judiciary division. In the deliberative, the question is, according to the ancient rhetoricians, concerning that which is honest, useful, or necessary. But Quintilian rejects the last case, and, taking the word in its most rigorous acceptation, for that which we are constrained to do by an inevitable necessity, he pretends that this necessity cannot exist, when we prefer the liberty of dying. And he cites, as an example, a garrison, to whom it should be said, it is necessary that you surrender, because, if you will not, you shall all be put to the sword: and he adds, there is in this no necessity, because the soldiers may answer, we had rather die, than surrender. Neither the reasoning, nor the example, appear to me conclusive. There is not indeed an absolute necessity to surrender, when they rather choose to die: but in the art of oratory, as in morality and politics, a relative necessity is admissible, and the question may be considered in another point of view. We may inquire, whether the place is of sufficient importance, to sacrifice to its preservation, the lives of so great a number of brave men, who might still, for a long time, serve their country? And in that case an orator might very well establish, as a necessity of preserving to the state, the defender whom it may want. This species of moral necessity, may have place in a multitude of parallel cases. It is nothing more than a utility more imperious. It is, in truth, the only necessity which can be brought into deliberation: for the constraint, which arises from physical force, is not susceptible of discussion.

We cannot answer all, by saying, We will die, as we cannot satisfy all by knowing, how to die. It is always a kind of courage, it is true, but it is neither the most rare, nor the most difficult, nor the most useful. Many receive death, when it is sure, with a resignation, which may be called firmness, but not energy. Energy consists in braving the danger of death, when it is yet doubtful, in risking every thing to avoid it, and in refusing to meet it but in the last extremity. We shall be, forever, an example of the reality of this distinction: nor is it the first which history affords, but it is the most striking of all. If so many citizens drawn to dungeons and to punishments, under the reigns of our tyrants; if so many men, who have shewn so much patience in chains, and so much serenity on the scaffold, had possessed the genuine courage, the courage of the head, they would have perceived, that the victims being much more numerous than the hangman, and these being the vilest of men, would not have dared every thing, but because the others suffered every thing.

They would have felt, that when there is no longer any law, but force, it is a thousand times better to perish with arms, in our hands, if we must perish, than to be dragged to the shambles: and it would have been sufficient to demonstrate the resolution, to have imposed on wretches, who never could do more than cut the throats of men, without defence. The rallying point of every citizen is the law, and as any other kind of force, is erected against it, he ought to answer it only by laying his hand upon his sword. It is for this end it was given him and as an ancient poet has said

Ignorantia datos, ne quisquam serviat, enses!

If the lesson we have received in this respect was necessary, it has been so strong, that we may hope it will not be lost. Let us not then take words of common use in the rigour of a metaphysical language, which has sometimes led the ancients into error; and in that of the art of oratory, let us call that necessary which may be so named in morals, that is to say all which is indispensably commanded by the public interest: and in this relation nothing enters more naturally into the order of deliberations.

The ancients made another kind of general division. The Judiciary, says Cicero, turns upon equity, the deliberative upon honour, or in other words, the one upon that which is equitable, the other upon that which is honourable. Here, we perceive the difference in the genius of languages, and the diversity of acception in the corresponding forms of one language to another. For we shall demand in the first place whether all that is honourable is not equitable, and whether all that is equitable, be not honourable. But in the language of their Bar, the Latins understood by equity, that which is equal, that which is conformable to positive right, to the laws; and by honest, that which is conformable to universal morality, to the conscience of all men; and this distinction was not chimerical; for the laws are necessarily imperfect, but conscience is infallible; whence it follows, that the law which cannot foresee all cases, often offers decisions, which are not such as exact honesty would dictate. In this sense one of our authors has said in a Tragedy 'The law often permits what honour forbids' and here honour signifies what it ought always to signify, honesty.

Thus, to avoid a confusion of ideas in our language, we shall say, in adopting the division of Cicero, that the Judiciary, turns upon that which is of the legal order, and the deliberative, upon that which is of the political order: and as in both, justice, moral and social order are equally interested, we shall conclude, afresh, that these divisions coalesce and are confounded together in general principles, whether of nature or art, although they are separated by the diversity of cases, which ought to determine that of oratorical materials.

These materials are 1. The proofs deduced by reasoning which applies the principles to the questions. 2. The proofs drawn from facts, which are to be established or denied, or explained according to the rules of probability, and all this supposes logic. 3. Authorities and examples, which are of so great use and so great power in eloquence, and which suppose the knowledge of history. 4. That which the ancients have named common places, that is to say the truths of morality and experience, generally applicable to all human actions; considerations drawn from the instability of all things in this world, the dangers of prosperity, the caprices of fortune, the commiseration which we owe to distress, the pride of wealth, the inconveniences of poverty, and a thousand other such things the detail of which is infinite, and which an orator ought to employ according to his occasions, which demand philosophical views of the condition of human life; 5. In fine, the sentiments and the passions, which the Latins called, Affectus, and the Greeks, παθη, and which we have very much restrained, by a word, which is not equivalent, the word pathetic, which comprehends only indignation and pity, whereas the generic term of the Greek and the Latin, included all the affections of the soul, which the orator may put in motion as favourable to his cause or his opinion; compassion and resentment, love and hatred, emulation and shame, fear and hope, confidence and suspicion, grief and joy, presumption and diffidence. This is peculiarly the province of a great orator, and which depends, especially on the movements of style. It was in this part that Demosthenes excelled. He has not made use of the affecting pathetic, like Cicero; his subjects did not lead him to this; but he has in a superior manner, handled the vehement pathetic, which is more proper to the deliberative kind of eloquence as the other is to the Judiciary. You now see, whether I have been mistaken in bringing history and philosophy, into the plan of a course of literature such as ought to be pursued by any one who wishes to be in reality a man of letters. For a man of letters ought, by no means to be a stranger, to the talent of speaking, and this talent in order to rise to a certain degree, ought to be supported by all the knowledge, which I have pointed out.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

In Congress, March 25, 1780.

Resolved,

That the papers and original affidavits relative to the capture of the brig Eagle, John Ashmead commander, under a fort in the island of Saba, be filed in the office of the secretary of the United States in congress assembled.

That authenticated copies thereof, signed by the said secretary, be transmitted to their High Mightinesses the States General of the United Provinces by the minister plenipotentiary of these United States at the court of Versailles; and that he be directed to apply to them for their aid in procuring satisfaction for the loss of the said brig Eagle and cargo, and for some assurance that the flag of the United States of America shall be protected from insult when in the ports of the United Provinces.

Extract from the minutes.

CHARLES THOMSON, Secretary.

I, Charles Thomson, secretary of the United States of America in congress assembled, do hereby certify, declare, and make known to all whom it may concern, that the several writings hereto annexed, are true and exact copies of their respective originals, filed in my office agreeably to a resolve of congress of the twenty-fifth day of March instant.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal at Philadelphia this thirtieth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty, and in the fourth year of American independency.

TRANSLATION.

This day, being the sixteenth of November, 1779, before me Anthony Beaujon, first clerk, (officiating during the absence of the secretary) in the service of the honourable chartered Netherlandish West India company, residing at the island of St. Eustatius, in the presence of the witnesses herein after named, appeared John Ashmead, Master, James Brown, Gunner's mate, and Francis Lange, Seaman, who, in their aforesaid capacities, had navigated the brigantine called the Eagle, and in support of truth for the purpose of manifesting it in proper place, did declare, witness, and depose, that they with their aforesaid brigantine and other equipage had sailed from Philadelphia, bound for this island.

That on the 13th instant they, these appearers, had been chased into the road of Saba by a ship, a brigantine, and a schooner, English privateers; that they, these appearers, had cast anchor at Saba aforesaid at or about eleven of the clock, and that he, the first named appearer, had gone ashore and cleared in his vessel and cargo at the governor's and secretary's; that then the brigantine of these appearers lay not above eighty fathoms from the shore, and to the same was fastened by a heavy haulser, and stood right under the fort, and having been at anchor for the space of about one hour, the beforementioned ship, brigantine, and schooner, came likewise to an anchor close to the appearers, and that so close that the brigantine lay at the distance of about ten fathoms from the appearers. A little while after the appearers discovered two sloops and one schooner, to which vessels the brigantine privateer had given a signal, and they one after the other came also to anchor, except one of the sloops that lay off and on. That between the hours of seven and eight, in the evening, the appearer first named being then on shore and with the governor heard the alarm that the brigantine privateer had entered his the said appearers vessel, and was making preparations to take her out; whereupon the governor had given orders to fire alarm and the citizens to appear at the fort to give to the appearer's brigantine as much protection as was in their power to give, that, according to these summons, the said citizens had readily repaired, and in the meanwhile the second and third named of these appearers had swam to the shore, and given information that the brigantine Prial, captain Saunders, belonging to Bristol in Great Britain, had boarded the vessel of the said appearers, and was about taking her out. That in consequence a considerable number of citizens of Saba, with great speed, had repaired to the fort, and spoken to the privateers, "that they should desist from committing hostilities, else they would fire upon them, but that, notwithstanding this, the privateers had continued taking the appearers' brigantine, and going out of the road with her. That thereupon the fort fired upon the ship and brigantine, and the fire was immediately returned from the ship, the brigantine, one of the sloops, and from one of the schooners, that it was a very smart cannonading of whole broadsides and single canon for the space of one hour and a half, with balls and round-shot, to the great danger and peril of the citizens, who had continued firing upon these vessels, until all their ammunition was spent, but that all this was to no purpose of hindering them in the taking out of the appearer's brigantine, which the privateer's crew effected, by towing out the appearer's brigantine, there being little wind.

And the said first-named appearer further declared, that he is informed, that the vessels which had committed that outrage, are as followeth, to wit: the ship Robust, captain Page, belonging to Liverpool; the brigantine Tryal, captain Sanders, belonging to Bristol; the schooner Grey Hound, captain Robert Dunlap, belonging to St. Kitts; the sloop Hawke, captain Isaac Hartman, belonging to Anguilla; one sloop of Antigua, and a schooner, called, The Fame, of Antigua.

And the said appearers, each, with respect to what he has said, do declare, that the foregoing is the pure and upright truth, and that they are ready, when thereunto required, to confirm the same by their solemn oath.

Moreover, he the first-named appearer, and, as far as it may be necessary, the second and third of the appearers, do protest against the cutting out their said brigantine, and the outrages committed by the English privateers, against whom the aforesaid privateers, and all others whom it may concern, for all damages, losses, and interests, thereby already had and suffered, and to be had and suffered, to the end to recover the same, or that they may be recovered at such places, and in such manner, as shall be thought proper.

Thus done and passed at St. Eustatia the day of the date first above written, in the presence of Joseph Roda, and Anthony Beaujon, jun. as witnesses, who, as well as the appearers and myself, the first clerk, have duly subscribed the original thereof.

Which I attest,

Collated.

ANTHONY BEAUJON,
first clerk.

We, Peter Runnels, captain commandant, officiating in the absence of the honorable and worshipful master Johannes de Graeff, governor of the islands of St. Eustatia, Saba, and St. Martin, do hereby make known and certify, that before us appeared, John Ashmead, master, James Brown, gunner's mate, and Francis Lunge, seaman, having in their aforesaid capacities navigated the brigantine Eagle, who, after the foregoing deposition had been truly interpreted to them from the Netherlandish into the English language, did each, on his part, declare the same to contain the fair and upright truth. To which they solemnly adhered, so sure as God Almighty shall help them, these deponents. In testimony whereof, these presents are signed by us, the captain commandant, and by the first clerk, and sealed with the common seal of this island.

Done at St. Eustatia, the 17th Nov. 1779.

With my knowledge,
ANTHONY BEAUJON,
first clerk.

Agreeth with its original remaining in the secretary's office of this island.

Done at St. Eustatia, the 18th Nov. 1779.
Which I do attest,

FOR THE PORT FOLIO

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Zurich, October 12, 1800.

MY DEAR SIR,

I have been amusing myself both yesterday and to-day with walking about this town and its delightful neighbourhood, to enjoy the beautiful prospects which present themselves in every direction, and which continually vary as the spectator changes his position. There can, I conceive, be very few situations more delightful than that of Zurich, which is built at one end of the lake of the same name, and on each side of a charming river which issues from it. The houses are neat and clean, as well as ancient; the modern buildings are elegant. Two wooden bridges connect the two parts of the town; on these are mills, turned by the current of the Limat, which supply water to the inhabitants. The public walks are good, particularly the grand one, which extends along the banks of the river, it is charmingly laid out in gravel-walks, groves, and bouquets, in one of which is a handsome monument erected to the memory of the celebrated Gessner, the author of the Death of Abel, and the beautiful Idylls, which we have so often admired together. Gessner was as famous for his taste and talents as a painter and engraver, as a poet, and I have had much pleasure in being at his house, which is now occupied by his widow and sister, who shewed me all his works, and even the very plates he etched.

Madame Gessner tells me her husband was originally intended for a Printer, and, indeed, followed that business for some time, but his taste for drawing made him neglect every thing else; he never learned the principles of the art till he was thirty years of age, but his assiduity and correct taste facilitated his studies very much. She recounted many curious anecdotes respecting him. He used to go into the fields and draw all the leaves, grass, and trees which struck his fancy. Sometimes he would come home with his pocket full of stones, which he would arrange upon the table to give the effect of rocks, precipices, &c. Once, she said, he caught hold of a silk gown she happened to have on, and crumpling it upon the table cried out to her (who was wondering what he was about) don't you see?—what a grotto!—and uttering a thousand exclamations which were to her totally unintelligible.

The monument I have mentioned was to his honour erected by his fellow-citizens, and is of a simple yet elegant taste.

There is another walk, somewhat elevated, called the Linden Hof, where the society of archers have, for this century past, exercised themselves with the cross-bow. On one side is a statue of William Tell.

The ramparts furnish a walk still more elevated, and much more commanding; from a summer seat at one end there is a beautiful view over the lake for several leagues, and of its little white sails, and its shores sloping up to the mountains, rich in vineyards, pastures, villages, and white country seats, whose forms are distinctly reflected by its calm surface. The horizon is skirted with high mountains in every direction, but at the farthest end of the lake the snow-covered peaks of the Alps rise in all the majesty of sublime nature. Whenever I turn my eyes to this scene, I cannot refrain from bursting out into new exclamations as if it was the first time I beheld it, and I take delight in occasionally renewing the pleasure I feel in contemplating it.

Zurich was the Tigurum of the Romans, and the inhabitants pretend that an old square tower, which stands on a rock in the river, and serves as a prison, is one of their works. The fortifications are in excellent order, and tend to embellish the town very much; they are faced with hewn stone, and the grass in the dry ditches and on the ramparts mowed very close.

This is at present the headquarters of the commander in chief of the army of reserve, and the place is deluged with French officers. Every citizen is obliged to quarter a few soldiers, and even poor Lavater, in his desperate situation, is applied to, to receive one.

Poor Lavater!—We have just come from paying him a visit. When we came to his house he was in great pain, but as soon as he was better he spoke to us with cheerfulness, and apologised for being such bad company. We had a long conversation with him on different subjects. He told us that from what he had seen of the Americans, who had been at Zurich, he liked them better than any Europeans. Had Lavater been in good health, I should have taken this observation as a polite compliment, but from a man who is on the brink of the grave, and cannot live a month longer, and that man, Lavater, so celebrated for his discernment in matters of external character, I consider it as curious and interesting to my countrymen.

When we took leave of him, he presented each of us with a souvenir, or remembrance, which is generally some sentence or drawing, intended to remind the person to whom it is given, of his friend; it is a very common custom on the continent to give them, and I have seen whole books of such drawings and writings. Lavater's souvenir was a card, with an engraved border; on mine he had written the following words, à monsieur **** *

Qu'est ce que l'homme?

l'honneur et la honte, le chef et l'esclave de la creation. Au Dieu et un diable incarné.—Qu'est ce que sa destination? De choisir entre deux chouses—ou de devenir un image pur de la divinité, qui n'est que charité, ou du diable, qui n'est que malice.

5. 11. X. 1800 à Zurich—Jean Gaspard Lavater.

He told us, he had a vast number of portraits and other drawings, which he has never published, and that he had several ideas in his head respecting the connection between the human and brute creation, which he believes he shall not live long enough to communicate to the world. Some things he shewed us, executed under his own eye, were very curious and of ingenious invention.

The environs of Zurich will be rendered famous in military history, on account of the number of battles, which were fought here last year. I am told there were upwards of 12000 Russians slain, besides French and Austrians.

Lucerne, 13th October.

We quitted Zurich early this morning, and travelled along the borders of its delightful lake, to the foot of mount Albis, where we were obliged to hire additional horses to assist the voituriers in dragging our carriage up this steep ascent, which is one of the most formidable in Switzerland for carriages. Mr.—and I walked up in about three quarters of an hour, and found a decent inn at the top. Without resting, we set out to gain a point of view, called the signal, which lay about a mile along the ridge, and from whence we had a most noble and extensive prospect of the lake, the Alps, the lake of Zug, and part of the lake of Lucerne, with all the rich landscape a Swiss view affords, we returned to our inn in fine spirits, for a mountain air, joined with the contemplation of the grand scenes of nature, gave a vivacity and animation, that a less elevated situation and humbler prospects could never have done. The exercise we had taken, made us relish the homely fare we procured at the inn, and we set off afterwards to descend the mountain, in the manner we ascended.

The country all the way to Zug was a perfect garden. We remained at this small town (which is the capital of the canton of same name, and situated at the head of its pretty little lake) just as the members of the government were sitting down at the table d'hôte, that is at 12 o'clock, the common dining-hour in Switzerland, except Sunday, when it is 11. We immediately joined them, and entered into conversation with one, who appeared to have the manners of one who had seen the world. The rest put me in mind of the company you see at a tavern-dinner, during a country-court, and afforded full scope for our observation and remarks.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

While Cowper was laboriously engaged in his Translation of Homer, and his commentary on Milton, he became acquainted with Hayley, the poet; and thus describes the wishes, and the cares of an affectionate friend, and an anxious commentator.

Dear architect of fine Chateaux air,
Worthier to stand forever if they could.

Than any built of stone, or yet of wood
For back of royal Elephant to bear!
Oh, for permission from the skies to share
Much to my own, though little to thy good
With thee, not subject to thy jealous mood,
A partnership of literary ware.
But I am bankrupt now! and doom'd henceforth
To drudge in descendant dry on others lays,
Bards I acknowledge of unequalled worth,
But what is commentators' happiest praise?
That he has furnished lights for other eyes,
Which they, who need them, use, and then despise.

WHIMSICAL EPIEAPH.

Some years since, a Mr. Dickson, who was Provost of Dundee in Scotland, died, and by will left the sum of one guinea, to a person to compose an epitaph upon him; which sum he directed the three executors to pay. The executors, thinking to defraud the poet, agreed to meet and share the guinea among them, each contributing a line.

1st Here lies Dickson, provost of Dundee
2 Here lies Dickson, here lies he,

The third was embarrassed for a long time, but unwilling to lose his share of the guinea, vociferously bawld

Hallelujah, hallelujah

On the decease of Mrs. Vanbutchell, wife of Mr. Vanbutchell, Dentist, he contrived, with the assistance of that eminent anatomist Dr. William Hunter, by means of a kind of pickle, so to preserve the body, as to give it nearly the appearance of life and health, put it into a glass case, and shewed it for a long time to his friends and acquaintance.

The following epitaph was written upon her by Mr. Grove of Litchfield, by way of translation to a Latin one, written by Dr. Barker.

Here, unentom'd Vanbutchell's consort lies,
To feed her husband's grief or charm his eyes;
Full sweet and pure her body still remains,
And all its former elegance retains:
Long had disease been preying on her charms
Till slow she sunk in Death's expecting arms
When Hunter's skill, in spite of nature's laws,
Her beauties rescued from corruption's jaws
Bade the pale roses of her cheeks revive
And her shrunk features seem again to live
—Hunter, who first conceiv'd the happy thought
And here at length to tuit perfection brought,
O lucky husband! blest of heaven,
To thee, the privilege is given
A much lov'd wife at home to keep,
Caress converse with—even sleep
Close by her side, whenever you will,
As quiet as if living still.
And, strange to tell, that fairer she
And purer than alive should be Fair, plump, and tender as before
And full as tractable—or more
Thrice happy mortal! envied lot
What a rare treasure hast thou got
Who to a woman can lay claim
Whose tempers every day the same.

And adds a trophy to his victories:
Yet, sure he was prepar'd, who, while he'd breath,
Made it his business still to look for Death.

FIGHTING DOG.

Lord Camelford, last week purchased Mr. Mellish's celebrated fighting dog. This animal who as renowned for his battles as Bonaparte, was originally the property of fighting Humphreys, he next came into the possession of fighting Johnson, by whom he was dearly loved and much admired; his next owner was fighting Ward, who sold him a few months ago to Mr. Mellish, for 20 guineas. His Lordship being fascinated with the bold feats and the spirited demeanour of the animal, proposed to buy him, and Mr. Mellish consented to sell him in the carcase way. The dog was accordingly put into the scale, after a good hearty dinner of tripe, and was found to weigh forty-two pounds. The price which they agreed upon was two guineas per pound, so that the purchase-money amounted to the sum of eighty-four guineas. This was satisfied in the following manner: A favourite gun, belonging to his Lordship, value 44 guineas. It would have been an insult to this noble animal to have paid the purchase in money, and therefore, he was in a manner exchanged for those warlike articles. He is known by the name of Belcher has fought 104 battles, and never was beat. A more warlike pedigree, or nobler blood, cannot be boasted by any of the canine race in England. To his other great and good qualities he adds a singular instinct, by which he is enabled to know a brave man from a coward, and he is as much attached to the former, as he hates the latter. His Lordship is so pleased with his purchase, he declares no money shall part him and his dog.

BLOOD HOUND.

The Thrapston Association for the prosecution of felons, in Northamptonshire, have provided and trained a blood hound for the detection of sheep stealers. To prove the utility of the hound, the 28th ult. was appointed for the purpose of exercising it. The person he was to hunt started at ten o'clock in the forenoon, in the presence of a great concourse of people, and at eleven the hound was let loose; when after a chase of an hour and a half, notwithstanding a very indifferant scent, the hound found him secreted on a tree, at the distance of fifteen miles.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Imitation from the French of Fontenelle.

Struck with a tender air I play'd,
The fav'rite of my charming maid,
Young Cupid promis'd, for another,
Two kisses from his lovely mother—

No, no, cry'd I, my little friend,
You know which way my wishes tend;
I'll play it o'er and o'er again,
But for a single kiss from Jane.

He vow'd to grant my fond desire,
And sweeter sounds produc'd my lyre;
But will you, Jane, propitious prove,
And keep the promises of love?

ROWLAND.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

On seeing a lady weep while reading an interesting story.
Let those of wealth and power possess't,
In Fortune's giddy circle move;
But come, and be my constant guest,
Sweet Pity, soft-ey'd friend of Love.

I saw thy pure effusions steal,
In pearly drops, from Delia's eye;
There's none thy power can stronger feel,
And none can heave a tend'rer sigh.

Learn then of her, my soften'd heart,
To sympathise with others woe;
Thy soothing influence impart,
And with thy best emotions glow.

Yet stay—for in thy silent train
Th' insidious shafts of Love I see;
And, if I deeply feel their pain,
Will Delia ever pity me?

PARMEGIANO.

SELECTED POETRY.

[Of the nine lyric poets, so highly praised by antiquity, we have few remains, except of Anacreon and Pindar; but the literary world must derive some consolation from reflecting, that probably such parts of their writings as were most valuable in themselves, being equally applicable to all ages and countries, have been preserved by Horace. This appears not only from a comparison of several passages in his works with such fragments of their writings, as remain, not only from his frequent mention of them as his originals, but from the singular circumstance, that, having scarcely any models of lyric poetry in his own language, he raised it, at once, to the highest point of perfection which that language admits. Lyric poetry, amongst the Romans, may be said to have begun and ended with him; for he had no predecessors, unless Catullus be ranked as such, and his successors have long since been forgotten. He, therefore, alone supports the lyric fame of his country, but he supports it with Herculean strength.]

The following ode contains the principles of a moderate and rational Epicurean, such as Horace seems to have been, and not those of a debauched and inordinate votary of pleasure.]

HOR. LIB. I. ODE 18.

Translated by W. Boscawen, Esq.

Varus, the vine prefer, where'er you sow
The genial soil of Tiber's far-fam'd fields,
Dull sober mortals heaven o'erwhelms with woe,
To wine alone corroding sorrow yields.

What generous soul, when cheering wine inspires,
Dread fears of wan poverty annoy?
Thee, jocund god, the grateful heart admires,
Thee, Venus, queen of pure unsullied joy.

Yet, warn'd, your social mirth let temp'rance guide,
Beware the Lapithæ and Centaur's ire,

So the mad Thracians right and wrong divide,
By the thin boundaries of their wild desire.

No, gentle godhead, friend to peace and love,
Ne'er shall my voice thy genial soul affright.
Ne'er pierce the deep inviolable grove,
Nor drag thy mysteries to unhallow'd light.

Let then no Phrygian cymbals wake the breast,
For then self-love prevails with impulse blind,
And empty pride displays her airy crest,
And lavish confidence unveils the mind.

[The heart of Anacreon, devoted to indolence, seems to think that there is wealth enough in happiness, but seldom happiness enough in wealth. The cheerfulness with which he brightens his old age is interesting and endearing. Like his own rose, he is fragrant even in decay. But the most peculiar feature of his mind is that love of simplicity, which he attributes to himself so very feelingly, and which breathes characteristically in all that he has sung. His disposition was amiable; his morality was relaxed, but not abandoned; and virtue, with her zone unloosed, is an emblem of his character.]

All the translators and commentators have differed widely in their conception of this ode. It seems scarcely possible that this antique Grecian gem should be placed in a fairer light than it has been done by Mr. Moore.]

ODE 18.

Now the star of day is high,
Fly, my girls, in pity fly,
Bring me wine, in brimming urns,
Cool my lip, it burns, it burns!
Sunn'd by the meridian fire,
Panting, languid, I expire!
Give me all those humid flowers,
Drop them o'er my brow in showers,
Scarce a breathing chaplet now
Lives upon my feverish brow;
Every dewy rose I wear
Sheds its tears and withers there,
*But for you, my burning mind,
Oh! what shelter shall I find,
Can the bowl or flowrets' dew
Cool the flame, that scorches you?

CANZONET.

Lady! when with glad surprise,
I meet thy soft and shaded eyes,
Or, lost in dreams of love, behold,
Thy waving locks of darken'd gold,
Or press the lip whose dew discloses
Sweets, that seem the breath of roses,
Lady! I sigh, and, with a tear,
Swear earth is heaven if thou art near.

But when the hour of transport's o'er,
My soul's delight is seen no more,
Remembering all thy host of charms,
I tremble then with wild alarms,
And, taught by jealous doubt, discover,
In every gazing youth a lover,
Confessing, with a silent tear,
That heaven and hell are wond'rous near.

[Sir Charles Sedley was never more conspicuous for that prevailing gentle art, which has been ascribed to him, than in the following gallant stanzas, which surpass in finesse and delicacy of compliment even the bland expressions of Waller to his Amoret or Sacharissa.]

Not, Celia, that I juster am,
Or better than the rest;
For I would change each hour, like them,
Were not my heart at rest.

* The translator remarks that the transition here is peculiarly delicate and impassioned.

But I am ty'd to very thee,
By every thought I have;
Thy face I only care to see,
Thy heart I only crave.

All that in woman is ador'd
In thy dear self I find;
For the whole sex can but afford
The handsome and the kind.

Why then should I seek farther store,
And still make love anew?
When change itself can give no more,
'Tis easy to be true.

[The following Song, though from the pen of a nobleman, whose wickedness was at least equal to his wit, is pure; and, if deformed by some of Cowley's peculiarities, is still an agreeable trifle.]

Insulting beauty you mispence
Those frowns upon your slave;
Your scorn against such rebels bend
Who dare with confidence pretend
That other eyes their hearts defend
From all the charms you have.

Your conquering eyes so partial are,
Or mankind is so dull,
That, while I languish in despair,
Many proud, senseless hearts declare,
They find you not so killing fair,
To wish you merciful.

They, an inglorious freedom boast,
I triumph in my chain;
Nor am I unreveng'd, though lost,
Nor you unpunish'd, though unjust,
When I alone, who love you most,
Am kill'd with your disdain.

MOLLY'S RESOLVE.

Ned says your fair, I say your brown,
He says you smile, I say you frown—
Now, prithee, which is right?
To suit my answer to your mind,
If true it is that Love is blind,
Ye both have lost your sight.

For if on Ned I chance to smile,
You sicken, and turn pale the while,
And think I frown on you,
Or when he calls me Molly fair,
I black or brown to you appear,
Or any but the true.

But if you wish my mind to know,
And which the favourite, Ned or you,
I'll e'en no longer jest;
Ned has his charms, and so have you,
But, as I cannot marry two,
First love they say is best.

To speak in Nimium's praise I'd plann'd,
But he out-plans me hollow;
And he's so much the abler hand,
I can't attempt to follow.

VOLTAIRE.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

FOR a delicate mind censure must always be an irksome and an invidious task, but for one who professes a most profound devotion to the ladies, to censure them involves exclusive difficulties, becomes doubly irksome, and doubly invidious. Peculiar hardihood of enterprise and vigour of exertion are requisite to brave the resentment of those who are armed with muniments of warfare far more formidable than the spear or the falchion, who 'disarm wit' a smile, and kill with a look, to whom we habitually pay uncircumscribed deference, and yield implicit submission. The barbarians of old, in their conflicts with the Romans, palliated the ignominy of discomfiture, by proclaiming that no human power could withstand the fire of their adversary's eye, and the terrors of their brow; the recreant knight of the present day, temerarious enough to throw down the gauntlet to the sex, must expect to combat a frown still more terrible, and meet the lightning of an eye no less potent in its execution when chastising presumption, than irresistible when moistened with the tear of pity, or beaming with the congenial softness of love. In other topics of animadversion the censor is exonerated from the burden of private animosity, by the latent vanity of the reader, who is always prone to suppose himself excepted from his range; but with the female world there is, perhaps, a consciousness of infallibility, which tolerates not any charge of imperfection, however general, and a fervourous zeal in the common cause, which impels the individual to feel with as much sensibility, and repel with as much warmth, a collective aspersion as a particular attack. I know, indeed, that although I have chosen to trace this eccentricity to such respectable sources, others have assigned a more uncharitable cause, and illiberally imagine that no possible charge could be advanced which does not more or less apply to every individual. Without waiting to investigate their comparative accuracy, I shall proceed to remark, that, if I have been silent for some time past, it must be attributed to the force of these impressions, and that if I again venture to take the field, due honour should be conceded to the courage of heart, and purity of zeal, which encounter perils of such magnitude, without any prospective advantage.

Your fair correspondents, with some small indications of triumph have repeatedly urged, that although we are prolific of the blemishes we pretend to discover, and can vociferously emblazon their expatiatory eloquence on trifles, and invincible taciturnity on subjects of a rational texture, we are unable to prescribe a remedy, and are mute on the line of conduct they are to pursue. I have always considered our province to be circumscribed within the simple denunciation of the error, while it remained the exclusive and infeasible privilege of the Lounger to rectify the deviation, and designate the straight path. But he himself, at such a call, must be too gallant not to remit, with indulgent leniency, so important an infraction of his prerogative, as an humble surmise of what, if those extremes actually obtained, may be their remote cause, I mean the present defective system of female education. If the pupil form a moderate acquaintance with the French language, dance with ease or grace, and acquire some practical knowledge of music, accomplishments of a more solid or exalted nature are deemed nugatory and superfluous: she comes forth into the community with no fund for conversation but on matters that are comprised within the narrow compass of her scholastic instruction; with no taste but for the decoration of her person, or the tumultuary routine of dissipation; with no other store of ideas than those which enable to estimate point-lace, or judge of the trimmings of a cap: unaccustomed in her youth to serious application, she must be forever precluded from those intellectual enjoyments, which constitute satisfactory substitutes for the pleasures of the ball or the card-table, when the indifference of age makes them lose their zest which temper the corrosion of care, assuage the bitterness of adverse fortune, relieve the languor of satiety, and prolong the empire of a woman by the powers of her mind, when her personal attractions have vanished. 'All that you say,' exclaims the Countess La Fayette, in an elegant epistle to Mad. De Sevigné, 'bears such a charm that your words attract the smiles and graces to your person, and although it seems that wit should only affect the ears, it is nevertheless certain that your's dazzle the eyes, and that one who hears the lively sallies, that flow with such exuberance and ease, sees no longer that something is wanting to the regularity of your features or to the perfection of your beauty.' I would not wish to insinuate that the delineation I have given above is universally true; in the circle with which I have the honour to associate I know of many exceptions; from the list of your correspondents you may adduce the name of Beatrice, with a portraiture materially diverse. and, as a proof of the fallacy of a common opinion, that a polished and erudite mind is incompatible with the discharge of the duties incident to a wife or a mother. The example of the females who have obtained celebrity in the annals of literature, that of M. de Sevigné particularly co-operates to the same effect; distinguished for uncommon tenderness and indefatigable assiduity towards her husband and her children, she could, however, in the morning, philosophise with Tacitus, indulge herself with the Italian of Ariosto, and the Spanish of Lope de Vega, in the evening infuse life and animation into those brilliant societies of which she was the ornament and the delight. As this is a subject which I touch with 'fear and trembling,' and as I am fond of corroborating my remarks by the sanction of legitimate authority, I shall beg to close them by the following letter, from the French of Voltaire, addressed to the Marchioness of Châtelteux, and containing a dedication of his celebrated tragedy of Alzire.

'To you, Madam, how inconsiderable a tribute must be one of those ephemeral works of poetry, which owe their principal merit to the evanescent illusion of the theatre, and the transitory plaudit of the public, and which are doomed to encounter the common fate of neglect and oblivion. What, indeed, is a versified romance in the estimation of a woman, who reads a geometrical system with no less facility than others peruse a romance; one who has found in Locke, that sage preceptor of the human race, only the series of her own ideas, and the history of her own thoughts; one, in fine, who, although born for whatever captivates the sense, or charms the imagination, prefers the investigation of truth to the display of those powers of which nature has been so profusely lavish.

But, madam, the greatest and the most estimable genius is, unquestionably, that, which comprehends, within the limits of its research, all the fine arts. They constitute the delight and the aliment of the soul; is there any, then, that should be excluded? Happy is the mind which the severity of philosophical disquisition cannot stiffen, or the blandishments of the belle-lettres emasculate: happy the person, whose understanding is invigorated by Locke, and enlightened with Clarke and Newton; who can enjoy the sublime effusions of Cicero and Bossuet, indulge and enrich his fancy with the charms of Virgil and Tasso.

Such a genius do you possess: the avowal must be made, however harsh it may sound to a delicate ear. Your example should encourage those of your sex and station to believe that the perfection of our reason superadds new splendor to elevation of rank, and the cultivation of the intellect, new graces to the person. There was a time in France, and, indeed, in all Europe, when both were deemed, by the men, derogatory to their dignity, by the women incompatible with their character. The latter consecrated their moments to the arts of coquetry and intrigue; the former to poise the lance and wield the battle axe, to shine in the tournament, and obtain renown in the field by their dexterity in managing the weapons of mutual extermination.

The obloquy which Moliere and Despreaux attempted to cast on learned women, appeared, in an age of superior civilization and refinement, almost to sanction the prejudices of barbarism. But Moliere, whom we venerate as the legislator of moral propriety, never could have intended, in his attack on them, to stigmatise science or wit. The shafts of his satire are levelled against the ostentatious pedantry of erudition, against the affectation and abuse of science. In his imitable Tartuffe, he reprobates hypocritical dissimulation, not solid piety or genuine virtue. So considerable, however, has been the progress of a liberal and philosophical spirit in France, within the lapse of the last forty years, that if Boileau still lived, he, who ridiculed a woman of rank because she dared to receive private instructions from the astronomers Roberval and Sauveur, would be now necessitated to respect and imitate those who publicly participate in the profound lectures of Maupertuis and Reamur. We are in an age, I can venture to assert, when a poet must be a philosopher, and when a woman may openly and confidently avow herself such.

It cannot, indeed, be denied, that a female, who totally abandons her domestic avocations for scientific pursuits, is reprehensible, whatever may be the brilliancy of her genius, or the extent of her attainments. But the same disposition which animates us in the investigation of truth, is that which prompts to the performance of duty. The wife of George the second of England, who mediated between two of the most celebrated metaphysicians of Europe, Clarke and Leibnitz, never for a moment neglected to discharge the functions which devolved to her as a queen, a wife, and a mother. Christina, who magnanimously renounced a throne for the study of the fine arts, emulated, nevertheless, the most distinguished monarchs for the splendor and felicity of her reign. Has not the grand daughter of the great Conde, in whom his spirit seems almost resuscitated, given additional importance to the noble blood which flows in her veins?

You, madam, whose name is worthy of being united to that of any prince, reflect the same lustre on letters. In the age of allurements and pleasure, in the vivacious season of youth, they form your delight and your occupation: you leave no species of them untouched, you pursue them through all their ramifications. You do still more: you conceal from the world qualifications so rare and so admirable, with no less assiduity, than you have employed diligence in their acquisition. Continue, then, to cherish, to dare to cultivate the sciences: although there may have been an involuntary effusion of that light, which you would have permitted to irradiate only your own breast. Ought those, who occultly bestow the charitable dole, renounce the practices of beneficence, because their virtue becomes public? And why should superior merit cause a blush to suffuse the cheek of a woman? Is not an enlightened mind a new beauty, does it not create a new empire? The protection of sovereigns is solicited for the arts; to me that of beauty is incalculably more desirable. Taste exclusively, and not fashion, must be the predominant motive in such of your sex as inform and embellish their understandings: for a reflecting mind this must be a cogent reason, more to admire and appreciate their exertions.

As for our part, it is the inflation of vanity, or the mercenary impulse of gain, which most frequently stimulate us in the prosecution of our literary labours. We commit a species of profanation in making them the instruments of our fortune. I regret that Horace has ever said of himself—

Poverty is the father of my lay.
Paupertas impulit audax,
Ut versus facerem.

The malevolence of envy, the artifice of intrigue, the virulence of satire, and the poison of defamation, among men degrade a profession, which, in its nature, approximates to something divine. May this offering, which I now make, madam, be more durable than my other productions; it would be immortal were it worthy of her to whom it is inscribed.

FLORIAN.

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

What indeed would an orator be, if he were not a logician; if he were not accustomed to seize with precision, the connection or the opposition of ideas; to mark with accuracy, the point of a question in debate, to discriminate the errors, more or less specious, which obscure it, to define well, the terms, to apply properly the principle to the question, and the consequences to the principle; to break in pieces the toils of sophistry in which Ignorance entrenches, or Hypocrisy envelops itself. No doubt he ought to leave to philosophy, that methodical argumentation and those dry dialectics, which only produce conviction. The orator pretends to more: he would persuade: for if resistance to the truth is often merely an error, it is still more frequently a passion; and this is the enemy the most obstinate, and most difficult to vanquish. It is necessary then, that the orator, not only shewn the truth, but determine us to follow it: not only that he demonstrate what is honest, but impel us to do it. To this end, the logic of an orator ought to unite emotions with reasonings. But emotions will not be powerful, but in proportion as the reasonings are just: and then nothing can resist this double force, calculated to carry all before it. This was the power of Demosthenes, the most terrible gladiator that ever brandished the arms of eloquence. He employs reasoning, as if it were the club of Hercules, with which he strikes without ceasing, and every blow of which inflicts a wound. I have often recollected, in reading him, that place in the Eneid, where Entellus, full of the strength of the gods, pours down upon the miserable Dares, a storm of blows, and drives him from one end of the arena to the other, the blood streaming from his nose, his mouth, and his ears.

Præcipitemque Daren, ardens agit æquore toto.
Creber utraque manu pulsat versatque Dareta.

It is precisely the image of Demosthenes, when he has an adversary before him. Woe be to him, who finds himself in the hands of this rude justler. It is from him that I shall proceed to take examples of the materials and forms of oratory: I shall afterwards draw from Cicero, and you will judge of the different manners of these two great men.

In the celebrated prosecution for the crown, in which Demosthenes had all the reason on his side, Eschines had laid hold of the tenor of the decree of coronation, and on the text of the laws, a matter which always affords plentiful resources for the chicanery of words; and the accuser, a man of great talents, had availed himself of it with all possible address. A law forbade the coronation of any man who stood accountable to the public. He contends, that Demosthenes has not accounted, from whence he concludes, that the decree is illegal and void. He grounds himself upon this, that Demosthenes is still charged with the administration of the public spectacles, and had been with that of the reparation of the walls of Athens. The first accountability had no relation to the decree, which crowned Demosthenes only for his conduct which concerns the reparation of the walls. It is true, that for this last he had not rendered any account: but he had a very good reason for this: because he had done it at his own expense; and it was precisely to reward him for this acknowledged civil liberty, that the senate, so far from demanding his account, had decreed him a crown of gold. But Eschines had intrenched himself in the literal text of the law, and moreover had affected to mix and confound, two accountabilities, very distinct, that of the spectacles and that of the walls: this was an affair of pure reasoning. You will see how Demosthenes knew, by what mode to render it oratorical, how he elevates it by the nobleness of thoughts and sentiments, at the same time that he holds up in the clearest light the evidence of principles and facts, by a luminous logic.

"If I pass in silence, the greater part of what I have done for the interest of the republic, in the various functions she has confided to me; it is because my conscience assures me of the testimony of yours, and that I may come the sooner to the laws, which they pretend have been violated by the decree of Ctesiphon. Eschines has so embarrassed and obscured every thing he has said on this subject, that, in truth, I believe you have not comprehended him better, than he understood himself. To all his long declamations I shall answer by a declaration clear and precise. He has a hundred times repeated, that I am accountable. Very well! I am so far from denying it, that during my whole life, I hold myself accountable to you, my fellow citizens, for all I shall have done in the administration of public affairs."

Before we proceed, let us pause a moment, for it is worth while to remark, what is genuine eloquence, that, which comes from the soul. Pectus est quod disertum facit. It is the heart that makes eloquent. This frank and simple expression of a great and beautiful sentiment of a citizen, has it not already defeated all the ingenious subtleties of Eschines? At the same time, how oratorical it is, and founded on the knowledge of men! How well Demosthenes knew his hearers and his judges! How sure he is to obtain every thing, by throwing himself into their hands, and even into those of his adversary, and by offering them much more than they could demand of him. Let it not be said, that such a declaration is very easy; that any man could make it. Aye! but the question is concerning the effect it would produce, and we must not deceive ourselves. This effect is not obtained by talents only: but it belongs to the person and his character; to express himself thus, a man must be pure. A man, whose probity is equivocal, would be ridiculous in holding this language. The audience would smile with pity: and a known villain would be hissed. Thus the ancients defined an orator to be a good man, skillful in the art of speaking. Vir bonus dicendi peritus. This declaration then, would be no longer oratorical, if it were not true. We shall have occasion hereafter to express these awkward apish tricks, this impudent empiricism of perverse men, who have so often been seen borrowing and disfiguring such expressions of the inward testimony which virtue may render to itself, and which in their mouths are but one outrage the more, which they commit against it. It passes unpunished, I confess, when it addresses itself to accomplices or to slaves; but when the public voice is free, it does justice on the spot to such insolent hypocrisy. I will relate but one example, and that anterior to the revolution. A man, who had not merited death, which however he has since suffered, but whose servile and venal immorality was well known, Linguet was imprudent enough one day to apply to himself, in a full audience, that verse of Hippolite, in the tragedy of Phædre, "The light is not purer than the bottom of my heart." Scarcely could the most honest of men, without being taxed with ostentation, have given himself in public such an eulogium, which is permitted only to virtue calumniated. Linguet was saluted with a universal hooting; he turned round towards the assembly with a menacing look, as we saw him afterwards double his fist at the constituent assembly. But these gestures and grimaces, though very common at this day, are no more proper to an orator than to an honest man, because decency is inseparable from honesty, and they served only to redouble the hootings. This was just, and it must be acknowledged, that no quotation was ever more unfortunately made. I return to Demosthenes, and it is returning from afar. He continues thus:—

"But I maintain, at the same time, that there is no magistrature that can render me accountable, for what I have given. Do you hear me, Eschines?—for what I have given.—And I ask you, Athenians: When a citizen has employed his fortune for the interest of the state, where is the law so iniquitous, and so cruel, as to deprive him of the merit which he may have acquired with you, to oblige him to submit his liberalities, to the rigorous forms of examination, and compel him to appear before revisors, charged with the calculation of his benefactions? No such law exists. If there is one, shew it me.—But, no, there is none. It is impossible there should be one.—Eschines has thought to impose upon you, by a very strange sophism. Because I am accountable, for the monies which I have received, for the maintenance of the spectacles, he will have it, that I am also accountable for my own monies, which I have given for the reparation of our walls. The senate, he cries out, has crowned him, and he is still accountable! No, the senate has not crowned me for any thing which requires accounts, but for that which is incompatible with all accounts, that is to say, for my own property, of which I have made a present to the republic. But Eschines still urges, you have been charged with the reconstruction of our walls; therefore you ought to give an account of the expense.—Yes, if I had made any; but it is precisely because I have made none, and because I have done the whole at my own expense, that the senate have thought that I deserved honour. A state of expense, to be sure, requires an examination;—but for gifts—for largesses, no registers are necessary—nothing is wanted but praise and gratitude."

Let us turn to another passage, in the same discourse, where the logic of Demosthenes had much more to do: it was, in reality, the delicate point of the cause, where it presented itself under an aspect truly afflicting. Demosthenes, who, without any legal magistracy, was, in effect, the first magistrate of Athens, and indeed of the allied republics, because he governed all by his counsels, and animated all by his eloquence, had alone procured the declaration of war against Philip: and the war had been disastrous. It was well known, that it has not been his fault; but, do not misfortunes, which irritate mankind, render them unjust? Is not resentment sometimes blind? Are we not naturally too much inclined to censure him, who is the cause, innocent, or not, of our misfortunes? And suppose that we pardon him, is it not all that we can do? Are we much disposed to reward and honour him? Here lay the hope of Eschines, the strength of his accusation, and the motive of all his attacks. It appears that he would not have hazarded so many lies and calumnies, but in a confidence, that he should overwhelm Demosthenes with the pressure of public calamities, in such a manner, that he could never surmount them: and it is in this view, that the harangue of the crown is so much the more admired, as it had more difficulty to overcome. All the public events were against the orator: the essential point was to save himself, by the purity of his intentions, which was not a resource so fertile as that of Eschines. This last had at his command all those common places, which are so powerful in eloquence, when the application of them is under our eyes; the blood of the citizens spilled; the devastation of the country; the ruin of cities, the mourning of families; and so many other deplorable objects, which he displays and developes with all the refinement of the most insidious artifice, with all the bitterness of indignation, and with all the perfidy of hatred. I shall not consider here all the materials of every kind, which Demosthenes opposes to him; they will come in their proper place. I confine myself to our present object, oratorical reasoning. To distinguish the intention from the fact, was very easy, but by no means sufficient. It was necessary so to separate it from the event, to characterize it by strokes so noble and so striking, that Demosthenes and the Athenians might appear still great, even when every thing had turned against them. We shall see, elsewhere, the article which concerns particularly the Athenians; but, for Demosthenes, he takes a course, the mere conception of which proves the force of his head, and the resources of his genius. He denies, formally, that he has been vanquished; he affirms, that he has been the conqueror; that he has really triumphed over Philip; and, which is more, he proves it. Let us hear him address himself to Eschines. "Wretch! if it is the public calamity, which has given you presumption, when you ought to bewail it, with us, endeavour then to make appear, in all that depended on me, something which may have contributed to our misfortune, or which, indeed, ought not to have prevented it. Wherever I have been sent upon embassies, have the envoys of Philip had any advantage of me? No: never: no: in no place. Neither in Thessaly, nor in Thrace, nor at Byzantium, nor at Thebes, nor in Illyrium. But all that I had done by persuasion, Philip destroyed by force; and you attribute all to me! and you do not blush to call me to account for it! This same Demosthenes, whom you represent as so weak a man, you insist should prevail against the armies of Philip; and with what? with words? for nothing was in my power, but the organs of speech; I had no authority over the arms or the fortune of any man: I had no military command: and there is no man but you, so unreasonable as to think of making me responsible. But what could the orator of Athens do, what ought he to do? See the evil in its origin, make it visible to others, and this I have done; to prevent, as much as possible, the delays, the false pretexes, the oppositions of interests, the mistakes, the faults, the obstacles of every kind, too common among allied republics, jealous of each other, and this I have done; to oppose to all these difficulties with real ardour, the love of duty, friendship, concord; and this I have done. Upon any of these points, I defy any man to find me in fault. And if you demand of me, how Philip has carried his point, all the world will answer for me: by his arms, which have invaded every thing, and by his gold, which has corrupted every thing. It was not in my power to contend with him in one way or the other: I had neither treasures nor soldiers. But in all that depended on me, I am bold to say, I have conquered Philip: and how? by refusing his largesses, and resisting corruption. When a man suffers himself to be purchased, the purchaser may say, he has triumphed over him; but he who remains incorruptible, may say, he has triumphed over the corruptor. Thus then, as far as depended on Demosthenes, Athens has been victorious: Athens has been invincible."—Is not this a masterpiece of oratorical argumentation? Do you not seem to hear the exclamations, which must have followed so beautiful a morsel. And do you not conceive, that nothing could resist a genius of such force? Remember always, what I cannot too often repeat to you, that, to employ materials of this kind, you must find them in your souls: the heart alone can produce them. Art may teach you to arrange and adorn them, but it cannot furnish them. It is to the orator, above all, that the happy expression of Vauven argues, so often quoted, is applicable, "Great thoughts come from the heart." I should say then to one who desired to become eloquent: begin by being a good citizen, that is, an honest man: for you cannot be one without the other. Do you love above all things, your country, justice, and truth? Do you feel yourself incapable of ever betraying them, for any interest whatever? Does the bare idea of ever flattering for a moment, a criminal, or of ever calumniating virtue, make you shudder with shame and horror? If such is your character, speak and fear nothing. If nature has given you talents, you may do every thing; if she has refused them to you, you may still do much; in the first place, your duty, and in the next, much real good, that of giving a good example to others, and to the good cause, one defender the more.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF CHRISTOPHER SMART.

[The life, and literary character of CHRISTOPHER SMART are not sufficiently known to American readers. From the first, we may learn to beware of the imprudence and excesses, which too frequently accompany, and deform the ardent poet, and in the second, we may find many honourable proofs of genius, learning and goodness. The sacred poetry of SMART is superior to that of all his contemporaries, and perhaps to many of his predecessors; his original Fables display invention and much of La Fontaine's ease; his translation of the elegant Latinity of Phædrus is incomparably the best in the language; and exhibits many of the bewitching graces of the exquisite original. His Songs combine passion and poetry; and to a beginner, perplexed with the intricate involutions of the Roman phrase, or to the superficial adult scholar, no translation of HORACE, can be more usefully recommended than Mr. Smart's Prose version, which faithfully reports the sense of the original in terms always neat, and pure, and often elegant.]

CHRISTOPHER SMART was born at Shipbourne, in Kent, April 11. 1722. The family of which he was descended had been long established in the county of Durham. His grandfather married a Miss Gilpin, of the family of the celebrated Bernard Gilpin, Rector of Houghton-le-Spring, 'the Apostle of the North.' His father was steward of the estates in Kent, of Lord Barnard, afterwards Earl of Darlington, and was possessed of an estate of 300l. a year, in the neighbourhood of Shipbourne. Having been intended for holy orders, he had a better taste for literature than is commonly found in country gentlemen; a taste which he transmitted to his son.

In the beginning of his life he was of a very delicate constitution, having been born earlier than the natural period; and his body being too feeble to permit his indulging freely in childish amusements, his mind had leisure to exercise and expand its powers.

He discovered a very early taste for poetry; and proved when he was only four years old, by an extemporary effusion, that even then he had a relish for verse, and an ear for numbers.

He received the rudiments of his education at Maidstone school, from which he was removed when he was eleven years old, on the death of his father, which happened at that time, and sent by his mother to Durham, that he might have the advantages of a good school, change of air, to strengthen a weakly frame, and the notice and protection of his father's relations.

He did not continue without distinction at Durham school, the master of which, at that time, was the Rev. Mr. Dongworth, an Etonian, and a man of eminent learning and abilities. His addiction to metre was then such, that several of his school-fellows have confessed their obligations to him for their first successful essays in Latin versification.

The Ode to Ethelinda, was written at the age of thirteen; and the Latin translation of the ballad, when Fanny Blooming Fair, at sixteen.

As his father had been steward to Lord Barnard, he was very cordially received at Raby Castle, when absent, during the holidays, from school. In this noble family he was introduced to the acquaintance of the late Duchess of Cleveland, who discerned and patronized his talents. She allowed him forty pounds a year, till her death. In the Ode to Lord Barnard, he alludes beautifully to his literary habits, and to the splendour of his connections at this early period of his life.

Can I forget fair Raby's towers,
How awful and how great:—
Where me, even me, an infant bard,
Cleveland and Hope indulgent heard, &c.

He was removed from Durham school to the university of Cambridge, when he was seventeen; being admitted of Pembroke Hall, Oct. 30 1739.

Though the favourite studies of this seat of learning were not congenial with his mind, yet his classical attainments, and poetical powers were so eminent, as to attract the notice of persons not very strongly prejudiced in favour of such accomplishments. Such was the fame of his genius, and such the vivacity of his disposition, that his company was very earnestly solicited; and to suppress or withhold our talents, when the display of them is repaid by admiration, is commonly too great an effort for human prudence.

While he was the pride of Cambridge, and the chief poetical ornament of that university, he ruined himself by returning the tavern-treats of strangers, who had invited him as a wit, and an extraordinary personage, in order to boast of his acquaintance.

This social spirit of retaliation quickly involved him in habits and expenses, of which he felt the consequences during the rest of his life.

His allowance from home was scanty; for as his father had died suddenly, and in embarrassed circumstances, his mother had been compelled to sell the largest part of the family estate at considerable loss.

His chief dependence was the assistance he derived from his college, and from the Duchess of Cleveland's bounty. Many distinguished characters now living, were, notwithstanding of his intimate acquaintance; and it appears by the Latin invitation of his friend Mr. Saunders, of King's College, to supper, that he knew how to relish the 'feast of reason.'

At this early period of his life he was not more remarkable for his learning than his humour, of which many examples, like the following, are still remembered by his academical acquaintance. The three beads of the university being men of unusual bulk, he is said to have characterised them in this extemporary spondiac.

Pingua tergeminorum abdomina bedellorum.

In 1740-1, he wrote his first Tripos Poem, Datur Mundorum Pluralitas, which was succeeded in the following years by Materies Gaudet vi Inertiae, and Mutua Oscitationum Propagatio solvi potest Mechanice. These verses have more system and design than is generally found in the compositions of young academics; and it is some argument of their being well approved, that they were all thought worthy of a translation into English by Fawkes, the ingenious translator of 'Theocritus,' 'Anacreon,' 'Bion,' 'Moschus,' 'Musæus,' and 'Apollonius Rhodius.'

He was encouraged by the commendations of his friends to offer himself a candidate for an university scholarship. The yearly value of these appointments is barely 20l.; but the election is open to the whole university, under the degree of Master of Arts; and as the electors are of approved learning, and fix their choice after the strictest scrutiny, the honour of obtaining a scholarship is considerable.

It has been said, that upon this occasion, he translated Pope's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day;' but the conjecture is rendered improbable by the length and labour of the composition. But that a scholar equal to such a work, in an impartial classical examination, should surpass his competitors, is no matter of surprise.

His extraordinary success in this ode, induced him to turn his mind to the translation of the 'Essay on Man;' and he seems to have written to Pope for his approbation; who, in his answer, advises him to undertake the 'Essay on Criticism.'

'I would not,' Pope writes him, 'give you the trouble of translating the whole 'Essay;' the two first epistles are already well done; and if you try, I could wish it were on the last, which is less abstracted, and more easily falls into poetry and common place. I believe the 'Essay on Criticism' will, in general, be more agreeable both to a young writer, and to the generality of readers. I ought to take this opportunity of acknowledging the Latin translation of my ode, which you sent me, and in which, I could see little or nothing to alter, it is so exact. Believe me equally desirous of doing you any service, and afraid of engaging you in an art so little profitable, though so well deserving, as good poetry.'

It does not appear that he bestowed any farther notice on his translator, excepting that he received him once very civilly at his house at Twickenham; and Smart seems to have been induced by his suggestion, to undertake and finish the Latin Translation of the Essay on Criticism; with much praise from the learned, but without either profit or popularity.

In 1743, he was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and was elected Fellow of Pembroke Hall, July 3, 1745; and took the degree of Master of Arts, 1747.

In 1747, he wrote a comedy, called 'A Trip to Cambridge; or, the Grateful Fair,' which was acted by the students of the university, in Pembroke College Hall; the parlour of which made the green-room. Of this mock-play, no remains have yet been found, but a few of the songs, and the 'Soliloquy of the Princess Periwinkle,' containing his well-known simile of the Collier, the Barber, and the Brickdust-man, preserved in the Old Woman's Magazine. The prologue is printed in the fourth volume of the 'Poetical Calendar.'

About this time, he wrote several Fables and Essays, for The Student, or, Oxford and Cambridge Miscellany, a periodical work of considerable reputation, in which many of the wits of both the universities displayed their talents. The papers were published in 2 vols. 8vo. 1748.

In 1750, he became candidate for Mr. Seaton's reward, arising from the rent of his Kissing-bury estate, left by him to the University of Cambridge, to be annually adjudged by the Vice-Chancellor, the Master of Clare-Hall, and the Greek Professor for the time being, to the author, being a Master of Arts, of the best poem on 'one or other of the attributes of the Supreme Being, till the subjects is exhausted; and afterwards on death, judgment, heaven, hell purity of heart, &c. or whatever else may be judged by them to be most conducive to the honour of the Supreme Being, and recommendation of virtue.'

Mr. Seaton's will, dated Oct. 8, 1738, having been disputed by his relations, a law suit commenced between them and the university; which terminating in favour of the latter, the first subject given out was The Eternity of the Supreme Being, in which Smart had the preference; and for five years, four of which were in succession, the prize was disposed in his favour, for his poetical essays On the Eternity of the Supreme Being, 1750; On the Immensity of the Supreme Being, 1751; On the Omniscience of the Supreme Being, 1752; On the Power of the Supreme Being, 1753; On the Goodness of the Supreme Being, 1755. The value of the prize was then about 30l.

In these poems on the Divine Attributes, confessedly the most finished of his works, confidence in genius, and aversion to the labour of correction, sometimes prevailed over better consideration. The poem On the Divine Goodness, which was written in London, he so long delayed to undertake, that there was barely opportunity to write it upon paper, and to send it to Cambridge, by the most expeditious conveyance, within the time limited for receiving the compositions.

The decisions of the Cambridge judges were, in every instance, confirmed by the approbation of the periodical critics; they admired the vein of pious poetry, which ran through his prize poems: they were diffuse in the praise of his genius, though they freely censured his carelessness and inaccuracy; and they continued their approbation of his compositions, till fanaticism (always fatal to just thinking), distorted his ideas, and confined their applause to the talents of his better day.

While he was advancing his reputation as a poet, his extravagance involving him in debt with vintners, and college cooks, occasioned his fellowship to be sequestered, and obliged him to leave the university.

In 1752, he quitted college, and soon after relinquished his fellowship, on his marriage with Miss Anna Maria Carnan, the daughter by a former husband of Mary, the wife of the late Mr. John Newbery, 'the philanthropic bookseller, in St. Paul's church-yard.'

As he had relinquished his fellowship without engaging in any of the professions, he seems to have trusted for his future maintenance to his powers as an author. But he had either over-rated his own abilities and perseverance, or the favour of the public.

Though Mr. Newbery, to whom he was now allied, was himself a man of genius, and a liberal patron of genius in others, yet the difficulties that had perplexed him at Cambridge, pursued him to London; to which the expense of a family was superadded. Such was his thoughtlessness, that he has often invited company to dinner, where no means appeared of providing a meal for his family.

Subsisting in London as a writer for bread, his manner of life neither augmented his personal importance, nor that of his productions. Never nice in his person, in his taste, nor in his acquaintance; he lost his dignity, his time, and his peace of mind. The profits of the publications in which he engaged, were dissipated by a total neglect of economy. While the works of his more prudent contemporaries, Gray, and Mason, always polished at leisure, with critical care, and solicitude, were received as favours, and read with reverence; his compositions appeared good, bad, and indifferent, before the dread tribunal of the public, 'with all their imperfections on their head.'

He enjoyed, while thus engaged in the metropolis, the familiar acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, Dr. James, Dr. Hawkesworth, Goldsmith, and Garrick, and indeed of most who were then celebrated for genius, or for learning.

In 1752, he published a collection of Poems on Several Occasions, in one volume, 4to; which he dedicated to the Earl of Middlesex, 'not as a writer, or a scholar,' but as 'a man of Kent.' The Hop Garden, and Judgment of Midas, first appeared in this collection.

Having received some provocation from Dr. Hill, afterwards Sir John Hill, in 'The Inspector,' and in a paper called 'The Impertinent,' he took a severe revenge in another 'Dunciad,' which he called after the name of his hero, The Hilliad. The First Book of this mock-epic, with notes variorum, was published in 1752, 4to; and was followed by an anonymous performance, called 'The Smartiad, a satire occasioned by the Hilliad,' folio, 1753.

In his quarrel with Dr. Hill, he could obtain no fame, though he greatly augmented the ridicule of that extraordinary personage; but time settles the disputes of authors and men of talents, in the most upright manner. Dr. Hill seems to have been insensible to the learning and genius of Smart; and Smart only saw Dr. Hill in the light of a quack, and a coxcomb: but posterity not only allows the originality, the invention, and the poetical talents of Smart, but also regards Dr. Hill as an able botanist; and though his nostrums and panaceas are now exploded, his voluminous works in natural history have advanced towards fame, with nearly as much rapidity as his empirical productions have descended towards oblivion.

To the Old Woman's Magazine, published about this time, Mr. Newbery and himself were the chief, if not the only contributors. He translated also for Mr. Newbery, The Works of Horace into English Prose, in 2 vols, 12mo, 1756; a task which he has very ably executed, but of that kind which will never be praised in proportion to the labour. By few and apposite terms, he has expressed the sentiments of Horace, in an idiom, not placed very near the Roman, in the table of grammatical affinities. Of an author not among the least difficult, he is at once an accurate, and an elegant translator. He shows the humblest attention to the language of the original, and an absolute command over his own.

In 1756, he entered into an engagement with Gardener the bookseller, to furnish papers monthly, in conjunction with Mr. Rolt, a town writer, for The Universal Visitor. Smart and his coadjutor were to divide one-third of the profits of the work; they, on their part, signing an agreement, 'not to write for ninety-nine years to come in any other publication.' Never, surely, did rapacious avarice dictate a more unreasonable bargain, or submissive poverty place itself in a more humiliating situation.

'I wrote for some months in The Visitor,' says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, 'for poor Smart, while he was mad; not then knowing the terms on which he was engaged to write, and thinking I was doing him good. I hoped his wits would soon return to him. Mine returned to me, and I wrote in The Visitor no longer.'

All the essays in The Universal Visitor, marked with two asterisks, have been ascribed to Dr.

Johnson; but Mr. Boswell is confident, from internal evidence, that of these, neither 'The Life of Chaucer,' 'Reflections on the State of Portugal,' nor an 'Essay on Architecture,' were written by him.

He was likewise engaged with Mr. Rolt, in a theatrical enterprise at the Hay-Market theatre, called Mother Midnight's Entertainment. This was first undertaken at the expense of Mr. Newbery, and was afterwards carried on with some degree of success.

In 1750, he published 'A Hymn to the Supreme Being, on Recovery from a dangerous Fit of Illness, which he dedicated to Dr. James. 'If it be meritorious,' says the dedication, 'to have invented medicines for the cure of distempers, either overlooked or disregarded by all your predecessors, millions yet unborn will celebrate the man who wrote the 'Medicinal Dictionary,' and invented the 'Fever Powder.'

Though his fortune, as well as constitution, required the utmost care, he was equally negligent in the management of both; and his various and repeated embarrassment, acting upon an imagination uncommonly fervid, produced temporary alienations of mind; which at last were attended with paroxysms so violent and continued, as to render confinement necessary.

'My poor friend Smart,' says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, 'showed the disturbance of his mind, by falling upon his knees, and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place.' Talking of his confinement to Dr. Burney, 'it seems,' he observed, 'as if his mind had ceased to struggle with the disease; for he grows fat upon it.' Upon Dr. Burney suggesting, 'that, perhaps, it may be from want of exercise,' he added, 'he has partly as much exercise as he used to have; for he digs in the garden. Indeed, before his confinement, he used for exercise to walk to the ale-house; but he was carried back again. I did not think he ought to be shut up. His infirmities were not noxious to society. He insisted on people praying with him; and I'd as lief pray with Kit. Smart as any one else. Another charge was, that he did not love clean linen; and I have no passion for it.'

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

No. III.

Extract of a letter from the agents of two Bristol privateers, to General Burt, dated St. Christophers, 16th November, 1779.

A few days ago, an armed brigantine, belonging to, and having a commission from the Congress of America, was chased into the island of Saba by the brigantine Tryall, in company with the Robust, both letters of marque, belonging to Bristol, and two small privateers of Antigua, where they all anchored. The governor of Saba, apprehensive that the privateers intended to cut out the American brig, told the captain of the Greyhound, that he could not protect her, but he certainly would claim her, if she should be taken away. About nine o'clock of the day they went into Saba, captain Saunders, of the Tryall, boarded the American brig; but before this was done, the captain and as many of the crew landed, as they had time to effect it, and carried on shore arms and ammunition, when they possessed themselves of the fort, from which they fired on the privateers, and damaged the Tryall very much, before either of them returned the fire. There being little wind, captain Saunders had one man killed and several wounded, before he got his own brig and the American out of reach of the guns from the shore. The want of wind obliged the privateers to fire upon the fort, to save themselves.—The brig is brought into Nevis by the Tryall.

WILLIAM MATTHEW BURT.

Extract of a letter from the Attorney-General to General Burt, dated St. Christophers, 25th November, 1779.

The American brigantine cut out of Saba, has been carried to Nevis, and I understand she is already libelled. However, your excellency may be assured, I shall lose no time in the communication of your letter to the judge of the court of vice-admiralty in that island.

(A true copy.)

WILLIAM MATTHEW BURT.

Copy of his excellency General Burt's letter, to the honourable Peter Runnel, captain commandant of the island of St. Eustatius, in answer to demand made of the continental brigantine Eagle that was cut of Saba, viz.

Antigua, 30th Nov. 1779.

SIR,

I had the honour of receiving your letter of the 15th ult. on the 23d, and that of the 22d, by Mr. Ravene, yesterday, the 29th, respecting an American brigantine, carried from the road of Saba by some British armed vessels. Immediately on the receipt of your letter of the 15th, I wrote to his majesty's attorney-general at St. Kitts, not to suffer any process to be commenced against that brigantine, until he should hear further from me, as I had, from a letter received from you, reason to believe, she would be claimed.—Inclosed is an extract of his letter on that subject, dated November 23th, 1779.

It is impossible for me to avoid mentioning to your honour, the very harsh, and, in my opinion, unmerited epithets and censure, which you are pleased frequently to lavish on the conduct and dispositions of the subjects of the king my master, and more particularly on the present occasion; and also the rapidity which they were laid in your letter of the 15th, where you acknowledge, you had only wrote to inquire into this matter: I must wish, censure and condemnation, had not passed prior to your inquiry and investigation; you would then probably have found, that this crew of the American privateer carried on shore at Saba, arms and ammunition, possessed themselves of the fort at Saba, and fired on the British vessels before they offered any act of hostility. I have now inclosed your honour an extract of a letter, dated in St. Christophers, November 16th, on this subject, from the agents for the two Bristol privateers.

I have directed this matter to be inquired into, and should the fact turn out as it has been represented to me, you will then see that a Dutch fort was seized, supplied with ammunition, and fought by the rebellious American subjects of the king my master, and his loyal subjects killed. How far this is consistent with the treaties of amity and ancient friendship, subsisting between our masters, they will determine. Should my information prove true, it will be my duty to lay it before the king my master.

It is my inclination, not only to render the purest and most rapid justice to the subjects of their high mightinesses, but also to discountenance and punish, to the utmost of my power, every real breach of treaty and insult offered to the ports or flag of their high mightinesses. It is also my duty, to pursue the same line of conduct to the king my master and his subjects. Acting on these principles, from the information I have received, it is incumbent on me to inquire into this matter, before I hastily determine or pursue any steps.

Your honour is pleased to acquaint me with the fixed determination of their high mighti-nesses, no longer to consider any vessel or other objects, carried by violence out of the havens, ports, bays, or roads, within the limits of their dominions and protection, as the subjects of any question or adjudication by the British court of vice-admiralty, is established by the law of our land, on the purest and wisest principles, has the sanction of my king's approbation, and he has neither vested me with any absolute power over it, nor has my sovereign given me any instructions or directions to supersede the authority of that court.

Greatly as I respect their high mightinesses, yet it is not in my power to act in conformity with their determination.

Your honour will perceive by the attorney-general's letter, that this brigantine was libelled therefore within the jurisdiction of the court of vice-admiralty, and out of mine: I shall, however, lay this matter before his majesty's law-officers, for their advice and direction. I am happy to find your honour charmed with the manner in which I have conducted the various parts of business, which have arose between us: I shall be truly sorry, should any thing interrupt it. A more favourable opinion of my fellow-subjects of their conduct and dispositions, which neither tend to barbarity nor absurdity, will give pleasure to him, who is, with great esteem, your honour's most obedient

humble servant,

WILLIAM MATTHEW BURT.

No. IV.

The honourable the commercial committee of congress
for the United States of America.
St. Eustatia, 14th December, 1779.

SIRS,

Annexed is the triplicate of what we had the pleasure of writing you the 30th ultimo, by captain Taylor, duplicate thereof was forwarded by captain Doane, which now beg leave to confirm. Since then the truce has returned from Antigua, but the answer from General Burt by no means to satisfaction; without paying any regard to the proofs and depositions sent him from a number of the burghers and inhabitants of Saba, he pretends, the Americans out of captain Ashmead's brig took possession of the fort first, and fired upon the privateers, that occasioned their cutting out and taking away the Eagle—that, as the vessel was libelled in the court of vice-admiralty at Nevis, he had directed the attorney-general to inquire into the nature of the case, taking the evidences of both parties, that they might be laid before him, and at the same time, that he had ordered the proceedings of the admiralty to be stopped against her; however, at the expiration of the monition, issued to bring her to trial, she was condemned and adjudged to be good and lawful prize to the captors. This puts us to a very great inconveniency, as we have not been able to meet with another vessel, to send you in the articles ordered, that you stand so much in need of, but you may depend, we shall continue on the look-out, and should we not be able to purchase one, there will be no other remedy, than to embrace all the freight we can meet with, in order to accomplish your wishes. This vessel just getting under way, obliges us to conclude, with the utmost respect and esteem.

St. Eustatia, 18th January, 1780.

The honourable the commercial committee of congress
for the United States of America.

SIRS,

Herewith we have the pleasure of handing you triplicate of what was wrote you under date the 14th ultimo, which now beg leave to confirm. Since then have not been favoured with a line from you. This, we hope, will be delivered you by captain Ashmead, who goes passenger in a brig under command of captain Stocker; he has with him a copy of his protest, and we are in hopes of getting from Saba copy of the depositions, proving the outrage committed at that island, in cutting out of the road and carrying away his vessel, which was forwarded General Burt, but the governor being unwell then, has prevented their being sent up; as soon as they can be had from thence, they shall be forwarded to you.

We procured from the honourable Pieter Runnels, captain commandant of this island, copy of General Burt's letter, with the inclosures, that was forwarded to him, in answer to his demanding restitution of the Eagle, which we inclose you for your satisfaction, that you may perceive how vague and frivolous it was altogether. Since this affair happened, Governor de Græff has arrived here from Holland, and on his resuming the command of the government of this island, we waited on him, and represented the case to him, but as it happened while he was absent, would not take cognizance of it, as he thinks it a duty incumbent on Mr. Runnels, to represent it in the strongest colours to their high mightinesses, not only cutting out the vessel in such outrageous manner, but the indignity that was shewn to the Dutch flag.

Finding the vessel was condemned in the court of vice-admiralty at Nevis, and that she and the cargo would be totally lost, we endeavoured to purchase her in again, and we offered as high as two thousand pounds sterling for her, but the captors had determined within themselves to fit her out as a privateer, that prevented our getting her again. Notwithstanding both captain Ashmead and ourselves, have used every endeavour to procure a suitable one for you, to send in the articles wanted, it has not been in our power to get one among all the islands. Several small ones have been offered, but they would come so exorbitantly high; could not think of paying from ten to eleven thousand pounds for one, that would only carry about sixty hogsheads of tobacco, without being calculated for any kind of defence, which he will more particularly inform you of.

We could have wished to have shipped you some goods by this conveyance, but, while we were looking out to purchase a vessel, captain Stocker engaged all the freight he could take; however, we have engaged room in the ship Independence, under command of captain Truxton, (who, it is probable, will sail in company with this,) bound to Philadelphia, for a parcel of linen, fit for soldiers' shirts, which we shall hand you invoice and bill of lading by him.

We find, very few vessels will take any heavy freight, as they, in general, run upon the article of salt. We endeavoured to ship you some powder by these vessels, but not one of them would take any thing of it. We informed you some time ago, of our having purchased about one hundred barrels of that article on your account, but none having arrived here since, has caused so great a scarcity, we have been obliged to spare part of it to trading American vessels, as there was not a cask to be purchased in the place, so that there is not above six thousand pounds remaining, and twenty-two sheets of lead: if any more arrives, we shall engross it immediately; and would recommend your sending some vessel this way as soon as possible, to carry on these supplies, as we see little prospect of getting them to you otherways, and we shall in the meantime continue on look out, to procure all the other articles you have ordered.

Captain Ashmead has advanced some of his people a little money, that were taken sick here and in a very low state of health, which he will give you an account of, as we supplied him with it for that purpose.

It is really distressing to see the number of people that perishes for want of common subsistence among these islands: many are now confined in the different gaols among the different English islands, that are obliged to be satisfied with a half allowance to support nature, and those that are relieved, are hardly able to help themselves: subscriptions have frequently been set on foot, to raise something for their support, and those, who are charitably inclined, have readily contributed for their relief, for they are real objects of charity and want.

Our market continues much the same as I last advised you, only Virginia tobacco appears more in demand for the British market. The best quality would readily now command from nine to ten pence, and goes off very slow at that; other articles are noted in the inclosed price current, for your government, to which beg to be referred.

Believe us to be, with infinite esteem, Sirs, your most obedient humble servants,
CURSON & GOUVERNEUR.

No. V.

Saba, January 20th, 1780.

We, the underwritten deponents, declare and testify, that, on Saturday, the 13th day of November last, a certain brigantine, coming from the continent of America, (and so, as the deponents are informed, was called the Eagle, and commanded by one captain John Ashmead,) was chased by a British ship into the road of Saba, under the reach of the cannons, where the said brigantine was obliged to come to anchor in the morning, between the hours of nine and ten. About twelve o'clock the same day, came likewise in the road of Saba to anchor, the above-mentioned ship, a British brig, and a schooner; the same day, about four o'clock in the afternoon, came three other British vessels, viz. two sloops and one schooner, all armed vessels to an anchor; the same evening, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, went out of our road two of the above-mentioned vessels, viz. a sloop and a schooner; but the other vessels remained peaceable at anchor all that day, till the hours of eight and nine o'clock in the evening, when the brig Tryall, commanded by a captain Saunders, made an attack upon the American brig. There was heard in the road, by captain Thomas Winfield, a terrible outcry, and as if it were a cutting with cutlasses, by which means there was an alarm fired, and we appeared in the battery and hailed the English privateer brig, and asked, what hostilities they were using, and we received no answer; which time we found they were in reality cutting out the American brig, which obliged us to fire upon the English privateer brig several great guns and muskets; the English privateer-ship first returned the fire upon the shore, the ship and brig fired several broad-sides against the shore, then they were joined by one sloop and a schooner, who all four kept a continual fire against the shore, and as long as our ammunition lasted, that we had in the battery.

This we do declare to be the truth, the day and date within mentioned.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Lucerne, October 13.

MY DEAR SIR,

There are two ways of going from Zug to Lucerne, one by the common direct road, the other by the two lakes, which is far the more interesting. My companion preferred the former and I the latter. I immediately after dinner left him to proceed in the carriage, and hired a boat and two men to carry me the whole length of the lake to a small village called Immesen, about a league and a half distant. This little voyage was really a charming one, and I enjoyed it exceedingly. I landed at the foot of mount Rigi, which is the highest mountain of this canton, and proceeded on foot across the strip of land which separates the lake of Zug from the lake of Lucerne, to the small village of Kurnacht. About half way, on the road side, stands a small chapel, erected on the spot where Zessler was shot by William Tell. I of course stopped a few minutes to reflect upon this important occurrence, which produced the Swiss confederacy, and to smile at the curious painting over the door representing the transaction.

The instant I arrived at Kurnacht, I hired another boat, and embarked for this place on the Lake of the four cantons (a Lucerne) about half an hour before sun-set.

I suppose the impression this excursion made upon me will never be lost. A delicious calm seemed to pervade every thing. The glaciers of Uri and of Unterwald crowded upon my view on one side; at my back rose the majestic mount Rigi, and before me the enormous mount Pilate, whose rocky summit was streaked with snow, which it is free from in summer. Before the sun set, the splendor of the landscape was great, but, as it sunk behind the mountains, the effect was grand and sublime, the tops being gilded with its departing rays, while a thin vapour, of an azure hue, stole up their sides, and creeping into all the little bays, formed by the promontories, which shoot into the lake, softened the distances. The bases of these mountains, on one side, terminated in the lake, and offered no landing place; but the Lucerne shore, which slopes upward from the water, was covered with villas, cottages, villages, and steeples, with fields of the brightest verdure, skirted with beautiful trees, and chequered by their long shadows. Tho' solitary, I felt happy, and listened with a pensive kind of pleasure to the songs and cries of the herdmen bringing home their cattle, and the dashing of the oars, which were heard in every direction. Two fine boys were my rowers, and whenever they passed a boat they would scream out as if transported with the joy-inspiring scenes around them. We borrowed an oar from one of the barques, with which I rowed all the way to this place, a distance of more than a league. Night did not destroy our pleasures, for the reflections of the lights of Lucerne, and the neighbouring seats, by the calm surface of the lake presented a sight infinitely pleasing. I arrived about seven o'clock, and surprised my companion very much, who came only a short time before me, and did not expect me till the next day.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

On the authority of a respectable eastern print, it is stated, that the honourable RUFUS KING, and Gen. C. C. PINCKNEY, are to be supported by the Federalists at the next election, to the highest offices in the GENERAL government. The choice is well advised, and we sanguinely hope, that the event of the election will be propitious to the elevation of the above gentlemen, who will ADORN AND DEFEND OUR COUNTRY; and, redeeming the national character from disgrace and degradation, will cause every GENUINE American to rejoice under a government, strong without despotism, and pacific, though not pusillanimous.

A volume of poems, written by P. Bayloy, jun. Esq. has just appeared in London. The author, who displays good sense, spirit and genius, thus speaks of the author of the Baviad and Mæviad:

Still lives the bard, he at whose dreaded name
All fools are pale, or hang the head in shame,
Still Gifford lives, whose many-sounding strain
Scattered the wifings of Bell's tinkling train.
Where, Gifford, is the promise that thy hand
Should strike a nobler, more reluctant band,
Why sleep thy bolts, why in thy quiver lie
The shafts that bid the brood of folly die!
Ripe for thy song, the vices of the age
Demand the fullest ardour of thy rage.
Then wake thou from thy languid slumber start,
Prepare thy bow; make ready the keen dart;
Strengthen thine arm, then on religion's foe,
On guilt and villainy inflict the blow;
Nor put thou off thy wrath, till on the ground
Vice groans, laid low, and pierc'd with many a wound.

Mr. Gifford's motto to one of his satirical and classical imitations was

Nunc in ovilia,
Mox in reluctantes dracones.

The following lines, from an old English writer, will cause the reader to smile.

I never yet could see that face
Which had no dart for me,
From fifteen years to fifty's pace,
They all victorious be.

Colour or shape, good limbs or face,
Goodness, or wit, in all I find,
In motion or in speech, a grace,
If a' fail, yet 'tis womankind.

If tall, the name of proper slays;
If fair, she's pleasant as the light,
If low, her prettiness does please,
If black, what lover loves not night?

The fat, like plenty, fills my heart,
The lean with love makes me so too;
If straight, her body's Cupid's dart,
To me, if crooked, 'tis his bow.

Thus, with unwearied wings, I flee
Through all Love's garden and his fields;
And, like the wise, industrious bee,
No weed but honey to me yields.

TO —

Away! those arts no more shall hold me,
Hence with your insidious charms;
Those smiles are vain, that cease to fold me
In the twinings of thy arms.

And once more hop'st thou to detain me,
By thy blandishments and wiles;
Ah no! deceit no more shall chain me,
Feigned tears and studied smiles.

Believ'st thou I will wear a fetter,
Forg'd by folly and by pride?
Fair mischief! learn to know me better;
Be thy spells on others tried.

Yet once again could I believe thee,
Once more wouldst thou wrong my love,
And shall my heart again receive thee,
Perfidy once more to prove?

Yet now, when thus compell'd to leave thee,
Let me from reproach refrain;
Not in our parting would I grieve thee,
Or inflict a moment's pain.

And if those tears be true, my anguish
Soon shall mote more than equal thine,
And if those eyes sincerely languish,
Tears unfeign'd shall flow from mine.

EPITAPH.

Here lyeth, wrapt in clay,
The body of William Wray,
I have no more to say.

Another.

Here lyeth a midwife brought to bed,
Deliveress, delivered,
Her body being churched here,
Her soul gives thanks in yonder sphere.

Another, in Wrexham church.

Here lie interr'd beneath these stones,
The beard, the flesh, and eke the bones,
Of Wrexham's clerk, old David Jones.

On Mr. Foote.

Here lies one Foot, whose death may thousands save,
For Death has now one Foot within the grave.

In St. Alban's, Wood-street.

Hic jacet Tom Shorthose,
Sine tombe, sine sheets, sine riches,
Qui vixit sine gowne,
Sine cloak, sine shirt, sine breeches.

In Cirencester Church-Yard.

Our bodies are like shoes, which off we cast,
Physic their cobler is, and Death their last.

On Mrs. Oldfield, the celebrated actress.

When Oldfield dies, e'en Congreve's laurels fade,
And this we own, in justice to her shade,
The first bad act Oldfield ever made.

In removing part of the altar in Wolverhampton church, in the year 1789, there appeared to be a part of a monument with the following inscription in very legible characters. The date 1690.

Here lie the bones
Of Joseph Jones,
Who eat whilst he was able
But once o'erfed
He dropt down dead,
And fell beneath the table,

When from the tomb,
To meet his doom,
He rises amid sinners,
Since he must dwell
In heaven or hell,
Take him....which gives best dinners.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor will be thankful for the loan of 'An Essay towards fixing the true standards of wit and humour, raillery, satire, and ridicule: to which is added an analysis of the characters of an humourist, Sir John Falstaff, Sir Roger de Coverly, and Don Quixote, by Corbyn Morris, Esq. 8vo. London, 1744.'

The Editor having, at the request of his publisher, undertaken to superintend a new edition of the Plays of SHAKESPEARE, is particularly desirous of inspecting the first folio edition. This is probably very scarce, and may be found only in the cabinet of some distant virtuoso. But the owner of this rare book will be very gratefully thanked, if the Editor can have permission to consult it, for a short season.

'Climenole' is the frequent topic of conversation and praise. It is wished by the Editor and his friends, that this ingenious author may write much, and publish often.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

On returning a lady's handkerchief, after detaining it from her some days in summer.

Go, 'kerchief, to thy mistress back again,
Pure, and unsullied as her virgin breast;
That throne where all the milder virtues reign,
That seat of each exterior charm possess'd.

When no soft breezes agitate the air,
And sultry suns exhale the balmy dew,
Then fearless wander o'er her forehead fair,
Her vermil cheeks, and lips of coral hue.

No artificial blush shalt thou displace,
Nor stain thy surface with cosmetic art;
Nature's own roses bloom upon her face:
And nature's genuine feeling warms her heart.

Oh, may that heart ne'er heave with painful sighs,
Nor thou thy gentle service e'er employ
To wipe the tear from those 'love-darting eyes,'
Except the tear of o'erflowing joy.

PARMEGIANO.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The subsequent celebrated dialogue, one of Scaliger's two favourite odes, has been translated and imitated oftener, perhaps, than any other ode in Horace. Of the English translations, Atterbury's, which is to be found in Duncombe's Horace, and in Nichol's Miscellaneous Poems, has always been deemed the best; though we cannot agree, continues Mr. Boscawen, with the writer of Atterbury's life, in the Biographia Britannica, that it is equal in smoothness and elegance to the original. Dr. Francis has copied about a third of this, but without any acknowledgment. The chief merit of the original, besides the harmony of numbers and elegance of expression, which it undoubtedly possesses, is its being the only instance we have of the carmen amatum, or alternate dialogue, in lyric poetry, though it is frequent in pastorals. In these dialogues we are told two rules were observed by the ancients: 1st, the person, who spoke last, always answered in the same number and kind of verses; and 2dly, he either contradicted what had been said before, or improved upon it. Both these rules, the critics remark, have been observed by Horace with great nicety.]

Horace.

Whilst folded in thy snow-white arms,
No dearer youth thy love possess,
Whilst I alone enjoy'd thy charms,
Not Persia's monarch reign'd so blest.

Lydia.

Whilst you no other love desir'd,
Nor Chloe's rose o'er Lydia's fame,
I bloom'd more honour'd, more admir'd,
Than Ilia's high, illustrious name.

Horace.

O'er my fond heart now Chloe reigns,
Skill'd in sweet song and music's power;
For whom I'd brave Death's keenest pains,
To save her at that fatal hour.

Lydia.

The gentle Calais warms my heart
With mutual love, with equal truth,
Twice would I brave Death's fiercest dart,
So fate would spare the dearer youth.

Horace.

What, if returning love controul
Our hearts, no more inclin'd to roam?
Drive beauteous Chloe from my soul?
My Lydia find her long lost home?

Lydia.

Though that lov'd youth be form'd to please,
Bright as the star, that gilds the sky,

You, light as cork, and wild as seas,
With you I'd joy to live, with you I'd die.

[This spirited poem, says its spirited translator, is an eulogy on the rose. Anacreon is always rich in the praises of that flower.

The rose seems to have a magic power over the mind of the poets. Hafiz perpetually calls for its odour, and Waller has addressed this blushing beauty of the garden in one of the finest songs ever inspired by gallantry,

Go, lovely rose,
Tell her that wastes her time and me, &c.]

Buds of roses, virgin flowers,
Cull'd from Cupid's balmy bowers,
In the bowl of Bacchus steep,
Till with crimson drops they weep!
Twine the rose, the garland twine,
Every leaf distilling wine;
Drink and smile, and learn to think
That we were born to smile and drink.
Rose! thou art the sweetest flower
That ever drank the amber shower;
Rose, thou art the fondest child
Of dimpled spring the wood-nymph wild!
Even the gods, who walk the sky,
Are amorous of thy scented sigh.
Cupid too, in Paphian shades,
His hair with rosy fillets braids,
When with the blushing, naked graces,
The wanton winding dance he traces.
Then bring me showers of roses, bring,
And shed them round me while I sing
Great Bacchus! in thy hallow'd shade,
With some celestial glowing maid,
While gales of roses round me rise,
In perfume, sweeten'd by her sighs,
I'll bite and twine in airy dance,
Commingle soul in every glance.

[The following address to a lady is from one of the most original poets of the present day. He remembers Tibullus, and he has at once the courtly grace of Waller, and the simplicity of Shenstone.]

When casting many a look behind,
I leave the friends I cherish here,
Perchance some other friends to find,
But surely finding none so dear.

Haply, the little simple stage,
Which votive thus I've trac'd for thee.

But oh! in pity, let not those Whose hearts are not of gentle mould,
Let not the eye, that seldom flows
With feeling tears, my song behold.

For, trust me, they who never melt,
With pity, never melt with love,
And they will frown at all I've felt,
And all my loving lays reprove.

But if, perhaps, some gentler mind,
Which rather loves to praise than blame,
Should in my page an interest find,
And linger kindly on my name;

Tell him—or, oh! if gentler still,
By female lips my name be blest,
Ah! where do all affections thrill
So sweetly as in woman's breast.

Tell her, that he, whose loving themes
Her eye indulgent wanders o'er,
Could sometimes wake from idle dreams,
And bolder flights of fancy soar;

* Mr. Moore remarks, that the Greek epithet given to the nymph is literally full bloomed; if this was really Anacreon's taste, the heaven of Mahomet would suit him in every particular. See Koran, cap. 72.

That glory oft would claim the lay,
And friendship oft his numbers move,
But whisper then, that, sooth to say,
His sweetest song was given to love.

[At a very early period of life, says the learned Dr. Gregory, * I amused myself with translating some of the odes of Horace into English verse. I publish a translation of the third ode of the fourth book, because I think it gives the sense of the original more completely than Francis's version. The Editor cannot refrain adding that he owes it to the genius of an amiable and accomplished scholar, as well as to literature itself, to declare that he does not remember ever to have read a version more in the Horatian spirit.]

He, on whose early natal hour
Thou, queen of verse, hast sweetly smil'd,
Breath'd all thy fascinating power,
And mark'd him for thy favourite child:

He emulates no victor's place,
Nor mixes in the Isthmian games;
Nor, in the arduous chariot race,
The Achaian trophies anxious claims.

He ne'er, adorn'd with conquering bays,
And the proud pomp of baneful war,
Shall catch the vagrant voice of praise
While captive kings surround his car.

But where the fertile Tiber glides,
To secret shades shall oft retire,
And there shall charm the listening tides,
And tune the soft Aeolian lyre.

Thy noblest sons, imperial Rome,
Assign to me the laureat crown;
And envy now, abash'd and dumb,
Nor dares to speak, nor dares to frown:

Oh, goddess of the vocal shell,
Whose power can sway both earth and sea,
Can the mute fishes teach to excel
The dying cygne's melody:

To thee, sweet Muse, I owe this fame,
That ere I pleas'd, the gift is thine,
That, as I pass, fond crowds exclaim,
The Roman bard, the man divine!*

[Few species of the gayer style of poetry are more easy than the Rondeau of the French bards. From the Portuguese of Camoens an Irish nobleman has lately translated the following Rondeau.]

Just like Love is yonder rose,
Heavenly fragrance round it throws,
Yet tear its dewy leaves disclose,
And in the mid'at of briars it blows
Just like love.

Cull'd to bloom upon the breast,
Since rough thorns the stem invest,
They must be gather'd with the rest,
And with it to the heart be prest
Just like love.

And when rude hands the twin buds sever,
They die—and they shall blossom never.
Yet the thorns be sharp as ever,
Just like love.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 86.

They pick up wit as pigeons pick up pease,
In eager haste the jest and bottle seize.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

THE picture of a certain club-room, which lately appeared in your paper, from one of its members, is no doubt a true copy; but I confess my imagination had formed a more flattering one for them, than has been given by their Quixote. It has generally been supposed that this was a literary club, although anonymous, and we have thought ourselves indebted to this combination of wits for the flashes which illumine our public prints; but to find, from their own confession, that they are merely punsters, is a disappointment, although the brilliant display which appears in the communication of their fellow-member, shews they have by hard study become considerable adepts in the art. The rage for punning, which pervades our city like an epidemic, certainly must have had its origin in this society. This assertion will no doubt be disputed by the lovers of controversy, and friends to importation, who may be bold enough to aver that we have received the infection from Europe; nay swear they have seen the very letter which brought the first pun from England, and will wish to give to every species of our wit a foreign extraction. But as I am more favourably inclined to American genius I think it very possible, indeed it cannot admit of a doubt, that every individual pun given us by Quixote was really and truly manufactured by the united efforts of the punning-club. Indeed some of them have so strong a foundation, from existing and concurring circumstances, as to put it past a doubt. Their attendant genius certainly counted upon a pun, when he placed ten plates upon the stove, and I dare say this is not the first good thing he has put before them, for which he has had as little credit. The club's punning in Latin is highly approved; as they will not be generally understood we cannot say they are bad ones. Classicus no doubt will give the ladies a liberal translation of the best of them. A dead language appears particularly appropriate, where the professed object of the meeting is to kill time, and when the last words of the members cannot always be expressed in plain English. The Anonymous club have now got a name for wit, but as clubs do not always think it incumbent to support their names, we will not exact too strict an adherence to them. "I said the Beef-steak club often feast upon oyst." no doubt the Thinking club talked loudly, the Ugly club, I'll answer for it, often called themselves pretty boys; so the Punning club may sometimes be at their wits-end, and be obliged to have recourse to philosophy, law, politics, the belles-lettres, &c. &c. and, for the sake of a little small talk, condescend to converse on the ladies. I should be sorry this was ever to be the case; but, as it may happen, I will make a proposal, which will obviate the necessity of those gentlemen racking their inventions to grind out puns for the public, as their time may possibly be more usefully employed.

A lady of considerable talents, but of decayed fortune, who wishes to get into some genteel and reputable way of business, proposes setting up a punning ware-house, as the most fashionable article that can be dealt in. She will immediately commence business, provided the punning club will permit her to engross the wholesale line. It will be her study to furnish, at the shortest notice, the most fashionable variety of puns, conundrums, bon-mots, and inuendos, suitable for dinners, suppers, tea-parties, or clubs. Ladies and gentlemen, before they go into company, by calling at Mrs. Readywit's, can furnish themselves with witty conceits at a small expense, and without trouble. She will always have on hand a number of hints for those persons who may wish to add something of their own. And for young gentlemen just from college, and others, who may wish to shew their learning, she will have a number of puns in Latin and Greek. In this last branch, Mrs. Readywit has the promised assistance of a neighbouring schoolmaster, who will make the children compose them by way of exercises. I hope, Mr. Saunter, you will recommend the above plan to all punsters, and more particularly to the punning club, on whose patronage she chiefly relies.

BEATRICE.

Any of the puns, &c. &c. after being used for a day or an evening, may be returned and exchanged for others, unless so disfigured by the retailing as to unfit them for further use. No witticisms upon tongues or raisins, to be had at Mrs. Readywit's shop, they being long since cried down as flat, stale, and unprofitable.

CLIMENOLE.

A REVIEW, POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

NO. 7.

Memorabilia democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science. Interspersed with anecdotes, characters and speeches of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats, by Slaveslap Kiddnap, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651.

Washington, printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

The opinion expressed by Mr. Kiddnap of Catiline, and the comparison he draws between his eloquence and that of the vice-president, have occasioned great surprise as well as jealousy in vulgar democrats. Their minds have so long been accustomed to associate the name of the hero of Sallust with depravity and crime, that they seem startled at the boldness with which our author enters upon his vindication. The friends of Mr. Burr are also, as my letters from New-York assure me, in a state of high irritation. They are convinced that Mr. Kiddnap intended, by connecting Catiline so closely with the vice-president, to sanction an infamous appellation, which the Federalists have long attempted to attach to him. And as they well know the intimacy which has long subsisted between Mr. Kiddnap and Mr. Jefferson, their suspicions have grown very violent; so that some of them have condescended to suggest that the present publication is not altogether without his knowledge, but that it is a part of that system, which the particular friends of the president have devised to make the present coolness, which subsists between those great men, perpetual. I owe it, however, to Mr. Kiddnap to declare, that this last suspicion is wholly without foundation; and if any of his, or of Mr. Jefferson's friends, deem the refutation of so ungenerous an aspersion important, I am ready to make my deposition before any magistrate, they may appoint, that both those gentlemen are guiltless of this publication. In making this offer, I know, that I sacrifice my party feelings, which are abundantly gratified at the dissensions which spring up among democratic leaders; but the interests of truth are, to me, more dear than the interests of any party whatsoever. Besides, if Mr. Burr's friends will look back to the time, when, as I have stated in a former number, it was the intention of our author that his work should come before the public, they will be satisfied that he could have had no intention to sow dissension between those two great men, and their respective adherents; inasmuch as it was committed to the press, in the winter succeeding the election of Mr. Jefferson, in the very honeymoon of his and Mr. Burr's union, long before the coquetry of the Clitonians had made any impression on the susceptible heart of our cooing chief consul.

As to those democrats, who find it difficult to divest themselves of prejudices formed in childhood against certain men of antiquity, who have been unfortunate advocates of democratic principles, they will be disappointed, if they expect Mr. Kiddnap will, on account of their squeamishness, sacrifice the great interests of democracy, or fail in that duty, which, as a faithful historian, he owes to the great characters who have taken the lead in his party in former times, as well as to those of the present day. Mr. Kiddnap has enrolled himself in the service of democracy, not, as most of his party do, to serve a turn, or to gratify a passion, but from principle, research, and affection. He has chosen his system after long deliberation; after painful investigation of ancient and modern history, and after careful collation and comparison of the genius of democracy, in all ages and nations. Like the philosophers and statesmen of antiquity, he has travelled, in search of truth, into other countries, and made just remarks on the experience of his native land. "I have seen," as he exclaims, exultingly, in one part of the work under review, "I have seen the triumphs of democracy, on the scaffolds of Paris, and on the plains of St. Domingo. I have seen the tempestuous sea of liberty, now tossing its proud waves to the skies, and hurling defiance toward the throne of the almighty; now sinking into its native abyss, and opening to view its unhallowed caverns, the dark abodes of filth and falsehood, and rapine and wretchedness. I have seen thousands of headless human trunks, the victims of its fury, buoyant on its billow, black with their clotted gore. I have seen death in all its sanguinary forms, stalk on the whirlwind which upturned the foundations of this tumultuous deep. From the top of Monticello, by the side of the great Jefferson, I have watched its wild uproar, while we philosophised together on its sublime horrors. There, safe from the surge, in company with Gallatin and Randolph, Munroe and Nicholson, at the command of our speculative host, I have quaffed the high crowned cup to this exhilarating toast,—TO THE TEMPESTUOUS SEA OF LIBERTY.....MAY IT NEVER BE CALM."

Before such a mind, as this extract shows Mr. Kiddnap to possess, rich in the stores of ancient and modern learning, and steelled by long intimacy with democratic engines and processes, the prejudices of education, which terrify weak democrats, vanish. The principles of human conduct, the sources of human passions, lie open to the view of such an understanding. It sees the real distinctions on which the classifications of character depend. If democratic virtues perish upon a gibbet, it dares to rescue their fame from the ignominy of the law. Aloof from the circumstances which, in the estimation of common minds, disgrace their subject, it makes the rack extend the fame as well as the limbs of the sufferer, uses the axe of justice, which terminated the career of a democrat, to raise a monument to his memory, and slipping the halter from the neck forms it into an immortal wreath for the temples of oppressed humanity. But the views and opinions of Mr. Kiddnap will be better learnt from his work, than from any general description. In the chapter, from which so large an extract was taken, in our last number, he thus expresses himself.

"Let no man think that I have dwelt thus at large on the character of this eminent man, (Catineline), from ostentatious motives; to display my reading, or my classical acquaintance. My sole view, in this examination, has been to rescue past patriots from infamy, and to give a lesson to those of the present day. The great republicans of antiquity, among whom Catineline has, undoubtedly, the first rank, did labour with no less assiduity and sincerity than those, now at the head of affairs, in the United States, to place all things on a democratic basis. They had, also, for a short time, in their respective countries, the exclusive management of public affairs. In talents they were certainly not inferior to the great men of our party, now on the stage. In opportunities for permanent establishment of the democratic system, they were often much more highly favoured than those of our day have ever been. The ends, at which they aimed, were as definite, and the means as wisely devised and as boldly executed, as any we have imagined. Indeed, in the machinery to which they and we have been obliged to resort, in order to move that inert mass, with which all democrats are condemned to operate, there is a similarity, which, allowing only for the inevitable variation of political fashions, at different periods of society, amounts to identity. Yet the fates of these great patriotic democrats of antiquity are familiarly known to us all. Their lives were for the most part terminated miserably, in ignominy or contempt. Their memories are, even at this day, the hacknied topic of scorn for every pedant, and of detestation, to every school boy. I pray, therefore, my democratic friends to reflect on these facts, and now, while the means are in their hands, to prepare their cause to appear before the bar of posterity; for they may be assured, that, if they let slip the present opportunity, their names and conduct will be arraigned, by some aristocratic Sallust, before that dreadful tribunal, at a time when they will neither be able to find an advocate, nor to pay one, should he be found. In which case, I see nothing to hinder our Jeffersons and Burrs, our Gallatins, Livingstons, and Lions, from being placed, in the estimation of future ages, on the same floor of democratic citizenship with Cethegus and Catiline, Spartacus, Anthony and Thersites. These are not the terrors of a disordered fancy. I have brought the affinity of the fates and characters of these ancient and modern patriots to a philosophic test, which, howsoever much vulgar minds may be disposed to ridicule it, has produced, in mine, the most alarming conviction. In my youth I was educated in the science of judicial astrology, and I have, in the course of a long life, had frequent occasions to be convinced of the importance and truth of that ancient, but neglected, science. To satisfy myself, therefore, of the fortunes of men, in whom I have such a great personal and political interest, I cast a horoscope of the positions of the planets and constellations at the seasons of the respective natiivities of the great men above named. My surprise was scarcely less than my alarm at the result. For I found that on the birth-day of our illustrious Jefferson, as also on that of Cethegus, the Hare and the Hydra were in present conjunction. When Burr and when Catiline came into the world, the Fox and the Serpent were ascendant. At the moment of the birth of Gallatin and Spartacus the heart of the Scorpion was in right aspect with the Wolf's jaw. The canis and ursa major were in hostile aspect on the nativity of Thersites and Matthew Lion; while on that of chancellor Livingston and Mark Anthony there was a singular coincidence of the star in the eye of the bull, with that under the goat's tail."

As the following paragraph closes that chapter, from which I have extracted so largely in this and the preceding number, and as it both displays the extensive acquaintance of Mr. Kiddnap with the great men of his party in the United States, and also introduces to our knowledge a new democratic leader, whose name, as far as I can learn, has never been mentioned, either in print or in private conversation, on this side of the Delaware. I shall present it to the public without other apology or remark.

"From what I have written, in this chapter, on the fates of ancient democrats, and the use I have been obliged to make of ancient authors, I fear lest a conclusion be drawn in favour of Grecian and Roman learning. I, therefore, beg leave to declare my perfect coincidence in opinion with the great men, now at the head of affairs, in the United States, who, from a laudable jealousy for their own times, are unremitting in their labours to bring Greek and Roman science into universal neglect and disrepute. I had the misfortune to have that kind of knowledge whipped into me when I was a boy, and since I have become a man, although I have taken great pains, I could never get wholly rid of it. But certainly it never was, and never can be, of material advantage to a republican. A man is not a whit the better patriot for possessing it. He can neither turn a paragraph in the Aurora, nor raise a clap in the state-house yard, with any more ease, for having at command those accomplishments, as they are called. I was confirmed in these opinions, on a tour which I made to the eastern states, in the year 1795, to encourage the opposition to Mr. Jay's treaty. At that time I formed an acquaintance with a Mr. ———, a most worthy democrat, of great renown in the city of Boston and its suburbs, although his fame has not yet, through various cross incidents, reached us here in Virginia. I found this gentleman destitute not only of Greek and Roman learning, but also of every thing which goes, generally, in the world, by the name of knowledge and science. Yet was he a most true and inveterate democrat; and at that time, in conversations, and since by various communications, I have received, from him, great comfort and light, in my researches into the origin and genius of democracy. An assistance which I can never forget, and for which I thus publicly tender him the homage of my thankful acknowledgments. This gentleman assured me that he never could be prevailed upon to carry his pursuit of the Latin language farther than the story of the frogs in Æsop's Fables. 'When I found,' said he, 'those animals enjoying a true democracy, and altogether as capable, as appears by their history, to choose a moderator, and maintain an orderly and rational discussion, as was at a Boston town-meeting, yet, setting so little value on their natural rights and liberties, and having so small a regard to the freedom of their posterity, as to demand a king from Jupiter, I threw down the book in disgust, and would never attempt the Latin language afterwards. As to the Greek,' continued he, 'my parents prohibited my master from instructing me in it, before I had attained two thirds of the alphabet. For being naturally of a weak constitution, and of a foreboding imagination, I was thrown into convulsions at the sight of the letter ρ (Π) which looked so much like a gallows as to excite in my mind the most gloomy apprehensions. To this machine I have always had a strange aversion; which is one reason, among many others, for my anxiety that the guillotine should come into general use, in the United States, and supersede the necessity of an instrument for which I have an unaccountable antipathy.' I adduce this as a strong argument to show the little value of what the Federalists call learning and science are to a democratic leader. For this gentleman, as a letter, under his own hand, dated the tenth of October last (1801) declares, has been more than seventeen years busied principally in the glorious work of propagating democracy. 'During this period,' he writes, 'I have published three thousand three hundred and forty regular essays in the Chronicle; besides paragraphs and jeu d'esprits innumerable. I have also delivered two hundred and ninety-one set speeches in Faneuil-Hall, none of them less than forty minutes in length, in addition to which I have made an infinity of motions and replies of which I have no account. By my writings, in the Chronicle, I did much to excite that noble exertion of democratic energies, which the Federalists denominate Shay's rebellion. Of what service I was to the whisky insurrections, Mr. Gallatin, with whom I have frequently communicated on that subject, well knows. And now, Mr. Kiddnap, I beg you to assure Mr. Jefferson, that I am ready, at a moment's warning, to turn my hand to any like work, he may cut out for me.' How all these noble exertions in the cause of democratic liberty, could have been made by one ignorant of all the languages except the vernacular, and deficient in grammar, logic, divinity, mathematics, metaphysics, &c. by one whom the world would call grogg."

rate, I shall, hereafter, explain in my forty-sixth chapter, which treats of arts and sciences strictly democratic. In these Mr. — is a monument of proficiency. He is also far advanced toward that all important perception, which is, indeed, the key-stone of all democratic acquirements, in these states, and which consists in a deep sense of the utter deficiency of mental power in the north, and in an entire acquiescence in the ascendancy of southern genius. On this account Mr. — has become the butt of Federal malignity, which, among other insults, has travestied to his disadvantage four celebrated lines, in the following manner:

Virginian patriots, when this tool they saw,
Chanting their triumphs o'er our union's law,
Admir'd such fawning in an eastern shape,
And patted — as we pat an ape.

Notwithstanding such abuse, this ardent republican is steady to his belief, that, with a very few exceptions, there is neither sense nor genius above the fortieth degree of North latitude. But, I must return from this digression. Of all the ancient writers, Homer is the most celebrated, and he is, also, in a republican government, the most dangerous; insomuch that it well becomes the wisdom of our national legislature to devise ways and means to drive his writings out of the country. For it is very apparent, that the whole aim of that writer is, to elevate the monarchic and aristocratic interests, on the ruin of the democratic. Hence the reason is very obvious, why his admirers, almost exclusively, belong to the two first classes, while persons in the last, have scarcely any relish for them. I recollect but one town meeting, in the whole Iliad, and, on that occasion, the poet takes care to suffer the democratic orator to be treated, in the most brutal manner. I beg the attention of my readers to the story. The Greeks, it seems, had been nine long years, besieging Troy, to gratify the ambition, or the lust, of eight or ten kings and aristocrats. As the chance of success was every day diminishing, the republicans of the army began very naturally and properly to murmur. In other words, they looked on the bloody Arena, spread before them, with commiseration and with no other wish than to see it closed. Being in this humour, they were called together, by their leader, and, on a hint given, that they might go home, if they would, all the republicans began to pack up their baggage and run for the ships. At this moment, one Ulysses, a great aristocrat, and a king, into the bargain, flew out upon them and rated the unhappy citizen soldiers, in a manner so abusive and scandalous, that Homer ought to have been ashamed to relate it; as also ought Mr. Pope, to translate it; in the following bold and coarse language.

"But, if a clamorous, vile plebeian rose,
Him, with reproof, he check'd, or tam'd with blows.
Be still, thou slave, and to thy betters yield,
Unknown, alike, in council and in field!
Ye Gods! what dastards would our host command,
Swept to the war, the lumber of a land!
Be silent, wretch, and think not here allow'd
That worst of tyrants, an usurping crowd."

I desire to know in what work, or language, there was ever made a more cruel attack on the democratic interest, than is contained in the above remarkable extract. But the malignity of the poet is not satiated by railing in this general way. He descends to individuals. Thersites, a great man in the camp, a faithful leader of the republicans, and a famous town meeting orator, had the boldness to take this opportunity to address his fellow-citizens of the Greek army, and to tell them some wholesome and popular truths, in a style of manly eloquence, which would do honour to the most distinguished democrat, in the United States. This so enraged Ulysses, that he sprung upon him, like a tyger, and, after abundance of abuse, was guilty of as aggravated an assault and battery, as was ever committed, before, or since.

"He said, and, cowering, as the dastard bends,
The weighty sceptre on his back descends,
On the round bunch, the bloody tumours rise,
The tears spring, starting from his haggard eyes,
Trembling he sat, and, sunk in abject fears,
From his vile visage, wip'd the scalding tears."

I have often read the above account to my friend Matthew Lion. This amiable man could never refrain from crying, in company, with Thersites, on the occasion, as, he assured me, the story brought to his mind the most melancholy recollections. And he has often expressed his regret, that there was no such thing, at hand, in the Grecian camp, as a pair of tongs, with which the democratic hero might have defended himself, on such an emergency. My friend Mr. —, above named, is of a different opinion. He thinks that the democrat behaved with great prudence, in taking the beating so patiently; as he has no doubt, but that Thersites 'took the law of Ulysses, and, on account of his peaceable demeanour recovered proportionably heavy damages. These, in the estimation of my friend, are a full equivalent for any beating whatsoever.'

From the general inattention to the strict meaning of words, has, I think, arisen, the abuse which is lavished on Jealousy. We read in the works of those who best understood the nature of the passions which agitate the human frame, of 'savage jealousy' of 'green-eyed jealousy,' and numerous similar epithets, which in my humble opinion are not merited.

If I were asked to define this passion I should describe it, as that disagreeable sensation which arises in the mind, at seeing the favours of those whom we love bestowed on others. This is the meaning which Shakspeare attached to it when one of his lovers talks of a 'kind of godly jealousy' which he intreats his mistress to call 'a virtuous sin.' This is the interpretation which has always appeared to me as the proper one—and in this sense surely jealousy cannot be condemned.

Henry was young and generous. He was ever anxious to serve his friends, and he was not implacable toward his enemies. In his principles he was bigotted to those of what is termed the Old School. From his youth he had shewn little inclination to participate in the boisterous pastime of his class-mates. Providence had bestowed on him a keen taste for literature and an unconquerable ambition of literary eminence. He was intimate with most of the English poets, and he was not ignorant of many of those of Rome. The constant perusal of these authors had rendered him extremely susceptible of the 'soft passion of love.' From them he derived an exalted opinion of the female sex. To that sex he thought we were indebted for all the felicity which we enjoy on this side the eternal bourne. After having thought himself in love with many, he at length denied that he loved one. He was introduced to Lucy at a friend's house and soon entered into a conversation with her. He was delighted to find that the charms of her mind were no less fascinating than those of her person—and that he had met with one female who possessed other topics of conversation than the weather, and the approaching nuptials.

Henry absolutely shut up his books to pay her a visit on the following morning, and he thought he discovered new sources of admiration in her character. The progress of love is in all hearts not tardy; in that of Henry it was particularly rapid. Cupid could describe his victory with as much brevity as Cæsar. Henry saw—he admired—he loved, and he soon asked Lucy's permission to add—he married.

Henry's books were now entirely neglected, and his pen only endited verses to his mistress. He did not, however hang them on trees, 'in witness of his love,' but he gave them to the muse who inspired them, and was rewarded with her approbation. But love is full of jealousy, and every smile of Lucy's which was not directed to him created a new rival. This disposition is to be regretted as unfortunate, but it ought not to be stigmatized as savage. It proceeded, in him not from a distrust of her integrity, but from an uxoriousness of her favour. It was a godly sin.

Lucy coquetted with others at first merely to teize her lover. But what is frequently affected may become a habit, and that habit may be too convenient to be put off. After a long and unwearied perseverance to obtain her affection, in which he had once succeeded, Henry experienced the bitter mortification of seeing Lucy, to whose improvement he had devoted many anxious hours—the wife of another. He had nurtured the bud, and the blossom was plucked from him.

Henry's love though easy to be inflamed, was difficult to be extinguished.

He still lives, but his heart is broken. In the interstices of business, he meditates on his blasted prospects, and curses the fickleness of women.

Let me intreat those who may feel any interest in this imperfect sketch, if they be females to promise with sincerity and to act with consistency. Let them be told that the greatest favour they can confer on one who aspires to their hand, is to deny it peremptorily or to grant it absolutely. If they be men let them rely on such promises with confidence, and not too easily resign themselves to distrust.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF CHRISTOPHER SMART.

[Concluded.]

In this melancholy state, his family (for he had now two children) must have been much embarrassed in their circumstances, but for the kind friendship and assistance of Mr. Newbery.

Many others of his friends were likewise forward in their services; particularly Dr. Johnson and Sir John Hussey Delaval, Bart, the present Lord Delaval, to whom he was private tutor in college; and who showed him, upon various occasions, particular instances of his regard.

It was at the request of Sir John, that he wrote a Prologue and Epilogue to the Tragedy of Othello, acted at Drury-Lane, by several persons of quality, 1751; the parts of Iago and Othello being filled by Sir John, and his brother Sir Francis Blake Delaval.

Mrs. Smart seems to have made an attempt at this period, to settle in Dublin, with a view to provide for her family, by engaging in business; probably without success. 'I wish,' Dr Johnson writes her 'it was in my power to make Ireland please you better; and whatever is in my power, you may always command. I shall be glad to hear from you the history of your management, whether you have a house or a shop, and what companions you have found.'

After an interval of little more than two years, he appeared to be pretty well restored; and was accordingly set at liberty; but his mind had received a shock, from which it never entirely recovered. He took a pleasant lodging in the neighbourhood of St. James's Park; conducting his affairs, for some time, with sufficient prudence. He was maintained partly by his literary compositions, and partly by the generosity of his friends, receiving, among other benefactions, fifty pounds a year from the Treasury.

Of the state of his mind, and of his modes of life at this period, Dr. Hawkesworth gives the following account, in a letter to Mrs. Hunter, one of his sisters.

'I have, since my being in town, called on my old friend, and seen him. He received me with an ardour of kindness natural to the sensibility of his temper; and all were soon seated together by his fire-side. I perceived upon his table a quarto book, in which he had been writing, a prayer-book, and a Horace. After the first compliments, I said I had been at Margate, had seen his mother and his sister, who expressed great kindness for him, and made me promise to come and see him. To this he made no reply; nor did he make any inquiry after those I mentioned. He did not even mention the place, nor ask me any question about it, or what carried me thither. After some pause, and some indifferent chat, I returned to the subject, and said, that Mr. Hunter and you would be very glad to see him in Kent. To this he replied very quick, 'I cannot afford to be idle.' I said he might employ his mind as well in the country as in town; at which he only shook his head, and I entirely changed the subject. Upon my asking him when we should see the Psalms, he said they were going to press immediately: as to his other undertakings, I found he had completed a translation of Phædrus, in verse, for Doddsley, at a certain price; and that he is now busy in translating all Horace into verse; which he sometimes thinks of publishing on his own account, and sometimes of contracting for it with a bookseller. I advised him to the latter; and he then told me he was in treaty about it, and believed it would be a bargain. He told me, his principal motive for translating Horace into verse, was to supersede the prose translation, which he did for Newbery; which, he said, would hurt his memory. He intends, however, to review that translation, and print it at the foot of the page in his poetical version; which he proposes to print in quarto, with the Latin, both in verse and prose, on the opposite page. He told me he once had thoughts of publishing it by subscription; but as he had troubled his friends already, he was unwilling to do it again; and had been persuaded to publish it in numbers; which, though I rather dissuaded him, seemed at last to be the prevailing bent of his mind. He read me some of it: it is very clever; and his own poetical fire sparkles in it very frequently, yet, upon the whole, it will scarcely take place of Francis's; and therefore, if it is not adopted as a school book, which, perhaps, may be the case, it will turn to little account. Upon mentioning his prose translation, I saw his countenance kindle; and, snatching up the book, 'what,' says he, 'do you think I had for this?' I said I could not tell. 'Why,' says he with great indignation, 'thirteen pounds.' I expressed very great astonishment, which he seemed to think he should increase, by adding—'but I gave a receipt for a hundred.' My astonishment was now over; and I found that he received only thirteen pounds, because the rest had been advanced for his family. This was a tender point; and I found means immediately to divert him from it. He is with very decent people, in a house most delightfully situated, with a terrace that overlooks St. James's Park, and a door into it. He was going to dine with an old friend of my own, Mr. Richard Dalton, who has an appointment in the King's Library; and if I had not been particularly engaged, I would have dined with him. He had lately received a very genteel letter from Dr. Lowth, and it is by no means considered in any light, that his company as a gentleman, a scholar, and a genius, is less desirable.'

In 1759, Garrick made him an offer of a free benefit at Drury-Lane theatre, which his friends did not permit him to refuse. Upon this occasion, Garrick's farce of 'The Guardian' was acted for the first time, in which he himself performed the principal character.

In 1763, he published 'A Song to David, written during his confinement; when he was denied the use of pen, ink, and paper, and was obliged to indent his lines with the end of a key upon the wainscot.'

The same year he published two small quarto pamphlets, intitled, Poems, and Poems on Several Occasions; and, the year following, Hannah, an Oratorio, 4to; and an Ode to the Earl of Northumberland, on his being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with some other pieces, 4to.

In 1765, he published A New version of the Psalms, 4to, and A Poetical Translation of the Fables of Phædrus, 12mo, which were followed by The Parables, in familiar verse, 12mo. 1768.

In the course of a few years, his economy forsook him, and he was confined for debt in the King's-Bench prison; the rules of which he afterwards obtained, by the kindness of his brother-in-law, Mr. Thomas Carnan. He appears to have been in extreme distress, by a letter of his to the Rev. Mr. Jackson, not long before his death. 'Being upon the recovery from a fit of illness, and having nothing to eat, I beg you to lend me two or three shillings, which (God willing) I will return, with many thanks, in two or three days.'

At length, after suffering the accumulated miseries of poverty, disease, and insanity, he died of a disorder in his liver, May 21, 1771, in the 49th year of his age; leaving behind him two daughters, who, with his widow, are settled at Reading, in Berkshire; and by their prudent management of a business transferred to them by Mr. Newbery, are in good circumstances.

A select collection of his Poems, consisting of his Prize Poems, Odes, Sonnets, and Fables, Latin and English Translations, together with many original Compositions, not included in the Quarto Edition, to which is prefixed an Account of his Life, &c. was printed at Reading, by Smart and Cowslade, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1791. Besides the Poetical Translations, which he published in his life-time, and the Works of Horace in English Metre, which he proposed to print in 4to; the pieces omitted in this edition of his works, are chiefly the Song to David, and some pieces in the two small 4to. pamphlets, which were written after his confinement, and bear, for the most part, melancholy proofs of the recent estrangement of his mind.

Among the pieces not included in the 4to. edition, or published separately, are, An Ode on a Young Lady's Birth-day; Imitation of Horace on taking a Bachelor's Degree; Ode on St. Cecilia's Day; Reason and Imagination, a Fable; New Version of the 148th Psalm; Ode to Lord Barnard; Ode to Lady Harriot; the Sweets of Evening; Ode to a Virginia Nightingale; Epigram from Martial; On a Lady throwing Snow Balls at her Lover, from Petronius Ascanius; and Sixteen Fables, chiefly written for The Student and The Old Woman's Magazine.

It is not easy to account for the works of Smart not being included in the collection of the 'Works of the English Poets,' whose lives were written by Dr. Johnson, who had a friendship for him. Dr. Johnson, however, frequently declared, that the choice of poets, for whose works he had agreed to write biographical prefaces, was not his own; and yet, as he condescended to ask a place for Pomfret, Yalden, Blackmore, and Watts, poor Smart had an equal claim to his notice, from piety, and from genius; but, perhaps the copy-right of his scattered productions could not be easily settled. Even his best pieces, though admirable, have not often been honoured with a place in favourite Collections of Poems. He was too poor an author to bestow, and perhaps he had no ambition to share in the triumph of those who, for the most part, write pieces more for their own diversion than for that of the public. His way of living, from hand to mouth, depending always on the product of his desultory pen, appropriated to no regular nor profitable purpose, and on the liberality of his friends, was not likely to procure for him that public respect from his contemporaries, which sweetens a man's life, however useless it may be to his works after his death.

The works of Smart, reprinted from the edition 1791, with some additions and corrections are now received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry. The Song to David is highly worthy of republication; and was recommended by the present writer to be inserted in this edition; but a copy could not be obtained for that purpose. The slight defects, and singularities of this neglected performance, are amply compensated by a grandeur, a majesty of thought, and a happiness of expression, in several of the stanzas.

The character of this unfortunate poet, compounded like that of all human beings, of good qualities and of defects, may be easily collected from this account of his life. Of his domestic manners and petty habits, a few peculiarities remain to be mentioned.

Though he was a very diligent student while he was at Cambridge, he was also extremely fond of exercise, and of walking in particular; at which times it was his custom to pursue his meditations. A fellow student remembers a path worn by his constant treading on the pavement, under the cloisters of his college. Like Milton and Gray, he had his moments propitious to invention; and has been frequently known to rise suddenly from his bed, that he might fix by writing those delightful ideas which floated before his fancy in the visions of the night.

His piety was exemplary, and fervent. In composing his religious poems, he was frequently so impressed with the sentiments of devotion, as to write particular passages on his knees.

He was friendly, affectionate, and liberal to excess; so as often to give that to others, of which he was in the utmost want himself. He was also particularly engaging in conversation, when his first shyness was worn away, which he had in common with literary men; but in a very remarkable degree. Having undertaken to introduce his wife to Lord Darlington, he had no sooner mentioned her name to his Lordship, than he retreated suddenly, as if stricken with a panic, from the room, and from the house, leaving her to follow overwhelmed with confusion.

During the far greater part of his life, he was wholly inattentive to economy; and by this negligence lost his fortune, and then his credit. The civilities shown him by persons greatly his superiors in rank and character, either induced him to expect mines of wealth from the exertion of his talents, or encouraged him to think himself exempted from attention to common obligations.

But his chief fault, from which most of his other faults proceeded, was his deviations from the rules of sobriety; of which the early use of cordials, in the infirm state of his childhood and his youth, might, perhaps, be one cause, and is the only extenuation.

As a poet, his genius has never been questioned by those who censured his carelessness, and commiserated the unhappy vacillation of his mind. He is sometimes not only greatly irregular, but irregularly great. His errors are those of a bold and daring spirit, which bravely hazards, what a vulgar mind could never suggest. Shakspeare and Milton are sometimes wild and irregular; and it seems as if originality alone could try experiments. Accuracy is timid, and seeks for authority. Fowls of feeble wing seldom quit the ground, though at full liberty; while the eagle, unrestrained, soars into unknown regions.

He is a various, and original, but unequal writer. Every species of poetry, not even excepting the epic, has been attempted by him, and most of them with eminent success.

His fine poems on the Divine Attributes, are written with the sublimest energies of religion, and the true enthusiasm of poetry; and if he had written nothing else, these compositions alone would have given him a very distinguished rank among the writers of verse. Their faults, though numerous, are amply compensated by their beauties. Some of their defects may be fairly ascribed to redundancy of genius, and impatience of labour; others to fanaticism, generated, perhaps, by the grandeur of the subject; on which he strained his faculties, in trying to penetrate 'beyond the reach of human ken.'—but he never could mount 'to the height of his great argument.' Dr. Johnson, in speaking of sacred poetry, in his life of Waller, has admirably said, that 'whatever is great, desirable, or tremendous, is comprised in the name of the Supreme Being. Omnipotence cannot be exalted; infinity cannot be amplified; perfection cannot be improved.' Upon the whole, however, his prize poems are more accurate than the generality of his performances; which may be attributed to the deference he might feel from those persons who were to adjudge the prizes which he obtained.

Of his Odes it may be said, in general, that they are spirited and poetical. It will be difficult to find any other quality equally applicable to compositions very different from each other; and in many of which opposite characters occasionally predominate. He has followed the example of Horace, rather than that of the Grecian models; and of him he is, for the most part, a judicious imitator. Some of the shorter pieces are beautiful, and nearly perfect; but instances of an improper association of the grave and the ludicrous, sometimes occur, and he debases, by an impure admixture, what otherwise would have been gold of the standard value. The Ode to Idleness possesses the elegance of Sappho; and that to Ethelinda, the sprightliness of Anacreon. The Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, inferior only to the great model by Dryden, is dignified throughout, and breathes the true spirit of poetry. The Hymn to the Supreme Being, on Recovery from Sickness, is pious, animated, and pathetic. The Ode on Good-Nature is full of elegance, and that on Ill-Nature full of force. The Morning Piece is uniformly beautiful; the description of Labour is eminently happy.

Strong Labour got up—with his pipe in his mouth,
He stoutly strode over the dale, &c.

The lines were misprinted in the 4to edition.

Strong Labour got up with his pipe in his mouth,
And stoutly, &c.

The correction was advertised immediately after the publication of the first edition; but the blunder has been retained in the edition 1791. The poet did not mean to insinuate, that Labour had slept with his pipe in his mouth, which must have been the case, if he got up with it in that situation. In the Night-Piece, the images of Night, and her attendants, Stillness and Silence, are highly painted. The Noon-Piece is beautifully descriptive. The imitation of Horace, on taking a Bachelor's Degree, is spirited and pleasant. The Ode on the Birth-Day of a Beautiful Young Lady, is highly poetical: its chief blemish is the too frequent and affected use of alliteration. It was written on Miss Harriot Pratt of Durham, in Norfolk, a lady for whom Smart had entertained a long and unsuccessful passion; who was the subject also of the cramo ballad, and other verses among his poems. Of the rest, the odes On an Eagle confined in a Cage; To Lord Barnard; To Lady Harriot; To the Earl of Northumberland; To a Virginia Nightingale; The Sweets of Evening; New Version of the CXLVIIIth Psalm, deserve particular commendation.

On the Hop-Garden much commendation cannot justly be conferred; and the praise which is withheld from the poetry, will not be very cheerfully lavished on the instructions. But the roughness and the want of dignity in the blank verse, and the want of previous information on the art of which he treats, are to be ascribed, not to want of genius, but to want of diligence and care; for he never had patience nor application sufficient to bring a long work to any degree of perfection. There are, however, a great many truly poetical strokes in this Georgic, and whole pages that abound with beauty.

His mock heroic poem, the Hiliad, may afford entertainment to those who care little about the hero of the poem, or the subject of the quarrel. Compositions of this class, as they gratify malignity, are usually read with avidity on their first appearance; but, without uncommon merit, they quickly sink into oblivion. The spirit and loftiness of some of the lines, the happy imitations of the 'Dunciad,' and the wit and humour of the notes, deserve great praise; but the abuse is coarse, and the scurrility is a disgrace to the republic of letters.

His Judgment of Midas, a masque, or dramatic pastoral, is a classical and elegant performance. It is executed throughout in a masterly manner. It has none of those glaring inaccuracies which disgrace some of his other pieces. The description of Midas following Pan, is full of poetry, as well as spirit. The address of Timolus to the inanimate things about him, on the approach of the gods, has great dignity and propriety, as well as beauty. The first stanza of the song to Pan has great softness and great elegance. But dramatic pastorals, even if the generally interesting topic of love be superadded, will not greatly entertain without their proper embellishments, acting and music.

His Fables rank with the most agreeable metrical compositions of that kind in our language. His versification is less polished, and his apoloques, in general, are perhaps less correct than those of Gay or Moore; but in originality, in wit, and in humour, the preference seems due to Smart. They unite the grace and ease of Prior with the humour of Swift; and to these is superadded a very considerable portion of poetical spirit. The introductory lines of almost all the fables are singularly ingenious and happy; and in the course of each, the second line of most couplets generally presents us with an independent new idea. The best and most serious of these playful compositions is, doubtless, Care and Generosity. It is one of the most beautiful allegories that has ever been imagined. The Bag-Wig and the Tobacco Pipe, Madam and the Magpie, Reason and Imagination, The Herald and the Husbandman, deserve particular commendation. The Citizen and the Red Lion of Brentford, may be thought to transgress the limits of mythological probability; but a dialogue between a man and a painted board, may be forgiven for its humour. The Brocaded Gown and Linen Rag, contains liberal praises of his poetical contemporaries, Akenside, Collins, Gray, and Mason. The Pig is a very exact and beautiful translation of the same story in Phædrus. If in any instances the modern is surpassed by the most charming fabulist of antiquity, for which, perhaps, the Roman is not a little indebted to the superior force and conciseness of the language in which he wrote, in others the original is undoubtedly rivalled, if not excelled, and obtains at last a doubtful victory.

His Ballads, and Epigrams, &c. like his other productions, bear the stamp of originality, of wit, and of pleasantry. The Force of Innocence is more serious, and is an elegant application of the Integer Vitæ of Horace, to female virtue. Sweet William, The Lass with the Golden Locks, The Decision, Lovely Harriot, a cramo ballad, Jenny Gray, are generally known and admired. The epigrams of 'The Physician and the Monkey, Apollo and Daphne, are sprightly and elegant, and the imitations of Martial and Petronius Ascanius have considerable merit. In the Horatian Canons of Friendship, the sentiments of Horace, Lib. 1. Sat. 3. are successfully accommodated to recent facts and familiar images.

Though Smart, if placed like his friend Garrick in the picture, between Tragedy and Comedy, would more incline to the laughter-loving dame than the goddess of tears; some of his serious pieces, besides those on religious subjects, manifest and excite feeling in an eminent degree. The little poem 'On the Death of Mr. Newbery, after a lingering illness, must touch every reader of sensibility. In the Epitaph on the Rev. Mr. Reynolds, at St. Peter's, in the Isle of Thanet, the thoughts and the words in which they are clothed seem to breathe the true spirit of poetical pathos.

In the first rank of the elegant writers of Latin, among our English poets, Jonson, May, Crashaw, Cowley, Milton, Marvell, Addison, Gray, Warton, &c. Smart stands very high. His translation of Pope's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, is at once elegant and appropriate. He equals his original in the sublimest passages, except only the third stanza; and to the ballad and epigrammatic stanzas gives dignity and grace. The vulgar lines which describe the power of Styx over the enthralled Eurydice, and the superior power of music and of love, are translated with truth and beauty. It has been objected, and with some reason, to Smart's translation, that it exhibits a variety of metres unauthorized by any single example among the Latin poets. But had he, too timid to pursue the rapid flights and wild genius of his original, confined himself to the regular recurrence of the Roman stanza, his imitation would not have been exact, and probably would not have been interesting. The opinion of the public has fully justified the choice of Smart.

In his version of Pope's Essay on Criticism, he is a very diligent imitator of the epistolary style of Horace; and we shall find him carefully following the footsteps of his master, where we might otherwise have been disposed to suspect the purity of his language. To the labours of Smart those persons chiefly are indebted, who, being unacquainted with the English tongue, wish to see Pope's just rules of taste, embellished indeed with his powers of poetry, though appearing with less gloss and lustre through the medium of translation. In the famous lines intended as an echo to the sense, he has laboured through a very painful task, with considerable dexterity; and in the beautiful picture of the reign of Leo, of Vida, and of the Arts, no foreigner need regret that he is unacquainted with Pope.

His version of Milton's L'Allegro, exhibits the exquisite poetry and brilliant imagery of one of the first descriptive poems in the English language, in appropriate diction, and legitimate verse. The title of the poem, perhaps, might have been more happily expressed in Greek, than by 'Ο Παιωνιδας.

His translation of Fanny Blooming Fair, is a professed imitation of the manner of Vincent Bourne, and is not without a considerable portion of the perspicuity of contexture, facility, fluency, delicacy, simplicity, and elegance, which characterise the compositions of that amiable and ingenious poet; but it is inferior to his admirable version of Mallet's 'William and Margaret.'

His Tripos-poems may be justly considered as legitimate classical compositions. They are the production of a mind deeply tinged with the excellencies of ancient literature, and attentive both to the substantial parts, and to the decorations of poetry. In boldness of invention, felicity of description, and strength and elegance of diction, they are not surpassed by the hexametric poetry of Milton and Gray. The Temple of Dullness, in particular, exhibits such beauties of personification, as only the richest and most vivid imagination could supply. His personification of Stupor, Sophistica, Mathesis Microphile, and Atheia, abound with the most poetical imagery, delivered in language that will abide the test of criticism.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Hotel de Parliament d'Angleterre, Oct. 18, 1780.

Mr. Searle, of America, presents his respectful compliments to Mons. Dumas, he has the pleasure to send M. Dumas three packets from America, and one from Dr. Franklin, with which he had the honour of being charged. Mr. S. leaves the Hague to-morrow morning for Amsterdam.

Amsterdam, October 25, 1780.

MY DEAR SIR,

I received your very agreeable letters of the eighteenth and twenty-third, in the first of which you were so kind as to forward me a letter which gave me much pleasure, it was from M. de Vergennes. I observe what you say with respect to the P. amb. who is now in England, and we shall wait his return.

I wish, as you write in English, you would be so kind to continue your correspondence in that way, more especially as you write it with so great propriety and exactness; I am the more solicitous for this as I confess that I find myself at a loss to comprehend some parts of your last letter, which seems to be very interesting, and which is of a nature not to be communicated by me to a third person for explanation.

I have the pleasure to tell you that both Mr. A. and myself have this day received letters from Philadelphia, of the eighth of September, which are very pleasing, and I expect we shall in a few days be able to contradict, in great measure, the late publications in the English papers respecting the affair with Cornwallis and Gates. It appears that the English did certainly gain some advantage in that affair, but it was very trifling, both in itself and in its consequences.

I firmly believe that at best Cornwallis is at this moment closely besieged in Charlestown, and that we shall have pleasing accounts from that quarter very soon. We have also reason to believe, from our letters, that Clinton himself is not in a very agreeable situation at New-York at this moment, but a little time will discover more of the matter. I shall, you may be assured, make the earliest communications to you of any thing I may have authentic, that you may have an opportunity of conveying it to Monsieur le duc de la Vauguyon.

You will please to present my most humble respects to Madame and Mademoiselle, of whose extreme politeness I have a very lively sense.

I am, with very great respect,

Dear sir,

Your sincere and obedient

Friend and servant,

T. SEARLE.

Madrid, October 25, 1780.

DEAR SIR,

Your letter of the fourth instant gave me much pleasure, and contained important information for which I thank you. Before this reaches you, you must have received several from me, one of which must convince you that I must love the man to whom I open my heart. I think the uniformity of my conduct, since my first acquaintance with you, must put this out of doubt with you. My anxiety for your situation is lessened somewhat, when I reflect on your services and endeavours to serve the common cause. I heard of the sailing of Mr. Laurens when I wrote last, which, in some measure, occasioned my letter. That gentleman is taken, and I think Mr. A. will continue to occupy his place. Endeavour to be on good terms with that gentleman, I have heard well of his character in many respects, but I am told that he is not too well disposed to our Pater Patriæ, whom we both equally love and admire. I am fearful of the endeavours of England to intrigue with some of us, and although I am firmly persuaded of the strong attachment of all those who have been distinguished in the cause of independence, yet you know that an appearance of negotiation, to every part of which the countries of France and Spain are not privy, must be prejudicial to our interests. I therefore took the liberty of desiring you to be attentive to every circumstance of that nature. The emissary of the British court here is doing all in his power to disseminate jealousies. It is our business to render their intrigues, for this purpose, fruitless here and elsewhere. I had received from another quarter an item of what you communicated on the subject of the armed neutrality, but your letter was at once text and comment; and I hope that the commentator will not be deceived in the conclusions he hath drawn. The story in your gazette of the revolt in Peru is wholly discredited here. The only news I have to communicate is the appearance of M. Guichen's fleet in the vicinage of Cadiz, which is not yet public, but may be before twelve o'clock at night, when this letter will leave the post-house. The count d'Estaing hath been very active at Cadiz, and now never sets his foot on shore—a laudable example to his officers!

I beg you to take care of your health, that you may long continue a comfort to your family, to whom pray remember me in the kindest manner, and believe me always, my dear apostle,

Yours,

DISCIPULUS.

Write to me, under cover of Mess. D—ue's friends here, and wafer well your letters. I have just heard of the arrival of a schooner from Edenton at Cadiz, in thirty-two days, if I receive any intelligence before the post goes you shall have it.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE LAST EDITOR OF SHAKSPEARE.

To gratify the curiosity of that portion of the American public, who are solicitous to know the character and pretensions of ISAAC REED, ESQ. who, during the last year, published the most perfect edition of the Plays of Shakspeare which has ever appeared, the following particulars have been gleaned from an authentic European work of celebrity.

He is a Barrister of Staple's Inn, and was the learned editor of Shakspeare, in 16 vols. 8vo. 1785; of the improved edition of Dodsley's collection of Old Plays; of the edition of Biographia Dramatica, or Companion to the Play-house, which he enlarged, and continued to the year 1782; and of the improved edition of Prior's works. He has been an ample contributor to the Biographical Dictionary, 12 vols. 8vo. 1784. No man living is so well conversant in English publications, both ancient and modern, or has contributed more assistance to the literary world than this gentleman. He is the editor of that truly entertaining and instructive miscellany, the European Magazine. He has been long and assiduously employed in re-editing JOHNSON and STEPHENS'S Shakspeare, which now consists of twenty-one volumes, large 8vo. and which will be the text of the edition proposed to be published here by Mess. Maxwell and Manning.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Lucerne, October 14.

MY DEAR SIR,

The town of Lucerne is one of the most beautifully situated in Switzerland, and commands a view of the lakes, and the Alps of Schwitz, Uri, and Unterwald, which rise most grandly in front of it. We went this morning to see the celebrated basso-relievo of general Pfiffer, which you have often read of. It is a large plan in plaister, wax, and other such materials of sixty-two square leagues of the centre of Switzerland, in which all the mountains, glaciers, forests, towns, rivers, lakes, roads, &c. are laid down according to their proportional elevations, and coloured as in nature. It is one of the most curious things, perhaps, ever invented, and gives a perfect idea of this singular country to those who cannot penetrate into all its vallies, and ascend all its mountains. The mountains are formed of stone, taken, I am told, from the places they represent; and the lakes, rivers, and cascades, are executed in glass. General Pfiffer was employed ten years in completing it, during which time he has ascended, and accurately measured all the heights. While it was making he used to call in the peasants and painters of Chamois to make them examine if it resembled the places they were acquainted with, and wherever any difference or error was pointed out, it was rectified, so that the work is as perfect as it is possible to make it. This singular plan is twelve feet long, and nine and a half feet wide.

The lake being very calm, in the afternoon, we hired a boat, and rowed to the little island of Alstadt, on which the Abbe Raynal had erected a monument to the memory of the three founders of the Swiss republic. Unfortunately, there was too much metal in it, which last year attracted the lightning, and the whole was destroyed.

Near it is a small rock, on which stands a little chapel to St. Nicholas, the tutelar saint of boatmen. Our rowers very piously touched their hats as we passed it. These little chapels, erected to different saints, abound in Switzerland; you meet with them on every road, rock, and at the corners of streets. At most of the inns you see stuck up against the wall little statues and crosses to remind the traveller of his duty, some have little chapels decorated with ribbons and artificial flowers.

As we returned, we coasted along the Lucerne shore, and occasionally landed to ascend the heights, on which we observed the ruins of castles and watch-towers, that we might enjoy the variety of prospects, everywhere to be had along this charming lake. On one of these we found an old signal or round tower, which was used anciently by the Swiss to make a fire in order to alarm the neighbouring country on the approach of an enemy. This signal was repeated on other heights, and in this manner alarm was circulated to every canton, when the warriors armed themselves to resist an attack.

We saw upon the lake a large boat of artillery, full of cannoniers, who were transporting some brass pieces to Lucerne. The uniform of the soldiers, the noise of the drums, the dashing of the oars, and the calmness of the water, darkened by the shadows of the surrounding mountains, formed a most interesting ensemble. I am told that these cannon were used by the French, with great success, on the lake last year, when the Austrians attempted to enter this canton.

We accompanied Mr. B. one of the gentlemen we knew here, to see the cathedral, which is a handsome building, partly modern. They played the organ for us, which is considered a very fine one; the large pipe is two French feet in diameter. We were struck with a ridiculous figure of the virgin, dressed in the stiffest brocade, and with a powdered wig of many formidable curls, holding the infant Jesus, dressed pretty much in the same manner, with a round hat and crown on his head, and a bunch of full-blown artificial roses in his hand. The sanctity of the place could scarcely prevent our laughing at such outré objects.

The church attached to the Jesuit's college is also a handsome modern building, as is the college, and indeed all the buildings belonging to that order, who, I have observed, take good care to possess themselves of the best of every thing.

Lucerne resembles Zurich in the neatness and whiteness of its houses. Indeed, generally speaking, the houses in Switzerland are much the same in these respects; they are more substantial and convenient than elegant, and have a regularity which pleases.

All the towns are well furnished with water from public fountains. These fountains have generally a large basin of stone, or reservoir round which you always see crowds of servants washing and scowering.

A rapid river issues from the lake, and runs through the town, over which are thrown several covered bridges, and one uncovered for carriages. The great wooden bridge at the side of the lake, is a curiosity on account of its length, being, I believe, the longest in the republic.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The muse of Anacreon is sportive without being wanton, and ardent without being licentious. His poetic invention is most brilliantly displayed in those allegorical fictions which so many have attempted to imitate, because all have confessed them to be inimitable. Simplicity is the distinguishing feature of his odes, and they interest by their innocence, while they fascinate by their beauty; they are, indeed, the infants of the Muses, and may be said to lisp in numbers.

ANACREON, ODE VI.

As late I sought the spangled bowers
To cull a wreath of matin flowers,
Where many an early rose was weeping
I found the urchin, Cupid, sleeping.
I caught the boy, a goblet's tide
Was richly mantling by my side,
I caught him, by his downy wing,
And whelm'd him in the racy spring.
Oh! then I drank the poisoned howl,
And Love now rushes in my soul!
Yes, yes, my soul is Cupid's nest,
I feel him fluttering in my breast.

ODE XXXII.

Strew me a breathing bud of leaves
Where lotus with the myrtle weaves,
And, while in luxury's dream I sink,
Let me the balm of Bacchus drink!
In this delicious hour of joy
Young Love shall be my goblet boy;
Folding his little golden vest,
With cinctures, round his snowy breast,
Himself shall hover by my side,
And minister the racy tide!
Swift as the wheels, that kindling roll,
Our life is hurrying to the goal;
A scanty dust, to feed the wind,
Is all the trace 'twill leave behind.
Why do we shed the rose's bloom
Upon the cold, insensate tomb?
Can flowery breeze, or odour's breath
Affect the slumbering child of death?
No; no; I ask no balm to sleep;
With fragrant tears my bed of sleep;
But now, while every pulse is glowing
Now let me breathe the balsam flowing
Now let the rose with blush of fire
Upon my brow its scent expire;
And bring the nymph with floating eye
Oh! she will teach me how to die!
Yes, Cupid, ere my soul retire,
To join the blest elysian choir,
With Wine and Love and Blissers dear,
I'll MAKE MY OWN ELYSIUM here.

We here have the Poet, says his translator, in his true attributes, reclining upon myrtles, with Cupid for his cup bearer. None but Love should fill the goblet of Anacreon. Sappho has assigned this office to Venus, in a fragment, which may be thus paraphrased.

Hither, Venus, queen of kisses!
This shall be the night of blisses!
This the night, to Friendship dear,
Thou shalt be our Hebe here
Fill the golden brimmer high
Let it sparkle like thine eye!
Bid the rosy current gush!
Let it mantle, like thy blush!
Venus, hast thou ere above
Seen a feast so rich in love!
Not a soul that is not mine
Not a soul that is not thine.

The following lines, slightly altered from a modern poem, are evincive of the poetical skill, and descriptive powers of the author, whose picture of a city Hotspur is no caricature.

Already see each school boy, prentice, clerk,
Assumes the pistol, and demands the park;
Feels every breeze the fire of honour fan,
Pants for dispute, and burns to meet his man.
See! with what terror—striking air he stalks,
At noon through high street, or the public walks;
Or if at night, with what vast swell he blocks
Each play-house pass and bellows for his box:
With crop high frizzled, and depending glass,
Short sighted fop! to spy the crowds that pass
Booted and buskin'd, and with pliant switch
Perchance far better laid across his breech
And, most tremendous! on his beardless face
The enormous beaver, cock'd with soldier grace,

Aslant and edgewise confidently hurl'd
Inviting broils, and braving all the world.

Description of an old Farm-House.

Few years are gone, since, on the paddock green,
Beneath the hill, that old FARM-HOUSE was seen,
Round which the barley-mows and wheat-ricks rose,
And cattle sought refreshment and repose.
The cock, proud marching with his cackling train,
Sought the barn-door, to pick the scatter'd grain;
The trotting sow her spotted offspring led,
And gobbling turkies rear'd their crimson head.
The mistress there, and blooming daughters drest
In russet stuffs, their new-made cheeses prest,
Summon'd the swine the full repast to share,
And call'd their poultry with assiduous care,
From whose increase their private fortune grew,
Their ancient right, and still acknowledg'd due:
While in the fields young master held the plough,
Form'd the square load, or trod the fragrant mow!
Familiar still, he crack'd the ready joke,
And sure applause attended all he spoke.
For change, sometimes, with unremitting care,
Heled his healthful flock to pastures fair,
Along the green-wood's verge would guard the fold
From crafty foxes and marauders bold;
The helpless lambs, with tender toil, would guide
To sheltering bush, or hay-stack's sunny side:
In herbs and simples he was skill'd full well,
He taught their virtues crude disease to quell,
And, on the festive eve of shearing, heard
His praise proclaim'd, his noblest, best reward!
By rain confin'd, the sounding flail he ply'd,
Nor scorn'd the meanest labourer by his side:
All day the rustic clamour fill'd the air,
And health, content, and cheerfulness were there.

MATRIMONY.

A Gentleman, between 30 and 40 years of age of good family—with a person which, if not handsome, is at least free from deformity, and a fortune of 3500*l.* exclusive of an increase of near 200*l.* per annum, arising from a genteel profession, wishes to be united to a Lady of character, an affectionate, religious, yet cheerful disposition, and equal fortune. The advertiser will not expect any engagement to be entered into till he has given the fullest and most unequivocal proof of his being what he describes himself.—Letters, post paid, addressed to L. P. Irvingham, Esq. No. 6, Southampton-court, Bloomsbury (an assumed name), will meet with attention. The strictest secrecy and delicacy will be observed.—The Advertiser will give Three Hundred Guineas to any one who will introduce him to a Lady of the above description, if a marriage be the consequence.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A "Biography of Algernon Sydney" is inadmissible. We have no inclination to perpetuate the memory of this sort of Patriot, who has been already "damned to fame" by Sir John Dalrymple.

The Moorish Songs, translated by Ithacus, are extremely curious, and the ballad style which he has judiciously adopted, reminds us of the Rio verde, Rio verde so sweetly rendered by the Bishop of Dromore.

"An officer in the militia" does not know how to handle a musquet, and is, if possible, more ignorant of the rules of war, than of the rules of composition.

P. Q. is better adapted to the objects of a methodistical miscellany, than of a paper, which has no place for the absurdities of fanaticism.

The Editor wishes to obtain from some Bookseller, or reader "Descriptive sketches in verse, taken during a Pedestrian tour in the Italian, Grison, Swiss and Savoyard Alps, by W. Wordsworth, 4to. London," &c.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
MOORISH SONGS.

MR. OLDSCHOOL.

Several years ago I resided on the coast of Barbary, and in my leisure hours amused myself in collecting specimens of the poetry of the country. The greater part of these I have lost, but I send you translations of all that I have remaining, which may, perhaps, be acceptable as curiosities. It may be necessary to mention that as my knowledge of the Arabic was very imperfect, I was obliged to get those from whom I procured them to translate them literally into Italian, from which the following versions are done.

ITHACUS.

I.

Courier, take for me a letter,
To the lady whom I prize;
Tell her I more dearly love her
Than the light that glads my eyes.*

'Anna! Anna! I beseech you,
By the love you bear your son,
Haste to mount upon your palfrey,
Come to me, and come alone!

To my house, and to my garden,
To the †Coja's garden come!
I will meet thee there, my Anna!
I will bid thee welcome home.

This the house, and this the garden,
Where the tuneful birds repair,
Where waters from the jetting fountain
Scatter coolness through the air.

To the house and to the garden,
To the mansion of repose,
Welcome, Anna, my beloved!
Welcome, O thou blushing rose!

II.†

While the cheerful music sounded,
While the careless dance I trod,
They had dug the grave to hide me,
They had plotted for my blood.

Past the garden and the fountain,
Past the path is my abode,
Far, alas! too far, the city;
Murderers are upon the road.

III.

Tell me, sea of Susa! tell
If on your banks my love does dwell;
My love, whom well you might have known,
With eyes so dark, and eye-brows brown.

'Twas from my window first I spied
My love, as past he chanc'd to ride:
In gayest colours was he dress'd,
With crimson trews and yellow vest.

Before my friends, dear youth! I seem
Thy worth but little to esteem;
But in my heart (could'st thou but see)
I languish, and I die, for thee.

IV.

Sharp as fire's burning smart
Is the pain you give my heart;
But how have you that heart beguill'd?
And who has taught you so much art?
For you as yet are but a child.

Do not behind the lattice hide,
But let the window open wide,

* It was not easy to avoid, in this line, a similarity to a verse in Gray's Bard. The original says simply 'more than my eyes.'

† Coja literally signifies a secretary, but it is a title applied to all the great officers of the court of Tunis.

‡ This song is called 'Under the trees.' Whether this title is descriptive of the place where the scene is laid, or is the name of the tune, I do not know.

And cease to play your wanton wiles,
For this is Lent's most solemn tide,*
And still you spread your artful toils.

SELECTED POETRY.

[To infer the moral dispositions of a poet from the tone of sentiments which pervades his works is sometimes a very fallacious analogy but the heart of Anacreon speaks so unequivocally through his odes, that we may consult them as the faithful mirrors of his heart.]

ODE XXXVIII.

Let us drain the nectar'd bowl,
Let us raise the song of soul
To him, the god who loves so well
The nectar'd bowl, the choral swell!
Him, who instructs the sons of earth
To thrice the tangled dance of mirth;
Him, who was nurs'd with infant Love,
And cradled in the Paphian grove;
Him that the snowy queen of charms
Has fondled in her twining arms,
From him that dream of transport flows,
Which sweet intoxication knows,
With him the brow forgets to darkle,
And brilliant graces learn to sparkle.
Behold! my boys a goblet bear
Whose sunny foam bedews the air;
Where are now the tear, the sigh?
To the winds they fly, they fly.
Grasp the bowl, in nectar sinking,
Man of sorrow, drown thy thinking!
Oh can the tears we tend to thought
In life's account avail us aught?
Can we discern, with all our lore,
The path we're yet to journey o'er?
No, no, the walk of life is dark,†
'Tis wine alone can strike a spark.
Then let me quaff the foamy tide,
And through the dance meandering glide;
Let me imbibe the spicy breath
Of odours, chaf'd to fragrant death,
Or from the kiss of love inhale
A more voluptuous, richer gale.
To souls that court the phantom Care,
Let him retire and shroud him there;
While we exhaust the nectar'd bowl,
And swell the choral song of soul,
To him the god, who loves so well
The nectar'd bowl, the choral swell!

Sonnet, on framing the engraved heads of MILTON and SHAKESPEARE.

Thou, who on scraph pinion dauntless flew
From-heaven's high throne to hell's dominion drear
That thou might'st bring to our astonish'd view
All we now hope, with all we had to fear.
And thou, sweet bard, his only fit compeer,
Who nature's scenes in all their changes drew,
Whose fancy, unconfin'd to one wide sphere
'Exhausted worlds, and then imagin'd new.'

* In the original, 'For this is the month of Ramadan.'
† The brevity of life, says the translator, allows arguments for the voluptuary as well as the moralist. Among many parallel passages, which Longepiere has adduced, I shall content myself with an epigram from the Anthologia, of which the following is a paraphrase:

Fly, my belov'd to yonder stream,
We'll plunge us from the noontide beam;
Then cull the rose's humid bud,
And dip it in our goblet's flood.
Our age of bliss, my nymph, shall fly
As sweet, though passing, as that sigh,
Which seems to whisper o'er your lip
'Come, while you may, of rapture sip.'
For age will steal the rosy form,
And chill the pulse which trembles warm,
And death, alas! that hearts, which thrill,
Like yours and mine should e'er be still.

Sons of true Genius! heirs of deathless Fame!
Here shall your chosen portraiture be plac'd,
By all the graphic skill of Albion grac'd,
Albion, that sounds through Europe her acclaim,
While Europe wafts it o'er the Atlantic main,
And echoing millions catch the boastful strain.

THE NEGRO BOY.

A BALLAD.

Cold blows the wind, and while the tear
Bursts trembling from my swollen eyes,
The rain's big drop quick meets it there,
And on my bosom lies;
O pity, all ye sons of joy,
The little wand'ring negro boy.

These tatter'd clothes, this ice-cold breast,
By winter harden'd into steel,
These eyes that know not soothing rest,
But speak the half of what I feel.
Long, long I never knew one joy.
The little wand'ring negro boy.

Cannot the sigh of early grief
Move but one charitable mind?
Cannot one hand afford relief?
One christian pity and be kind?
Weep, weep, for thine was never joy:
O little wand'ring negro boy.

Is there a good that men call pleasure?
O, Osmyn, would that it were thine!
Give me this only precious treasure,
How it would soften grief like mine!
Then Osmyn might be call'd, with joy,
The little wand'ring negro boy.

My limbs these twelve long years have borne
The rage of every angry wind;
Yet still does Osmyn weep and mourn,
Yet still no ease, no rest can find!
Then death alas! must soon destroy
The little wand'ring negro boy.

No sorrow e'er disturbs that rest,
That dwells within the lonely grave,
Thou best resource, the woe-wrung breast,
E'er ask'd of heaven, or heaven e'er gave.
Ah! then farewell, vain world; with joy
I die, the happy negro boy.

SONG TO ELIZA.

If to mine eye, like thy fair cheek,
The rose soft pleasure could impart;
Its flow'rs with eagerness I'd seek.
And always wear it on my heart.

For where thy image loves to rest
'Twould bloom with still redoubled glow,
The panting soil that warms my heart
No kinder, gentler sun can know.

EPIGRAM.

To a friend on his being lampooned.
Why seem surpris'd that ribald Sly
On you his Grub-street bounty scatters?
When a full mud-cart passes by,
'Tis odds that you escape the spatters.

MISCELLANY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO. CLIMENOLE.

A REVIEW, POLITICAL AND LITERARY.
NO. 8.

IT is no small mortification to me that so exquisite a classical scholar, as Mr. Kiddnap, in all his writings appears to be, should declare in a manner so pointed, as he does in my last extract, his disapprobation of Greek and Roman learning. My surprise on this account is not less than my chagrin. For, according to the observations I have made, it has seldom, if ever, before happened, that a man, acquainted with those kinds of literature, has been guilty of decrying them. That whole mass of sages, who, in the United States and elsewhere, have been, for these twenty years past, engaged in the great work of bringing into discredit the study of the languages and sciences of Greece and Rome, being composed entirely, as far as I have ever heard or remarked, of persons lamentably ignorant of the subjects against which they declaim. Now, as the interests of these ancients, against whom so great a prejudice has been excited, lie near my heart, and as the opportunity seems to be favourable, I hope I shall be excused if I turn aside, for a moment, from the main object of these essays, in order to get rid of a few observations, for which purpose, I doubt, if I shall ever have a fairer occasion. I do this with the less reluctance, as this privilege of digression, or of wandering from the point, is very dear to all of us, who, out of pure patriotism or compassion, submit to the thankless task of enlightening, through the medium of public prints, the benighted citizens of these states. A privilege which I take to be unalienable, and, like freedom and equality, born with us, American essayists; of which universal custom, as well as the express provisions of the constitutions of our respective states, secures to us the exercise. For melancholy, indeed, would be our lot, if we, in these free states, in executing our immortal works, were under the necessity of conforming ourselves to what are called rules of taste and laws of good writing; which, being for the most part established under monarchies and aristocracies, are not at all suited to the atmosphere of a republic. Besides, why should we be the only slaves, negroes excepted, in this happy country? For, in case so odious a necessity did exist, we, alone, of all the citizens, would be bound by rules and regulations, to which we have never given our assent, either expressly in person, or impliedly by our representatives. And this is as I have been taught, the very essence and definition of slavery. It being the great character of American liberty to be bound by no laws, but those of our own making, and to suffer as few of these, as possible, to get into operation.

Now as there are two descriptions of persons, as I perceive, engaged, with great zeal, in the work of preventing the farther growth of Greek and Latin learning among us, by discouraging its culture in our schools and colleges, and so, by degrees, rooting it out of the country, I shall submit a few observations to their consideration, separately, in the hope, that, recognizing their justice, they may be induced to relax in that rancour, with which, on all occasions, they persecute these branches of science. The first is that numerous class of happy gentlemen, who are blessed with a solid roof over their brains, and who by reason of an early ossification of the sutures of the skull, the consequence, sometimes, of neglect, and sometimes of indulgence during childhood, have been able, by the flintiness of its texture, not only to turn the edge of the wit, employed to overcome the obduracy of the place, but to resist all the attempts of the senses to throw a scientific garrison into that fortress. These gentlemen are not a little provoked, that, notwithstanding a great deal of beating of it about their heads, little, or none, of that species of learning ever found its way under the destined recipient. For which reason, they owe those sciences a grudge; and, judging of the market, by their own success in it, complain, and justly, of the great expense of time and labour, in their youth, to little or no purpose. Whereas, they imagine that, if they had been educated in the method they are now pursuing with their own offspring, they would have made as great a figure, in the present day, as those children of theirs promise to do in a future, who have already become great experimental philosophers, by laboriously watching the whirling of their tops, and are also far advanced in projectiles, by a long attention to that arduous study, the delight of the moderns,—push-pin. But these gentlemen have a better reason for their animosity to these sciences. For the sage instructors of former days had, as is well known, a thorough acquaintance with the principles of intellectual architecture; and according to the nature of the soil, on which they had to work, varied their means, keeping the great objects, beauty and utility, steadily in view. Whence it happened, that, after a sufficiently long trial, to build a mind in the brain, after the manner of that ingenious mechanic, the Bee, by beginning at the top, and fixing themselves strongly there, they were accustomed, for want of a hold, or from the impossibility of getting to the underside of the skull, to change their operations, and to attempt to raise the intellectual pile, by beginning at the bottom, and proceeding cautiously, according to the rules of ancient architecture, by a gradual and industrious laying on of birch. On which account all these enemies to the ancient sciences, of whom we now treat, are very sore, even to this day; as any man may be convinced, who will observe how ill at ease they are on their seats, when their notions, on these subjects, are denied, or, in any manner, controverted. Now, I beg these gentlemen to consider, that the great writers of antiquity did not, as they seem to imagine, compose those celebrated works of theirs with the malignant design of causing the fleshy parts of the human frame to be flayed off on their account; but that this evil is altogether accidental; an innovation of later ages, of which those great men are entirely guiltless, and which they would lament, could they but look out of their graves, with as much feeling, and with infinitely more taste and pathos, than any other modern sufferer. I know that these objectors have imbibed a different opinion; believing that not only Ovid, Cicero, and Xenophon, but that all the classical writers of antiquity, have left express directions, in their works, for those cruel whippings, which even now, at an advanced age, they cannot reflect upon without great pain and sorrow. This unhappy belief of theirs, as it is the result of inveterate associations, made in infancy and childhood, which, according to Mr. Hartley, can never wholly be overcome, I may find it difficult to alter. Yet I cannot refrain from assuring those gentlemen that I have gone through all the ancient classics, with the express design of ascertaining whether those abhorred scenes of childhood were under, and by virtue of, their authority; and I declare I have not discovered the slightest foundation for such an opinion. True it is that Herodotus, in his treatise concerning gardening, has a passage which some have thought countenanced the practices under consideration. For he says—

"There is, in Boetia, a certain shrub, in its nature low, stunted and grove-like, which, if suffered to grow in company with its own species only, shoots up but a little way from the ground, and never produces any, except the most ugly and sour, fruits. Yet if this shrub be transplanted into the neighbourhood of certain ancient trees, which are the glory of the forest, and be placed so as that it may be refreshed from their shade, and drink of the dews, which, from time to time, drop from their proud and heaven-directed tops, it will expand and grow, becoming beautiful to the sight, and yielding fruits, very succulent and delightful. But if, as will sometimes happen, from a perversity of nature, or any languor in the sap, it is found, notwithstanding it enjoys such advantages, to droop about the head, and grow palsy about the body, these two symptoms ordinarily appearing together, then the gardeners of that country have a method of treating it, usually as effectual, as it seems extraordinary. For with a certain keen instrument, made out of the pliable branches of a birch, (for so, according to the best commentators, onus ought to be translated) they make an incision into the bottom and stripping up the bark, they, from time to time, according as in their judgment its improvement may require, scourge off the whole scarf or outside skin. This practice, far from injuring the shrub, as a theorist would imagine, communicates great life and vigour to it; inasmuch that the largest and most flourishing trees, in that country, are those, which have been treated, when young, in a manner as one would think, at first sight, so wanton and unnatural."

Now, I know, that those, who defend the ancient customs of our schools, cite this passage of Herodotus, pretending that it is only an allegory; and that by those ancient trees of the forest, he intended the classics of his day, and that, by scourging off the skin from the bottom, he would intimate his approbation of a custom, which, at that time, prevailed among the most celebrated schoolmasters of Greece. In support of this opinion of theirs, they assert that Greece was, at this period, overrun with democratic notions and principles; and that the schemes of liberty and equality, the rights of man, and the dignity of human nature, of which their state constitutions, and the harangues of their demagogues are so full, were plucking not only the sceptre from the hands of tyrants, but the rod and the ferula from the hands of the masters, and were laying prostrate all just and necessary controul. Herodotus, therefore, as they think, not daring to oppugn the popular sentiment, by openly advocating the ancient regimen of the schools, (particularly as his work was written for the people, and read publicly at the Olympic games), adopted this figurative method of expressing his opinion upon a very important subject, and of transmitting it to posterity. I confess this construction of that celebrated passage of Herodotus always appeared to me very forced and unnatural, but must now, I think, be admitted to be wholly erroneous, since a famous modern gardener, Mr. Forsyth, who cannot be suspected of writing typically, or figuratively, has recommended a treatment of trees entirely similar to that, which, as this Grecian historian relates, was customary among the gardeners of Bœotia. So that, I hope, those gentlemen, who have taken so violent a prejudice against the ancients, on account of their sufferings in childhood, will, after a due consideration of what is written above, see the falsity of their opinions, and retract them. The truth is, these sufferings are to be attributed to a system, adopted by our ancestors of the three last ages, founded upon the belief, that, in order to excite the human mind to its highest energies, punishments were altogether as necessary, and generally much more effectual, than rewards. According to their opinion, it is with the intellect, in a degree, as with an high mettled racer, who, let him be as spirited as he will, always keeps the course much more truly, and clears the ground much more rapidly, when beset both by whip and spur, than when he is only stroked by his rider, and sees the groom shaking his provender at the goal. I know that, under maternal influence, these opinions have become antiquated. A new sect has sprung up, who decry the cruelties of the ancient regimen, and maintain the efficacy of what is called the cake and candy constitutions of school government. According to this system, learning is a trap, to make boys enter which, they must be baited;—it is a long and fatiguing road, and so they ought to take an abundance of cordials and comforts to keep them from fainting on the journey; it is a hill, in ascending which they are very apt to get out of breath, and, therefore, ought always to be furnished, like Falstaff, with ‘a penny worth of sugar candy to make them long-winded.’ I shall not, at present, enter into an examination of these two great systems of education, which divide the learned; as I mean to set apart a number, hereafter, for the investigation of this momentous question. In the meantime, if any schoolmaster in the United States, who has laid aside the ancient method of discipline, and adopted the fashionable, palatable system, would transmit to me information, duly authenticated, concerning the necessary outfits of their institution, and its results, they would do an essential service to literature. A great diversity of opinion exists among the schoolmasters, in my neighbourhood, upon this subject. Some distributing, what, in the modern system, are called “rewards,” in great abundance, with no perceptible effect, while others, who are strongly suspected of using, in an underhand manner, an infusion of the ancient method, produce great effects, with few, or no, expenditures of this kind.

Another class of persons, who are, as I have hinted, engaged in the great work of rooting out Greek and Latin from among us, consists of persons of lively imaginations and quick apprehensions enough, and who, for the most part, have escaped the sorrows which have soured the tempers of those mentioned above; but yet who had no sooner escaped from the walls of their college, or the hands of their private tutor, than they laid aside all attention to ancient learning, any farther than it assisted, incidentally, the professions upon which they had entered, and by which they were getting their livelihood. These gentlemen, having lost the relish, which they had acquired in their youth, for classical literature, and accustoming themselves to measure the utility of all acquisitions, by their connection with professional advancement, soon learned to regard the respect they had been taught to entertain for the literature under consideration, as the prejudice of childhood, which it was worthy of them, when men, to throw off. Now, although it may be true as these gentlemen contend that utility is the standard of rank among the sciences, yet, I beg leave to doubt, what they seem to take for granted, that pecuniary profit is the standard of utility. I do by no means agree, therefore, that they have established their opinion, because they may prove that neither Greek nor Roman learning ever qualify a man to make a keener bargain on the exchange, or whet up his invention to find means to make money in any of the learned professions. I know that the great mass of my cotemporaries, when such evidence is produced, think that all questions concerning the advantages of that learning are at an end. A few, however, judge more justly, and coincide with me in opinion, that, admitting their inefficacy in producing pecuniary results, the sacred relics of Greece and Rome are worthy of all the devotion, and all the study, which our ancestors paid to them, inasmuch as they contain, in their estimation, more exquisite models of excellence, juster principles of taste, nobler motives of conduct, more certain methods for intellectual advancement than are easily to be found in any of the works of the present day; not excepting those chief depositories of the learning and taste of these states, our political pamphlets and newspapers. I am very sensible that if this opinion of mine were to be decided by ‘hand vote,’ in the United States, it would be carried against me by a very great majority; particularly, if, as on other great questions, the black interest of Virginia and her dependencies was thrown into the scale. A measure, against which, I confess, I can see no reasonable objection. Since upon every question of science and morals, from all the observations I have made, the oppressed black gentlemen of the ancient dominion have quite as correct views, and altogether as enlarged notions, and of consequence as good right to give their opinion, as any of those wise patriots, calling themselves their masters. The truth is, that ever since putting together watchwork, and measuring bones, and making mould-boards, have been sufficient qualifications to entitle men not only to set up for great philosophers themselves, but to be rated as such by others, the ancient routes to greatness, through labour and trial, and frequent comparison of our own works with established standards, have been thought too circuitous, and gone entirely into disrepute. A man, who, now-a-days, has the ambition to be celebrated as a great scholar or philosopher, need ask no other boon of providence than to be enabled to discover a mammoth pit, or to have revealed to him ‘a great claw.’ By means of which he may step up boldly, and take possession of the philosopher’s chair at once. But if he happen to have his scale and dividers in his pocket, and should submit to the drudgery of making a drawing and description, for the benefit of the curious, he will have ill luck indeed, if, in consequence of these rare exertions, he be not elevated, for life, to the presidency of the American philosophical society. Since these easy paths to literary reputation and eminence have been explored, the old tracks have been neglected. Men, here, in the United States, understand making bargains better, than to buy the good graces of posterity, by the painful labours the ancients impose, when all their cotemporaries are hawking about literary immortality, at their doors, for so great a pennyworth. From all which it is very obvious how it happened that the eulogist* of Dr. Rittenhouse could find no better way to account for the unexampled superiority of his genius, than his ignorance of the learned languages; and that the great man, his successor in the philosopher’s chair, omits no occasion to show his contempt for those ancients, by an open violation of all the rules they took the pains to establish concerning taste and propriety in style; and by taking that short cut to immortality, which the moderns have invented, but which, whoever follows, will, if the testimony of those ancients is admitted, be cruelly disappointed in his expectations.

In making these observations in defence of ancient literature, I have not thought it worth my while to notice the objections raised by our wise legislators at Lancaster, who, as I am credibly informed, are very violent in their animosity, ever since they have heard that the book, called Homer’s Iliad, is a shilling pamphlet, published expressly against that immortal work, Paine’s Common Sense; and that they have had it seriously in contemplation to pass an act of attainder against Marcus Tullius Cicero, since they have learnt that he was a lawyer, who had, on divers occasions, expressed himself very boldly against their favourite project of building up justices of the peace on the ruins of the bar. These false notions I must leave time to correct; for it would be going too far out of my way to collect the evidence to draw our wise representatives out of an error, into which they have fallen very innocently.

Having thus finished, in the manner of my cotemporaries, this elaborate and ingenious defence of ancient learning, I shall now, with great joy to myself and the public, return to the excellent work I have undertaken to review.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

As you have sometimes spoken of the fashions in your port folio, you are the most proper person to whom I can address my complaints of the ill manners of the day.

I am one of those, of my sex, who think the charms with which nature has liberally gifted us, should not lie altogether concealed, and those fellows, who undertake to censure us for making a free display of them, are impertinent and reflect not that they also are very fond of displaying themselves and on all occasions, in conversations, drag in, right or wrong scraps and quotations

they have gleaned from Magazines, or newspapers to make us believe they are learned and well read, yet if we expose to view only naked, genuine charms they call us immodest, but they, with all their borrowed nonsense pass uncensured; hang their impertinence!

But to come to what most weighs upon my mind, not long since being on a visit to Washington, I thought I would outstrip the most fashionable of our ladies and astonish the southern members of congress, who had been mostly accustomed to view the charms of their black woman or of Indian squaws. I had scarcely made my entree into a large assembly, when a tall mammoth of a creature suddenly fixed his lecherous eyes and kept them riveted upon my bare bosom. Had two burning glasses collected the rays of the sun there I should not have felt more torment: I knew not which way to look. I first cast my eyes down upon my neck, then looked up, now on one side, then on the other. My eyes from their sudden transitions quickened their motion, till at length they began fairly to quiver and my whole body was in one universal flutter, just like a sparrow when under the charm of a rattle snake and ready to be devoured by it. I wished I had been stark naked, that the eyes that were fastened upon me, having no particular point to attract them, would wander all over my body and give me some relief. I was upon the point of sinking, when some lucky accident relieved me from such horrid looks and gave me an opportunity to recover myself. Now I wish it to be understood, and I wish you to inculcate this idea in all your future lessons upon fashion and good breeding, that our naked charms are not to be gazed or stared at by impertinent fellows, but must only be viewed by stolen glances, particularly at this early date of the fashion, when they unaccustomed to being exposed to view, feel as sensibly the staring of the men, as eyes just opened, after being long closed, feel the glare of the sun. If the men feel at any loss for a resting place for their eyes, can they not collect their wandering looks to a point on the face, a part more injured to the gazing of men.

Yours ever, I. O.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM DR. FRANKLIN, SILAS DEANE, ARTHUR LEE, &c.

Extracts of letters from London.

October 6, 1780.

Mr. Henry Laurens was brought to town last night rather in better health. He was lodged that night in the messenger's house, in Scotland yard, and denied all sort of communication with his friends, or those who wished to speak to him. He was examined at noon at Lord George Germaine's, and committed by a warrant of justice Addington a close prisoner to the tower, orders that no person whatever speaks to him. These folks are so foolishly changeable that most likely in a few days the severity of his confinement may be relaxed. At present two men are always in the same room with him, and two soldiers without.

October 10, 1780.

Since my last, of the sixth, there has been no material incident relative to Mr. Henry Laurens's commitment; nor is the rigour of his confinement abated. No person whatever can speak to him but in hearing and sight of the two attendant messengers. It is said that the secretary of state's order will produce admittance to his room, but nothing else. Some of his tory relations, and a Mr. Manning, a merchant of the city, and a correspondent of Mr. Laurens have made attempts to speak to him, but did not succeed. He is wise enough to be cautious who he speaks to. It is generally thought that this rigour will be taken off in a few days, and that his friends, who are now backward for fear that any stir may be disadvantageous to him, will have admittance. Almost every person here is crying out shame upon this sort of treatment of Mr. Laurens.

October 17, 1780.

It was not until the fourteenth instant that any person whatever was permitted to see Mr. Laurens in the tower. On that day, after repeated applications for admission, Mr. Manning and Mr. Laurens, jun. a youth of sixteen or eighteen years, who has been some years at Warrington school, were permitted to see him. An order went signed from the three secretaries of state, Hillsborough, Stormont and Germaine, to the governor of the tower, permitting the two gentlemen above to visit Mr. Laurens for half an hour. The warrant expressly intimating that their visit was to be limited to that time, and that they could not, a second time, see him, without a new order. The governor of the tower sent a note to Mr. Manning's that he had received such an order from the secretaries of state, and he, with young Laurens, went accordingly last Saturday morning. They found him very ill of a lax, much emaciated, but not low spirited, and bitterly invective against the people of England for their harsh treatment of him. He spoke very handsomely of captain Keppel, who took him, and the lieutenant who accompanied him to London; but from the period of his putting his foot on shore, he was treated with a brutality which he could not even expect from Englishmen. His weakness from sickness, and his agitation on seeing his son, took up the first ten of the thirty minutes allowed him to converse with his friends. The rest was filled with bitter invectives against the authors of his harsh treatment. His outer room is but a very mean one, not more than twelve feet square, a dark, close bed-room adjoining, both indifferently furnished, and a few books on his table; no pen and ink, or newspaper has been yet allowed him, but he has a pencil and memorandum book in which he occasionally notes things. The warden of the tower and a yeoman of the guard are constantly at his elbow, though they never attempt to stop his conversation. Mr. Manning and his child being the first visitors he has had, perhaps Mr. Laurens was led to say every thing he could of the severity of his treatment, in order that it might be known abroad, and contradict the general report of his being exceedingly well treated. He has hitherto declined any physical advice, or the visits of any of those creatures near him, who may be put in with a view to pump. Mr. Penn is making application, and will likely see him. It is doubtful if the son will again get leave. His harsh treatment being now pretty generally known, every one is crying out shame against it, and they accuse a great personage, known by the name of white eyes, as the immediate author of it.

Passy, November 6, 1780.

DEAR SIR,

My grandfather has been, for a long time past, laid up with the gout, and is so still. He directs me to inform you, that he has received several of your letters, which he has not as yet been able to answer; he hopes, however, that in a few days he shall be able to do it, as his sufferings are much diminished.

You have heard, I suppose of the arrival at Brest of M. de Guichen.

I am, as ever, my dear sir,

Your very affectionate

Humble servant,

W. T. FRANKLIN.

M. Dumas.

Amsterdam, November 9, 1780.

MY DEAR SIR,

I feel myself greatly obliged to you for your kind attention in writing frequently to me, and I beg you will believe that I receive your letters with great satisfaction.

I am happy to find we are to have the pleasure of seeing you here the end of this week, and I flatter myself we shall have much agreeable conversation together, and with the other friends of freedom and lovers of mankind, now in Amsterdam.

We have letters from London so far down as the third of this month, at which time our friend Mr. L. was still under rigorous confinement, inasmuch that his young son was not permitted to see him. We have, however, found means of some communications with him, by which we find his health quite restored, and that he is in very high spirits. He assures us, under his hand, that no paper of any consequence has fallen into the enemy's hands. We have reason to hope that he will, in a short time, be released, at least from his present rigorous confinement; but this, as well as all I write you respecting him, had better be kept to ourselves. I received a letter yesterday from L'Orient, by which I find a vessel had arrived there from Philadelphia, which brings accounts that general Gates was at the head of twelve thousand men, within seventy miles of Charlestown, and that his advanced parties had surprised several of the enemy's outposts, and made about one hundred prisoners. I make not the least doubt we shall have pleasing accounts from that quarter before very long.

I am delighted at the information you give me, that we may expect the pleasure of seeing M. le duc de la V. in this city. I shall make it a point, as soon as he arrives here, to pay my devoirs to him.

I pray you to believe me to be, with the most respectful compliments to your lady and to mademoiselle,

Your sincere friend and servant,

J. SEARLE.

P.S. We have no vessel here that will depart for any part of America this season, which I am very sorry for.

Passy, November 7, 1780.

DEAR SIR,

When I wrote you yesterday that M. de Guichen was arrived, I made no doubt but that it was certain, especially as I had it from persons who are generally well informed. But I now find that I have been deceived, and I take the earliest opportunity of acquainting you therewith, in order to prevent your spreading a piece of intelligence which is not founded on truth.

I am, my dear sir,

With great esteem,

Your affectionate

Humble servant,

M. Dumas.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Journal of a tour from Paris to Amsterdam, in the year 1796.

9th November, 1796. Left Paris in the morning in company with Mr. — on a tour to Amsterdam and lodged at Compiègne 19 leagues. This pretty town which contains 5000 inhabitants had once to rejoice in a royal chateau, a pleasing palace of Louis the 15th, which still preserves the decapitation of its last royal and wretched owner.

It is surrounded by very extensive and luxuriant meadows through which the river Oise rolls a busy tide, if we may so conclude from the number of large barges on its margin; there is also an excellent stone bridge.

10th, Breakfasted at Noyon, a large town formerly the residence of a bishop. The cathedral still exhibits strong traits of gothic grandeur, although it now serves only as a military deposit of corn and forage. There is a well constructed fountain in the market place. Two markets one of provisions and vegetables, the other of flour and grain, appeared abundantly supplied.

St. Quentin is a fortified, being considered as a frontier town. It looks well as you approach it from a hill two miles distance. The principal church appeared higher than any I have ever seen. We rode close along the fosse of its western ramparts, but did not enter the town.

11th, Breakfasted at Cambrai, a city much more interesting for being the residence of the amiable Fenelon, than for its formidable fortifications. The style of the houses differs, and there is enough of cleanliness to shew, that you are near leaving France.

Bouchain is a strongly fortified place, as far as numerous bastions, ditches, wall, gates, and draw bridges go. It has a garrison but I saw no cannon mounted. We first met the Scheldt at Cambrai and now here again. We arrived at Valenciennes in time for dinner and for the more interesting spectacle of viewing the effects of the siege in 1793. The works are various, numerous, and apparently impregnable. The principal attack was on the east. There are two churches and about 150 houses which exhibit the melancholy effects of bombs and bullets. They are now a general pile of ruins. The Austrian and English combined forces amounted to 70,000 men. The garrison consisted of 12,000, and when the town surrendered, they were reduced to 4,000. There were also near 3,000 inhabitants who perished in this siege of forty-three days. We here met strong beer and a sea coal fire, two singular articles in France. St. Quentin, Cambrai and Bouchain are situated on high ground but this town not.

12th, Soon after leaving Valenciennes you enter Austrian Flanders or rather the conquered department of French Brabant. Arrived at two o'clock at Mons and immediately procured a guide to conduct us to the memorable spot where Dumourier, gained the battle of Jemappe. There is a hill a little to the south of Mons, on and around which was the Austrians' encampment, and about a mile and half beyond, near the village of Jemappe, lies another where the Austrians had raised several strong redoubts. These the French stormed and carried one after the other, although repeatedly repulsed with immense slaughter. There is a small village between the two hills in which much carnage was the result of the cavalry of both armies meeting. The French had full fifteen thousand killed, and the Austrians about eleven, (as the French general moved rapidly on, the peasantry of the country were at liberty to bury the dead, in doing which they filled three coal pits, the cloathing fully compensated them for their labour.) The latter hastily retreated, and Mons the next morning surrendered to the former.

This town has changed masters four times since the commencement of the present war but fortunately for its inhabitants the emperor Joseph the Second, in 1784, had taken care to have all its out works demolished;* it has therefore always since escaped the horrors of a siege by delivering its keys to that general who brought an army to demand them. The ramparts are high with beautiful rows of trees, which like all the other fortified towns I have seen, afford very pleasant promenades for the inhabitants. Mons is situated on a hill and at some distance looks well, all the buildings of importance are churches or religious houses. Here for the first time I met in the streets several capuchin friars, and some priests. But the convents are suppressed, and next Tuesday is the time for their evacuation. On the road we passed a number of crosses and two or three little chapels, where the mendicants pick up money by imposing on credulity, and taxing superstitious sensibility. The entrance to Mons on the road from Valenciennes is remarkably pleasing from the lofty trees that border the pavement for a mile. On the ramparts there are two large windmills, but no cannon, and one mill is worth a thousand guns. The honest Brabanters think that man was made to raise wheat and vegetables, and not to murder each other. There is a fair held here twice a year which lasts twenty days; they were now engaged in the fall one; we walked round about seventy or eighty very pretty temporary shops filled with a great variety of merchandize. They are erected in and round the walls of a large public building and some in a large square. The petty merchants come from Brussels, Antwerp, Valenciennes, &c.

We left Mons at eleven, being a very fine morning and arrived at Brussels at five o'clock, thirty-five miles. For about twenty miles the country has greatly the appearance of New-England, rocks and stones excepted, and that there are no enclosures, but farmhouses occasionally scattered, and churches and windmills rising in every direction.

Brussels is considered as the capital of the Austrian Pays bas. It has among other advantages that of centrality in respect to the neighbouring great towns of Louvain, Mecklin, Antwerp, Ghent, Mons, Charleroy, and Namur; it is the handsomest city of imperial Flanders and contains about 80,000 inhabitants, in has also a great number of churches, hospitals, and maisons dieu. The river Senne runs through the lower part of it and forms several islands, which, covered with houses and united by bridges, are not distinguished by a stranger until pointed out to him. This town is built on uneven ground the scite of the Park being 150 feet higher than the surface of the Senne. Here is a handsome palace where the cidevant governor general of these provinces used to reside, and a number of large houses belonging to the nobility of the country, several edifices and hotels necessary for the different bodies and tribunals of the general government. There was also a royal library, and cabinets containing a great variety of subjects of natural history as well as for experimental physics. They had also a mint and treasury, and an imperial academy of sciences and belles lettres. One for design, painting, sculpture and architecture, but they have now all perished, and a dirty tri-coloured rag displays its tatters in front of all the public buildings which were governmental ones, or were the special property of any of the emperor's family, or belonged to emigrant nobles. Had the French been content with only this species of confiscation, the humiliated inhabitants would not have repined, but with deep regret they must have felt their subjugation, when they saw the waggons of their conquerors carrying off for ever, to enrich the proud capital of the republic of France, those precious paintings, sculptures and cabinets, which had so often excited the curiosity and admiration of foreigners, as well as held out precepts and stimulus to the artists of their own country.

* It was a favourite theory of this prince that countries should be preserved by armies, not by fortifications. The unfortunate experience of Joseph falsified some of his theories, both of the philosophical as well as political kind.

Here is one of the most beautiful squares perhaps in Europe. it is called the park of Brussels I should rather stile it a garden in the centre of four charming streets. It is well planted with trees; the gravel walks judiciously laid out, and the busts and statues, which are numerous, suitably disposed to produce as much effect as such sort of things are capable. In front of the great avenue of the park is a noble house, in which the Council of Brabant sat. The houses which compose the four streets are not uniformly built, but sufficiently elegant, or neat, to form a pleasing coup-d'œil.

They boast of seven parishes, among which is a collegiate church. They formerly had thirteen convents, two of which were suppressed and twenty nunneries, most of which were reduced in the years 1783 and 1784 by the emperor, at the hazard of a rebellion. They also count twenty-eight public chapels, and sixty hospitals and houses for charitable purposes; and the following excellent institution is worthy the imitation of all countries, wherein charity is estimated a virtue. Each parish has a building which is called the Orphan House, where poor children of both sexes belonging to the parish are fed, clothed, and instructed; and as they advance in age, they are set to work at different employments, and the money arising from their labour goes into the general fund of the establishment; and the principal gentlemen of each respective parish, with pleasure undertake the discharge of this truly christian and honorable administration.

The hotel de Ville, or town house, is of gothic architecture, and is said to be the most beautiful public building in Austrian Flanders. The tower is of a pyramidal form three hundred and sixty-four feet in height. The statue of St. Michael seventeen feet high is fixed on the top of this lofty steeple. This angel of the revelations, it seems, is the patron saint of Brussels and therefore you see him and his dragon perched about in different streets; and they certainly have had very extraordinary fortune not to have before this time been deposed from their airy elevated station on the hotel de Ville.

The large and venerable church of St. Gudule placed on high ground, furnishes from the top of the towers a very complete view of the city. It is a collegiate, and the principal church in Brussels. The front exhibits a vast and magnificent work of gothic architecture and sculpture; the interior is composed of sixteen chapels situated along the walls, each adorned with appropriate paintings and images, according to the services and sufferings of the saint to whom it is dedicated. There are no pieces that claim much attention. The French seized and sent to Paris every chef-d'œuvre they could find in the palaces, or churches, but the priests took care, in time, to send off to Vienna all their crucifixes, vessels, and martyrs, that were composed of gold or silver; with these exceptions there still remains enough of the superb, with some glitter, to make this cathedral worth a few hours of the traveller's time and observation.

This country formed a part of the hereditary conquests belonging to the house of Austria, of course, the principles of the feudal system with the imperial fiefs constituted the ground-work of their tenures.

It is for a general peace to settle the ownership and sovereignty of the country. Should it eventually remain with France, and continue one of its departments, the constitution of that republic necessarily supercedes all feudal distinctions, and annihilates every species of legal vassalage among its peasantry. The courts of law, where the local institutes, or the emperor's placards, did not interfere, were regulated in their decisions by the civil law. The general outlines of the government, are to be found in all good geographical volumes.

Mild, frank, honest, industrious, religious and illiterate. (I refer to the multitude) I believe, and this opinion is founded on much observation, and some conversation, that the Flemings would generally prefer their old state of vassalage and pious subjugation, to being united as free denizens, to the infidel, aspiring and belligerent republic of France. They appear more disgusted at the suppression of the religious houses, than resentful at the taxes which their new masters exact from them, simple and local. For ages, inured to and managed by the monkery and magic of priests and friars, they cannot be brought to believe the shameful vices that naturally attach to convents, where, indolence and luxury united to seclusion and privacy, produce effects of the most detestable nature. Crimes confined within their own walls, if detected would not be punished, because the order ought not to be scandalised, lest religion should thereby be profaned!

There are twenty-five bridges and as many public fountains, but no one remarkable.* They have several markets, the fish, vegetable and flesh ones very full and very good.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[In a general and statistical history, now preparing for the press, by an ingenious clergyman, of one of the most interesting portions of American territory, a place has been allotted to Biography. In this department is a sketch of the life of CARVER, who travelled into the western country in 1765. Nothing but an outline is yet drawn; many facts are still to be collected, and many interesting particulars may yet be gleaned, to illustrate that constitutional bent of mind, which is but another term for inflexible resolution, and ardent genius.]

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF CAPT. CARVER, THE CELEBRATED TRAVELLER.

Captain Jonathan Carver was born at Canterbury, Connecticut, in 1729. He was a descendant of John Carver, the first governor of the colony of Plymouth, in 1620. His mother, being deserted by her husband, was reduced, with her child, to needy circumstances. The selectmen of that town made provision for the boy, and, at a proper age, indentured him to a shoemaker of the name of Bradford.

With the common advantages of a district school, he made uncommon progress in reading, writing, and arithmetic. His active mind became uneasy with his confined situation. The severity of his master added new force to his predominant passion for adventure, and he quitted him before the age of twenty-one, under the youthful expectation of managing better for himself. He married, at Windham, a young woman by the name of Robins; but, not being contented to walk in the narrow circle of domestic duties, on the commencement of hostilities between France and England, in 1755, he enlisted as a private soldier, and marched with the troops to the defence of the frontiers of New-York. In 1757, he escaped the dreadful massacre at fort William-Henry, where about 1500 brave troops, under the command of general Webb, were murdered in cold blood, by the Indians in the French army, commanded by general Montcalm.

Carver, in 1758, was promoted to a lieutenancy in colonel Patridge's regiment, and the year following was, with the troops under general Wolf, at the siege and surrender of Quebec. In 1760, he was promoted to a captain's commission. As a soldier and an officer he acquitted himself with reputation for bravery and ability.

After the peace of Versailles, in 1763, captain Carver retired from the army, but was too enterprising to be idle. Having become inured to fatigue and danger, his bold genius led him, from motives stated in the introduction and conclusion of his travels, to explore the western country, which had been, by the treaty of Versailles, ceded to Great Britain. Spending about two years with his family in Massachusetts, he set forward in 1765 on his rout to the lakes, without individual or combined patronage to defray his expenses. In the accomplishment of this noble and hazardous undertaking captain Carver has deservedly the honour of rendering a most important service to his country, in opening to its acquaintance a vast unexplored wilderness, which, in the progress of population, is destined to be inhabited by a civilized people. He was absent from his family two years and five months, and travelled about seven thousand miles.

In 1769, he took passage, with his family, for England, indulging the fond expectation of receiving the reward of his labours. But here he thought himself treated not only with neglect, but injustice. He obtained from the Board of Trade merely a compensation of the sums he had expended in his travels, on condition of delivering up the original journals. But fortunately retaining duplicates, he, after several years, procured the publication of his travels for his own benefit.

With his family in London, and disappointed of that support which he had every reason to expect from a government he had so faithfully served, at the risk of his life, in exploring the western territories, he necessarily fell into indigent circumstances.

The probable reasons why captain Carver and his travels were not more patronized, were the difficulties which then existed and were increasing between Great Britain and her colonies. It was their policy to suppress every thing that tended to give a more particular view of the power, wealth, and future prospects of this country.

With a family, and destitute of the adequate means of support, Carver found less sympathy in the wealth of London, than he would have shared among the tribes of the west.*

In 1779, he acted in the low employment of a clerk in a lottery office, till worn out with fatigue, and borne down by disappointment, a putrid fever put an end to his life in the city of London, January 31, 1780, aged 51.

Captain Carver was above the common stature, of a firm muscular frame of body. His features indicated a bold, persevering mind. He was of a light florid complexion. Pure in his morals, he was free from the folly of assuming importance by profanity. In his travels, and in his curious and intelligent letter to his wife, dated September 24, 1767, he manifests a practical belief of a constant providence, which, in a most remarkable manner, had guarded over him in all his ways.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Berne, October 17.

MY DEAR SIR,

We left Lucerne the 15th very early, and travelled along the banks of the lake of Sempack by a very fine road. We saw on the opposite shore the village of the same name, celebrated in Helvetian history for the battle which the Swiss gave Leopold, duke of Austria, in 1386, who was killed near it, with the flower of his knights: at the further end of the lake is the small town of Sursee. We remarked in the church-yard (as we have several times done in this country) that almost every grave was decorated with a stone, wooden or metal cross, sometimes gilt in a strange, fantastic manner; before each cross was a basin of holy water, with a sprig of myrtle in it, for the friends of the departed to sprinkle it on their graves; no weed is suffered to grow upon them, and it would be thought a disgrace to the surviving relations were they to neglect keeping them clear.

We dined at Zoffingen, a small neat manufacturing town upon the Wigger; and as our horses had to stop there a couple of hours, we got no further at night than a lone house in the neighbourhood of some mills.—The place is called Morgenthal. The next morning we proceeded on to this place, stopping only at the village of Hindlebanck, to see in the little parish church the celebrated tomb of Madame de Langhans, who died in child birth at the age of twenty-eight.

This monument, which does infinite credit to the taste and invention of Mr. Nahl, the sculptor, has been universally admired, and I think with reason. It is in an aisle of the church under a kind of trap-door, which on being raised exhibits the tombstone which is supposed to cover Madame de Langhans, burst in twain, in a very natural and fine manner, and she is seen raising it up with one arm, while she holds in the other her little infant, who also appears struggling to free itself from the confinement of the grave. I do not know that I ever saw a more pleasing monument; the attitudes and effect are surprisingly natural, and the beauty of the mother and her little innocent are well calculated to excite a lively interest in the beholder. You will see a good engraving of it in one of my port folios if you will apply to my friends in—

We entered Berne by a fine bridge of hewn free stone built over the Aar.—At the gate which terminates it our passports were demanded, but returned to us last night visited by the proper authorities.

From the appearance of Berne without, a stranger is surprised to find a large, beautiful, and regular city; the houses on every street supported by arcades, which afford a covered walk all over the place, and under which are all the shops. Nothing but carriages and servants washing at the fountains, are seen in the streets, and to facilitate crossing the streets in dirty weather, large flags, raised above the level of the pavement (like those in Philadelphia) are placed in the most convenient places. The houses are all built of freestone, of a delicate olive colour, and, independent of the ornament of arcades, are generally of handsome architecture. The public buildings are magnificent; particularly the hospital, which would do honour to a large capital.

The cathedral is an ancient, noble structure, uniting solidity with beauty. It is placed on a terrace of enormous height, supported by the highest stone wall I ever saw; I believe it is seventy feet. It is planted with rows of trees, and forms the principal promenade of the inhabitants. The view of the surrounding country is both extensive, and grand; perhaps it is one of the finest in Switzerland, as it commands the winding of the Aar through a rich and highly romantic country, and extends to the Alps of Grindenwald, which are among the highest and most beautiful glaciers. At the rising and setting of the sun these snow-capt mountains assume a splendour which is scarcely to be imagined by a person who has never seen them, and which I candidly confess to you I never formed an idea of.

I must here, once for all, beg your indulgence for the enthusiasm with which you will perceive I am, and may be tempted to describe (perhaps too often) the grand scenes which nature delights to display in Switzerland. It may very probably be tiresome to you; but I am well convinced that any one who has ever been in this extraordinary country, and possesses the slightest taste, for its beauties, would with a kindred feeling read, and not condemn, my apparently extravagant descriptions, and most assuredly never consider them as romantic or too exaggerated. I may also perhaps permit myself to enter into too minute details of my proceedings, by informing you of my almost hourly adventures; but in a country so singular and so interesting as this, where every mile presents something new and worthy of observation, I am really loth to omit informing you of every thing I see and do, and would rather run the risk of incurring your censure for tedious narrative, than by too concise a communication leave you ignorant of what I wish you to be acquainted with.

Berne, though it appears low from the neighbouring country which is very elevated and broken into various forms, is nevertheless situated pretty high. It is almost insulated by the Aar, which flows round three sides of it. Every thing within and without gives the idea of moderate but competent wealth, industry, and attention to public convenience; indeed this is the case throughout Switzerland, where public spirit prevailed more than in any other country. The revolution has, however, made some difference, as it has dissipated all the public and contracted by its acquisitions all the private means. Besides this, it has created a jealousy which has proved destructive to all friendly intercourse, and has absolutely destroyed the society which rendered Switzerland the favorite resort of the elegant and the literary. I am tired out with hearing the complaints of the different parties; every one appears discontented and accuses his neighbour as being concerned in bringing about the dreadful change.

October 22.

We are just returned from an excursion to the valley and glaciers of Grindenwald, which even at this late season has afforded us a pleasure of the highest kind this country affords.

The weather proving very fine on the 18th, and promising a continuance, we left Berne after dinner, accompanied only by one servant and carrying a small bundle of necessaries—a noble road enabled us to arrive in three hours at the town of Thun, situated at one end of the lake of the same name, on the banks of the Aar, just where that river issues from it. We passed the night here, and were not a little amused with the loquacity of our landlord, who was a perfect Boniface. Finding we were Americans, he came into our room, uninvited, to tell us that he knew Dr. Franklin at Paris, where he said he once cut a figure, but spending all his money he was compelled to retire to this place where he was not well known, and turn inn-keeper. He professed also to have been an intimate acquaintance of Voltaire and Rousseau, of whom he recounted many anecdotes, and he diverted us with a description of the information he gave to Coxe the traveller, who he assured us, with great pride, staid several days to converse with him respecting Switzerland.

Very early next morning we embarked in one of the flat-bottomed barques of the place, and had got half over the lake (which is five or six leagues long) before a heavy fog that had plagued us for a couple of hours was completely dissipated. We were then much delighted with the grandeur of the mountains which shut in this beautiful piece of water, and which at this season presented a singular spectacle; their tops being covered with snow, (a circumstance that scarcely ever happens in summer) which extended as far as the cold region, below which was verdure intermingled with forests, villages, and chateaux.

After a few hours rowing we were landed at a lone house called the New Haus, from whence we walked two miles to the village of Interlaken. A short distance from it, we passed through the small one of Unterseen, where are the ruins of an old castle, but which have no picturesque or romantic beauty. At Interlaken we hired a char-a-banc, or low cart, the seats of which were hung upon leathern springs—As we were much jolted in our journey up the rugged vallies, we preferred walking the greater part of the way; particularly as we could more leisurely admire the savage scenery of the Alps, among which we were now entering. Black pine and larch forests, impending rocks, and rapid torrents which dashed along over their stony beds, were the chief features of the wild vallies we passed through.

It was nearly dark when we came to the little hamlet of Grindenwald, where we found tolerable accommodations in the small auberge of the place, from the windows of which we could see nothing but bleak prospects, rendered more dreary by the approach of winter. The chalets or little log huts built on the plains which are found high up the mountains, and to which the herdsmen drive their cattle in summer, were now quite deserted and half buried in snow. Some of these chalets are found at an amazing height, and have a very romantic and solitary appearance when seen from the vallies.

LAW INTELLIGENCE. COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

LITERARY PROPERTY.

Hirre v. Dale.

Mr. Scarlett opened the pleadings. The declaration stated, that the plaintiff was the proprietor and had the copy-right of a song called 'Abraham Newland,' that he had a right to print and publish the same, and that the defendant injuriously printed a number of these songs in violation of this copy-right.

There were two counts in the declaration: it was described as a poem, as a copy of verses, and as a song.

Mr. Erskine stated to his Lordship and the gentlemen of the jury, that the plaintiff, in this action, was a music seller at Liverpool, and that the defendant was in the same way of business in this town. This case might be considered by many as of small importance; but that was always of importance, that was attended with benefit.

Lord Ellenborough here asked if this song was entered at Stationers' Hall, pursuant to the statute of Anne?

Mr. Erskine said it was not, and that it was not necessary in an action; it was only necessary to be entered for the purpose of penalties.

His Lordship asked, if this song was a book?

Mr. Erskine replied, that he should most clearly bring it within his Lordship's jurisdiction. The subject matter of this action was this: Mr. Dibdin, who is a man of humour and genius, composed a little poem, which afterwards, in different parts of England, was set to music; and it was a poem on the same subject, which had occupied the greatest poets in the world in all ages. No man was better acquainted with all the learning of the ancient world than his Lordship. This subject had occupied the poets of all times—The love of Money. From the time of the Greeks down to the time of our own satirists, on this very topic:

O cives, cives, querenda pecunia primum est:
Virtus post nummos.

Money, they said, produced many virtues, and a great many vices. But suppose there was a correct translation of these poets, he did not think it was probable their beauties were likely to engross the attention of the mass of mankind. Sir Joshua Reynolds, who was a great master in painting, used to say, that 'it required great taste to see that which was excellent in the fine arts.' A vulgar man would be apt to set the same value on the paintings at Vauxhall, as on those of Reubens, or of the first masters of the art. Mr. Dibdin did not address his verses so much to the learned, as to the mass of mankind. He chose for his subject the over-ruling power of money; and as Mr. Abraham Newland was the great representative of our currency, which had so long stood its ground, and which was likely so to do, it had been called after his name. The learned counsel here read part of the song:

O brave Abraham Newland,
Notify'd Abraham Newland;
I've heard people say,
That sham Abraham you may;
But you must not sham Abraham Newland.

This song was merely meant to represent the value of our paper credit, the name of Abraham Newland being subscribed to all our notes. Without entering into the merits or demerits of this poem, whether it was good or bad, it certainly had a great number of readers. It had been heard in theatres, and had been set to music, though it was not for the music, but only for the words, this action was brought.

Lord Ellenborough wished to see the 8th of Anne, relative to this subject.

Mr. Erskine observed, that some time ago this was matter of great controversy among the greatest Judges; and Lord Mansfield considered it as a common law right. That independent of the statute, there was a right vested in every person who was the author of every composition, to prevent any other person depriving him of the fruits of his ingenuity. Other Judges entertained different opinions on this subject. They held, while your bird was in your cage, it was yours; while your book was in your closet, it was your property; but the moment it was published, it was competent to others not only to read it, but to copy it. To put an end to all disputes on this subject, the Legislature, in the time of Q. Anne, gave the author a vested interest in his work for fourteen years, and, if he was living at the end of that period, for another fourteen years. There were penalties annexed to the breach of the copy right, which were not sought to be recovered by this action. But, in order to recover the penalties, Legislature required the observance of certain forms and ceremonies, as, that it should be entered at Stationers' Hall, &c.

Lord Ellenborough here observed, that the vesting clause was detached from the penal clause.

Mr. Erskine observed, that Mr. Dibdin having composed this little poem, it was set to music, and he had a witness who used to sing it on the stage at Liverpool. His learned friend perhaps might say, if you allow a man to sing it on the stage, you have lost your copy-right. But that he denied. Nothing could make it more public than a publication, which had not that effect.

Lord Ellenborough asked if they could make this song a book; it was only one sheet, and the word in the Act was book. If Mr. Erskine put it on the common law right of the party, his lordship said he had an opinion on that point.

Mr. Erskine said, he should never desire his lordship to decide it on that ground. It had ever been decided, that a song is within the act of parliament.

Lord Ellenborough said, that score might be a print. He asked the learned counsel if they had any decision that a song was a book within the meaning of the act of parliament?

Mr. Erskine said it had been so decided.

Lord Ellenborough said, he rather doubted whether there had been any such decision. His lordship adverted to the cases of Becket, Donaldson, Miller, &c.

Mr. Erskine supposed, if he had written a poem of 2000 stanzas, or of twenty, that, he contended, gave him a copy-right to that composition, which was the work of the human mind, without regard to the length of it.

Lord Ellenborough said, the term used in the act was book, which he thought was material, considering the regulations on this subject, in the time of Charles the second. His lordship after looking at the act of parliament, thought they could hardly get on with this case. If it is to be a book, said his lordship, I shall not extend it. After having been at some pains to understand this subject, I cannot agree in the opinion of Mr. J. Yates.

Mr. Erskine said, what he contended was this, that this composition was a poem, and that the law applied to a poem, whether it was long or short. This song was only one sheet, how many pages must it consist of to constitute a book? Must it have three or four, or how many?

Lord Ellenborough said, he was quite clear in the statute, it must consist of a plurality of sheets.

Mr. Erskine said, if this poem had been printed in large letters, it might have been made to amount to several sheets.

Lord Ellenborough said it was very likely they might have spun it out to make it a book.

Mr. Erskine hoped his lordship would save the point.

Lord Ellenborough said, he was of opinion this was not a book. He did not know how far this might be carried. What was to be said of an handbill, or of a single advertisement? This thing is neither stitched, nor does it consist of a variety of sheets. Perhaps it might be said, a book is that which consists of a number of sheets stitched or bound. He did not say that was a perfectly correct definition of a book; but he was clear that a single sheet unstitched, was not a book within the meaning of the act; and therefore, said he, I think the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited, on this ground, that I am of opinion, that a song on a single sheet is not a book within the act of parliament.

Mr. Erskine said, his client had purchased it quite unconnected with music, and it was afterwards set to music from an idea it would be a popular song: but they did not pretend to have a copy-right in the music. Any body might sing the song as often as they pleased; but what the plaintiff complained of was, that the defendant had printed the words of the song.

Lord Ellenborough said, Mr. Erskine had opened to him the whole field of literary property, and the common law right of authors, on which there had been a great difference of opinion.

Mr. Erskine said, the case was sufficiently on his lordship's notes, if he should happen to move it.

Lord Ellenborough said, that two words put upon a card, or one word, might satisfy the act of parliament, if it were to be carried to the length contended for.

Mr. Erskine said, it was unnecessary to observe, that some of the works of Mr. Abraham Newland, though very small were extremely valuable.

Plaintiff nonsuited.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

When we consider the ravages committed in commonwealths by avarice, fraud, envy, rapine, flagrant injustice, and false friendship; when we remark that hypocrisy and baseness are so essential to the character of a democracy, that without them this form of government could not continue to cheat mankind, no not for an hour; when we see the vice of some, the madness of others, and the folly of all, engaged in this exploded polity, what slave so passive, what bigot so blind, what enthusiast so headlong, what politician so hardened as to stand up in defence of a system, CALCULATED FOR A CURSE TO MANKIND? No geometrical proposition, in any book of mathematical sciences, is more capable of the clearest proof than that a democracy has, from its very nature, all the weakness of Claudius Cæsar, with all his despotism, and all the dissimulation of Tiberius, without losing a particle of his malignity.

The following is a fine specimen of the descriptive powers of Mrs. RADCLIFFE.

Wandering over the garden, Vivaldi heard the voice of Ellena herself performing the midnight hymn to the Virgin, and accompanied by a lute, which she touched with most affecting and delicate expression. He stood for a moment entranced, and scarcely daring to breathe, lest he should lose any note of that meek and holy strain, which seemed to flow from a devotion, almost saintly. Then, looking round to discover the object of his admiration, a light issuing from among the bowery foliage of a clematis led him to a lattice, and shewed him Ellena. The lattice had been thrown open to admit the cool air, and he had a full view of her, and the apartment. She was rising from a small altar, when she had concluded the service; the glow of devotion was still upon her countenance, as she raised her eyes, and with a rapt earnestness, fixed them on the heavens. She still held the lute, but no longer awakened it, and seemed lost, for a moment, to every surrounding object. Her fine hair was negligently bound up in a silk net, and some tresses, that had escaped it, played on her neck and round her beautiful countenance, which now was not even partially concealed by a veil. The light drapery of her dress, her whole figure, air and attitude, were such as might have been copied for a Grecian nymph.

When Rousseau composed his Dissertation on the Equality of men, this eloquent philosopher sought for facts on which to found his reasonings; these he collected from an extensive perusal of voyages and accounts of remote nations. The more I meditate, the more I am convinced that all speculations are illusory and unsatisfactory, unless they are established on prominent facts, which are to be first collected before we venture to indulge metaphysical disquisitions. If we compare the labours of Machiavel with those of Montesquieu, we may observe, that the illustrious Frenchman had all the delicacy, the refinements and the sensibility of his nation, and his general reflections are therefore brilliant but often fallacious because not built on the permanent base of experience. The crafty Florentine, versed in the manners of princes, with sagacity equal to his genius, deduces all his reflections from those prominent facts, which passed under his eye, or which he collected from the records of instructive history. Lord Bacon introduced that wise philosophy which is only founded on experiments; the study of nature in her operations.

TO THE GENIUS OF SHAKSPEARE.

When first thine eyes beheld the light,
And nature, bursting on thy sight,
Pour'd on thy beating heart a kindred day;
Genius, the fire ey'd child of Fame,
Circled thy brows with mystic flame,
And, warm with hope, pronounc'd this prophet say:

Thee, darling boy, I give to know
Each viewless source of joy and woe,
For thee my vivid visions shall unfold;
Each form that freezes sense to stone,
Each phantom of the world unknown,
Shall flit before thine eyes, and waken thoughts untold.

The beat of purpose unavow'd;
Of hopes and fears the wildering crowd,
The incongruous train of wishes undefin'd;
Shall all be subjected to thee,
The excess of bliss and agony
Shall oft alternate seize thy high attemper'd mind.

Oft o'er the woody summer vale,
When evening breathes her balmy gale,
Oft by the wild brook's margin shalt thou rove,
When just above the western line
The clouds with richer radiance shine,
Yellowing the dark tops of the mountain grove.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

From a literary friend, eager in his search for the hidden treasures of Genius, and curious in his choice of them, we have the promise of several original letters from the pens of certain characters, distinguished for their attainments in elegant literature.

The 'Characters from the Picture Gallery in Congress' are too caricature, and partake strongly of the manner of Mynheer Van Diqu, of sign post memory.

Ever attentive to the suggestions of sensible women, we receive, with great pleasure, the advice of  who may be assured, that it shall be followed with all possible closeness.

Many favours from our correspondents shall be attended to, when time and place shall serve, as Dogberry says.

We hope to hear very often from Parmegiano and his friend.

'Sedley' has credit at our warehouse both for his talents and industry.

'An admirer of fine writing' has profited very little by his admiration.

'Censor' is too scurrilous.

'A young Bachelor,' if he please, may soon become a mature writer.

'Theatricus' never was present at a rehearsal, or took a peep behind the curtain. Independently of the talents of a few performers, we have much bad acting on the American stage, but it is no less true that we are troubled with much spurious criticism. Pope says somewhere,

Ten censure wrong for one who acts amys.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Haunt not thus the eye of sleep,
Thou object of my nightly dream!
Tinge not with distress more deep
Yon baleful planet's angry gleam.

Nor when day shall rule the sky
Let thy dreaded form be seen;
Fly, thou fatal vision, fly,
Be as if thou ne'er had'st been.

And yet—thou art the form belov'd,
Ere grief obscur'd my changeful day;
Which many a glow of transport mov'd,
And prompted many a lively lay.

And still I love thee—and for thee
Affection's fondest tear is shed;
Still beats my heart's quick pulse to see
Thy image hovering round my head.

But if one hope its bloom disclose
'Tis instant nipp'd by grim despair,
Who points to nought but future woes,
And tells me I have lost my fair.

Then fly! thou form of her I love!
Since thou can'st bring me nought but pain;
Till time shall every doubt remove,
And hope and joy be in thy train.

ITHACUS.

SELECTED POETRY.

[We are very enthusiastic admirers of the genius of Mr. Wordsworth, an Oxford scholar, an original poet, and, as it appears, an amiable and humane man. He seems to have found or made a new walk in poetry, and we doubt not he will have many admiring followers. We cannot refrain from adding, that his Lyrical Ballads have reached the third edition in a very short period, and that a majority of critics, as well as readers of taste, have agreed that he has, like Gay, discovered the secret of exhibiting the most pleasing and the most interesting thoughts in the simplest expression.]

THE OAK AND THE BROOM.

His simple truths did Andrew glean
Beside the babbling rills;
A careful student he had been
Among the woods and hills:
One winter's night, when through the trees
The wind was thundering, on his knees
His youngest born did Andrew hold;
And while the rest, a ruddy choir,
Were seated round their blazing fire,
This tale the shepherd told.

I saw a crag, a lofty stone,
As ever tempest beat,
Out of its head an oak had grown,
A broom out of its feet.
The time was March, a cheerful noon,
The thaw-wind, with the breath of June,
Breath'd gently from the warm south-west;
When, in a voice scdate with age,
This Oak, half giant and half sage,
His neighbour thus address'd:

Eight weary weeks, thro' rock and clay,
Along this mountain's edge,
The frost hath wrought both night and day,
Wedge driving after wedge.
Look up and think above your head
What trouble surely will be bred;
Last night I heard a crash—'tis true
The splinters took another road,
I see them yonder—what a load
For such a thing as you!

You are preparing, as before,
To deck your slender shape;
And yet, just three years back, no more,
You had a strange escape!
Down from yon cliff a fragment broke,
It came, you know, with fire and smoke,
And hither did it bend its way,
This pond'rous block was caught by me,
And o'er your head, as you may see,
'Tis hanging to this day.
The thing had better been asleep,
Whatever thing it were,
Or breeze, or bird, or fleece of sheep,
That first did plant you there,
For you and your green twigs decoy
The little, witless shepherd boy,
To come and slumber in your bower;
And, trust me, on some sultry noon,
Both you and he, heaven knows how soon,
Will perish in one hour.
From me this friendly warning take,
The Broom began to doze;
And thus, to keep herself awake,
Did gently interpose:
My thanks, for your discourse, are due,
I hat it is true, and more than true,
I know, and I have known it long,
Frail is the bond by which we hold
Our being, be we young or old,
Wise, foolish, weak, or strong.
Disasters, do the best we can,
Will reach both great and small;
And he is oft the wisest man,
Who is not wise at all.

For me, why should I wish to roam?
This spot is my paternal home.

It is my pleasant heritage,
My father, many a happy year,
Here spread his careless blossoms, here
Attain'd a good old age.

Even such as his may be my lot:

What cause have I to haunt
My heart with terrors? Am I not,
In truth, a favour'd plant?

The spring for me a garland weaves
Of yellow flowers and verdant leaves,
And, when the frost is in the sky,
My branches are so fresh and gay,
That you might look on me, and say
This plant can never die.

The butterfly, all green and gold,
To me hath often flown,
Here in my blossoms to behold
Wings lovely as his own.
When grass is chill with rain or dew
Beneath my shade the mother ewe
Lies with her infant lamb; I see
The love they to each other make,
And the sweet joy which they partake,
It is a joy to me.

Her voice was blithe, her heart was light,
The Broom might have pursued
Her speech until the stars of night
Their journey had renew'd.
But in the branches of the Oak
Two ravens now began to croak
Their nuptial song, a gladsome air;
And to her own green bower the breeze
That instant brought two stripling bees
To feed and innumur there.

One night the wind came from the north,
And blew a furious blast,
At break of day I ventur'd forth,
And near the cliff I pass'd:
The storm had fallen upon the Oak,
And struck him with a mighty stroke,
And whirl'd and whirl'd him far away,
And in one hospitable cleft
The little, careless Broom was left
To live for many a day.

SONG.

By COL. LOVELACE.

When Love, with unconfined wings,
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates;
When I lye tangled in her hair,
And fetter'd with her eye,
The birds that wanton in the air
Know no such libertye.

When flowing cups run swiftly round,
With no allaying Thames,
Our careless heads with roses crown'd,
Our hearts with loyal flames:
When thirsty griefe in wine we steep,
When healths and draughts goe free,
Fishes, that tittle in the deepe,
Know no such libertye.

When linnet like, confined I
With shriller notes shall sing
The mercy, sweetness, majesty,
And glories of my king,
When I shall voyce aloud how good
He is, how great should be,
The enlarged windes, that curle the flood,
Know no such libertye.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron barres a cage,
Mindes innocent and quiet, take
That for an hermitage;
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soar above,
Enjoy such libertye.

[The following extravagant rhymes are copied from 'Select Ayres, printed by J. Playford, 1669.' The unknown author displays some of the beauties and perhaps more of the blemishes of Cowley.]

Tell me, ye wand'ring spirits of the air,
Did you not see a nymph more bright, more fair
Than Beauty's darling, or of looks more sweet
Than stolen Content? If such a one ye meet,
Wait on her hourly, wheresoe'er she flies,
And cry, and cry, Amyntor for her absence dies.

Go, search the vallies, pluck up every rose,
You'll find a scent, a blush of her in those;
Fish, fish for pearl or coral, there you'll see
How oriental all her colours be;
Go, call the echoes to your aid, and cry
Chloris, Chloris, for that's her name for whom I die.

But stay awhile, I have inform'd you ill,
Were she on earth, she had been with me still;
Go, fly to heaven, examine every sphere,
And try what star hath lately lighted there;
If any, brighter than the sun, you see,
Fall down, fall down, and worship it, for that is she!

Epigram on receiving an orange from Miss—

Now, Priam's son, thou may'st be mute,
For I can blithely boast with thee
Thou to the fairest gave the fruit,
The fairest gave the fruit to me.

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

Section 3.....Application of the same principles in the Philippic of Demosthenes, intituled, Of the Chersonesus.

THOSE things which are wanting to those persons, who have no other faculties but those of their souls, are above all others, method and reasoning; it is that series of ideas, fortified one by another; that accumulation of proofs, which goes on constantly increasing, until the orator, domineering from on high, as from a centre of light, finishes by giving an impetuous shock to all this mass, and overwhelms his adversaries in it. It is then that emotions, as I have before hinted, decide the victory; but it is necessary that reasonings should have prepared the way for it; without this, emotions shock, but do not overthrow. Let imperious truth force from every mind this secret and involuntary assent, 'he is in the right;' it is then that the orator, who feels himself the master, commands in fact, or rather reason commands for him, and we all obey.

These are the tactics of Demosthenes in his deliberative orations, which compose the greatest part of his works, and which, under different titles, are all Philippics, since they have all the same object, that of awakening the indolence of the Athenians, and arming them against the insidious ambition of Philip.

We must comprehend, under this name, not only the four harangues, which especially bear the title of Philippics, but all those which have for their object the contests of Philip with the Greeks and the Athenians, such as the three which are commonly called the Pynthiacks, that which turns upon the peace proposed by the king of Macedonia, that which was pronounced upon the occasion of a letter of this prince, and that which is intituled, 'of the Chersonesus.' These compose ten harangues, and this last is, in my opinion, the most beautiful; but all of them may be regarded as models. We find not in them, indeed, the great paintings, the sublime emotions, the vast developments of the orations for the crown, nor that species of contention so lively as so terrible, which belongs to the judiciary kind, where two wrestlers exert themselves body to body. But we should also remark the particular, and perhaps singular advantage, attached to this last subject, this great quarrel of Eschines with Demosthenes. We should represent to ourselves all Greece assembled in Athens, to hear the two most famous orators in their own cause. And what cause? The man, who, for twenty years, had governed Athens and Greece by his eloquence, opposing to the attacks, the most malicious and furious, of hatred and calumny, the painting, as beautiful as it is faithful, of his own administration, that is to say, the history of the Greeks at the same time with his own. The interest of events was united here with that of the prosecution. Demosthenes, in defending his own glory, defended that of Athens and the Greeks. His soul must have been, at once, elevated by all the sentiments of national grandeur, and heated by all the emotions of personal indignation. He had before him his adversary and Greece: the latter honours him, the former insults him. What ought he not to do, what could he not do, to be worthy of one, and to triumph over the other? It was in reality, between Eschines and Demosthenes, a combat for life, for in Athens, as well as in Rome, banishment was a sort of capital punishment. This assemblage of circumstances so important, rendered his discourse susceptible of all the kinds of eloquence: the poignant bitterness of refutations and criminations, the loftiness of political ideas, all the inflammation of glory and patriotism, united naturally in a pleading of this nature, and all are here found in the highest degree. Let us never forget that genius is more or less elevated by the subject, and that men are made great by things, as things are by men.

The merit of the Philippics is that which properly belongs to deliberative eloquence, a discussion animated, energetic, luminous; a series of reasonings, which fortify each other one after another, and which leave neither time to breathe, nor the idea of contradiction; forms simple, sometimes even familiar, but of that decent, and in some sort noble familiarity, which with the precision, purity, and rapidity of diction, composed what the ancients called Atticism.

I have thought that, even without a perfect knowledge of the affairs of Greece, necessary only to those who would investigate freely the spirit of her orators, certain morsels, chosen from their writings, might please the greatest number of readers. But I have not thought I could do better, to give a more extensive idea of the most famous of all the masters of speech, than by translating entire one of his Philippics. I have chosen that which has for its title 'Of the Chersonesus.' It is not long, and never orator was less diffuse than Demosthenes. It is true, that, in this respect, the taste of the Athenians was a rule and a measure to the public speakers. That ingenious and delicate people were not pleased to have their leisure abused, nor to perceive their understanding distrusted. They picqued themselves upon understanding at half a word, and it often happened that those were interrupted in the tribune who spoke not directly to the point. We may judge of this kind of severity by a word of Phocion. He was renowned for a singular conciseness, and by diction, austere and rigid, like his manners. His nervous laconism prevailed more than once over the atticism of Demosthenes, who said of him 'it is a cleaver that cuts off my discourse.' Phocion one day, when he was preparing to mount the tribune, appeared to be absent in mind and deep in thought: when they asked him the reason of it, he said 'I am thinking how I shall abridge what I have to say.' This temperance and sobriety of words is very far distant from that verbose ambition, which is affected, among us, by the orators of the bar. It seems as if the merit of a discourse was measured by its duration. They were as well satisfied to have talked a long time, as they could have been to have talked well. Besides this, the generality of clients judge in the same manner, and imagine that their advocate has never said enough; but the foolery of those who habitually attend, and give reputations at the courts of judicature in the palace, come in aid of this ridiculous prejudice. You would hear them say, with a tone of emphatic admiration, 'Mr. Such-a-one spoke two hours, the attorney-general spoke four hours.' Reason might conclude, for the most part, that they had sold a great deal of nonsense: but ignorance concludes very differently, and hears it all with ecstasy.

The difference between the ancients and us arises from that of government. When every citizen is admitted to speak of public affairs, according to the law and the occasion, a disgust at prolixity, and the merit of precision are easily perceived, and the common rule of judgment is the importance of matter, and the faculty which each man has for treating it. But when it is the trade of a small number to speak in public, and when this profession is circumscribed in a narrow and private sphere, they extend themselves so much the more in words, as they are more confined in their objects; they turn themselves round on every side, that they may occupy as much space as they can. It is thus that a pleading, concerning a will or an entail, is commonly much longer than any of the orations of Demosthenes or Cicero, concerning the highest interest of the public, or affairs of the greatest consideration. Of the ten Philippics there is not one which exceeds half an hour in reading. The longest pleadings of Cicero or Demosthenes would not hold more than an hour: and that for the Crown, the most extensive of all, that master piece so rich in every respect, which contains, as it ought, so many objects, did not require for its pronounciation more than an hour, if we exclude the reading of the public acts, which were the evidence of facts.

A short sketch of the respective situations of Philip and the Greeks, at this epocha, will suffice to place every one in a state to comprehend the orator, whom I am about to set to speaking in our language.

Philip, whose ambition was not bounded by his small dominions, and whose talents were far greater than his hereditary power, had formed the bold project of domineering in Greece. This was a great enterprise for a king of Macedonians, a nation hitherto despised by the Greeks, who considered them as barbarians. Philip, become at once a politician and a warrior in the school of Pelopidas, the Theban, who had instructed him in his youth, took advantage of the lessons of a great man, who had cultivated in him his natural faculties. He created a military power, very much as Frederic did in our days, and thus prepared for him the conquest of Asia, by subjugating Greece to his views. His army soon became formidable; it was composed of the Macedonian phalanx, a body of infantry which was invincible until it was opposed by the Roman legions, and the Thessalian cavalry, the best that was then known, and which afterwards obtained for Pyrrhus his first victory over the Romans. He formed generals who were afterwards esteemed among the best of Alexander, such as Attalus and Parmenio. With these troops, conducted by chiefs of such merit, well provided, and always in action, he threw himself rapidly into the different countries of Greece, according to such occasions he knew how to prepare, to expect or to seize; for it was his policy still more than his power, which obtained his successes. He found, it is true, great facilities in that spirit of jealousy, of distrust, and rivalry, which animated the Grecian republics one against the other, and excited continual divisions. Philip, prodigal of oaths, of caresses, and of money, had every where instruments and orators in his pay; and they easily deceived the multitude, who are never more enslaved than when they think they command. It was by the aid of these mercenary agents, that he directed, from afar, all the resolutions of these several states, some of them stronger and others weaker; and when he had set them at variance, he never failed to interpose in the quarrel, and, under the pretext of assisting one against the other, he finished by plundering both. It was in this manner that he obtained possession of the Pass of Thermopylae, and the country of the Phocians, which opened to him Attica; that he had made himself master of Euboea, which, on the side of the sea, held in respect, merely by her position, all the territory of Athens; that finally he had taken Amphipolis, and many other cities, both in Thrace and Thessaly. Cersobleptes, one of the petty kings of Thrace, dreading his enterprises, and wishing to engage against him the support of the Athenians, had taken the precaution to cede to them the Chersonesus, a peninsula advantageously situated upon the Hellespont, and which might be very useful to a nation powerful at sea, such as Athens was at that time. Cardia, one of the principal cities of this peninsula, had refused to submit, like the others, to the Athenian domination, and had thrown herself under the protection of Philip, who had, at that time, an army in Thrace. Athens, which had sent a colony into the Chersonesus, caused it to be supported by troops, instructed to watch Philip. Diopithes, who commanded them, regarding, with reason, as an hostility, the protection which this prince granted to the Cardians, invaded the lands which he possessed in maritime Thrace, pillaged and ravaged them, and carried off a rich booty, which he placed in safety in the Chersonesus. Philip, too much engaged in other things, to take vengeance for it, made great complaints to the Athenians, under pretence that there had not been between him and them any declaration of war. He claimed the security of treaties, which he had been the first to violate, and his creatures exert themselves to support his pretensions, and are outrageous against Diopithes. They demand his recall, that another general should be sent to force him to submission, in case of resistance, and that satisfaction should be given to Philip. This sordid cowardice could not fail to arouse Demosthenes. He ascended the tribunal, and spoke thus:

"It is proper, Athenians, that those who address you, from this tribunal, all equally exempt from complaisance or animosity, should think only of announcing what appears to them the best to be done, especially when we have under deliberation the great interest of the public. But, since there are, among our orators, some, who allow themselves to be influenced, either by a spirit of contention and jealousy, or by other personal motives, it is your interest, at least, to lay aside all these private considerations, and employ yourselves only in resolving and executing what you judge useful to the state.

"What is the subject of deliberation at this time?—The Chersonesus, menaced by Philip, who, for eleven months, has been in Thrace with an army. And of whom do your orators speak to you? Of the operations and enterprises of Diopithes. For myself, I consider, as of very little importance, the accusations brought against one of your generals, whom you may, when you will, pursue according to the laws, either immediately, or at another time. It is of little moment at what time. And I see no reason why myself or any other should be inflamed with any zeal upon such a subject. But all which has a tendency to divert our attention from Philip, our enemy, Philip, whose troops cover the shores of the Hellespont, which you can neither relieve nor recover, if you miss the opportunity, is urgent. On this we must resolve at once, without permitting vain and tumultuous altercations to make you lose sight of it.

"I cannot hear, without astonishment, I acknowledge, many things which are said in your assemblies. But nothing has surprised me more than what has been said, in my presence, in the senate, that whoever proposed to speak to you, in the present circumstances, ought to declare formally, whether he advised to war or peace—No—We are not in this situation. If Philip were inactive, if he had not violated his treaties with us, seized your possessions, if he did not excite insurrections, and arm against you the people at the same time when he attacks them to himself, without doubt, it would be in your power to remain in peace, and, as far as you are concerned, I see you are well disposed to it, as it is possible to be. But if, on one hand, we have under our eyes the treaties which he has sworn to observe with us, if, on the other, it is manifest, that even before Diopithes departed from these walls at the head of that colony, which is reproached, at this day, as the cause of the war, Philip, in defiance of all justice and all law, had already made himself master of what belonged to you; if your own decrees, passed upon this subject, accuse decidedly these violations of engagements taken with you; if on all occasions, when he has connected himself with Greeks or barbarians, he has evidently had no other object than to make war against you, what signifies all that has been said to you, that you must choose between war and peace? Ah! you have no longer any choice; there remains to you but one part to take, which is at once that of justice and necessity: it is to repel the aggressor: and this the only course, of which they say nothing to you. Can it be pretended, that Philip, provided he attacks not Attica, the Pyrrum, or our very walls, does us no injury, and is not at war with us? But I cannot believe, Athenians, that those, who would establish such rules of equity, and would thus mark the limits of war and peace, can appear to you to have an idea of what justice prescribes, of that which you can maintain without disgrace, or of that which your safety requires. Moreover, they do not perceive that they themselves, while they thus argue, justify Diopithes, whom they accuse. For why should Philip be permitted to do what he pleases, provided he does not invade Attica, if it is not permitted to Diopithes to succour the Thracians without being accused of provoking a war? But they say, we must not suffer mercenary soldiers to ravage the shores of the Hellespont, nor Diopithes, by hiring foreign vessels, to exercise the trade of a pirate. Be it so: I am convinced of the good intentions of those who hold this language: no doubt they have no other interest than that of equity and the state. In this case I have only one question to ask them, and it is this—when they shall have dispersed and annihilated your army, by defaming the general, who has found, in his own resources, the means of maintaining it, will they please to inform us, what they will do to annihilate also the army of Philip? If they remain, without giving us an answer, it is clear, Athenians, that they have but one object; it is to reduce you to the same state of things, which, in these latter times, has given so fatal a blow to the power of Athens. You know that nothing has given to Philip such advantages over us, as having always an army on foot, which puts it in his power to seize every opportunity. He anticipates you every where, because that having deliberated at leisure with himself, he acts, on a sudden, when it pleases him. He attacks; he overthrows. We, on the contrary, never commence our long and tumultuary preparations till intelligence of his invasions is brought to us. What is the consequence? That which must always happen to those who take their measures too late. He preserves without danger, what he has taken without opposition; and we, after great and useless expenses, after many superfluous efforts, after having vainly demonstrated all possible disposition to counteract and to hurt him, what remains to us? Impotence and disgrace.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.

[In No. 9 of the Port Folio, a brief sketch of the dramatic life of Mr. Cooper has been attempted. At New-York, some friend of this celebrated actor has filled up our outline, and we now have it in our power to present to the public a more complete picture, than the penury of materials enabled our artist to furnish.]

His friends, Godwin and Holcroft, who were convinced that he possessed the requisites for a performer of eminence, sent him on a tour of improvement on the provincial theatres. They expected that he would thus acquire an acquaintance with the stage, and prepare himself for the theatres of the metropolis. An evil genius seemed still to provide over his wanderings. He appeared to the managers in whose corps he was enlisted as a raw recruit who possessed no talents for the profession. Characters of importance were considered utterly beyond his reach. Those of inferior rank he played without success, and he degenerated into a mere letter carrier. In this manner he murdered a few months, starving on a paltry salary and then, abandoning his irksome and degrading situation, travelled on foot to London.

Mr. Cooper's friends now abandoned the idea of practice on provincial stages: Mr. Holcroft again took him in hand, and selected some of Shakspeare's most distinguished characters for his instruction. He made him recite passages and would explain the nature of the characters, the situations in which they were placed, the passions by which they were influenced. Thus he taught him that great requisite of a performer to conceive the intention of the author, and enter into the feelings of the character. After some months close attention, in which the extraordinary talents of his youthful pupil were rapidly evolved, he was thought ready for a public appearance. He accordingly at the early age of 18 performed in one week the arduous characters of Hamlet and Macbeth, on the boards of Covent Garden, to overflowing houses, and with the most flattering applause.

On this subject we have heard that Mr. Tyler, at present of the New-York Theatre, had belonged to one of the provincial companies in which Cooper had held a very humble station. Mr. Tyler forming other engagements with Mr. Henry, quitted the British for the American stage. Shortly after his arrival, he received a letter from one of his Thespian friends, who after regaling him with a variety of Green room history, added, and now prepare yourself for astonishment. That identical Mr. Cooper who a few months ago was playing the very underling characters at our theatre, and who appeared extremely incompetent, is now performing Hamlet with applause at London!

After Mr. Cooper had met so favourable a reception from the London audience, he was offered a liberal engagement; but as he was not yet capable of sustaining a line of characters, he was expected to take such business as he was able to perform. This engagement he declined. 'Aut Cæsar aut nullus' seems to have been already his object and he refused any secondary situation. He accordingly retired to the country, where he employed himself in cultivating his dramatic talent.

Shortly after this period Mr. Wignell who had visited England for the purpose of raising a reinforcement for the Philadelphia company, heard of him. He immediately entered into a negotiation which was promptly concluded, and in a few days from its commencement Mr. Cooper was on the Atlantic, voyaging to America.

The Philadelphians were slow at discovering his merits. His line of acting interfered with that of their favourite performers, and as he had many careless and some dissipated habits, he was far from being a favourite. This was particularly evidenced at his benefit, for which there were only a few seats taken. This did not affect Cooper's pocket, for his benefit was guaranteed to a certain amount by his engagement with the manager. It however affected his pride, and he was determined to avoid the disgrace attendant on 'a beggarly account of empty boxes.' He therefore closed a bargain for sixty dollars with the man who owned the Elephant. Play-bills were posted up in all directions, advertising in letters of the largest size, that the Elephant would be introduced on the stage; curiosity was all alive, and Cooper, aided by his Elephant was honoured with an overflow.

When the winter campaign had closed, the company made a summer excursion to New-York. The circus was fitted up for the purpose, and the most admirable acting ever witnessed in America was then exhibited. Cooper, Fennel, Moreton, Harwood and Bernard were the most prominent male performers, and Mrs. Merry sustained the heroine in a style of great perfection. The season opened with Venice Preserved, in which Cooper, as Pierre made an indelible impression on the audience. A coldness had for sometime subsisted between him and the manager: which induced a wish to change his situation. His engagement bound him in a penalty of about two thousand dollars, but this it was alleged had been already broken on the managers part. In short the sum was subscribed by a number of gentlemen, who engaged to advance it if necessary, and Mr. Cooper was transferred to the New-York Theatre.

With the exception of one season, in which he was at Philadelphia where he also became a great favourite, Mr. Cooper continued in New-York till January, 1803. He then received an invitation from London. Kemble had quarrelled with Drury Lane Theatre, had left it and gone on a tour to the continent of Europe. Cooper was invited to come if he felt confidence for the attempt, and was proffered Kemble's situation if it should appear that he could sufficiently satisfy the town. He accordingly went, but does not seem to have succeeded in London equal to the expectation of his friends. His performances have been received with much applause, but the people there having formed their taste, on the acting of Cooke and Kemble, or from his real inferiority to those gentlemen, did not consider him equal to their favourites. He has since been performing at Liverpool, with great eclat: it is rumoured, that he has concluded an engagement with the manager at Drury Lane; but, many persons entertain hopes that he may yet be restored to the American stage.

Mr. Cooper is rather above the middle size, well proportioned, with a handsome and expressive countenance, fine form, intelligent eye, and a voice admirably adapted to the stage. He excelled in the weightier characters of the drama; while, in those of a secondary nature, he was generally careless and indifferent. His performance was particularly ever distinguished for chasteness, character and energy.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ORIGINAL CRITICISM.

In the year 1797, when the ardour of British loyalty was, as now, expressed by the formation of numerous armed associations for the defence of the country, in various parts of the kingdom, a poem was published, intitled The Volunteer. It was treated with much unmerited neglect by many of the reviewers, and with a scurrility beneath the dignity of criticism by others. That it has faults cannot be denied—What human performance is without them? Yet, had criticism assumed the smiling aspect of admonition, instead of the chilling frown of contempt, there is sufficient reason to suppose, that the piece might, in another edition, have been much improved, and the writer induced to cultivate a genius, which would have led him to the highest pinnacle of poetic glory. Indeed, to the irregularity of genius his faults are principally to be attributed. When I say that the author is gone to his final account, that he was my intimate and beloved friend, and that I might, in some respects, be looked upon as the foster father of the poem, having corrected the sheets as they passed through the press, I may be supposed to speak of it with some degree of partiality. Yet the following extracts are given under a firm persuasion that they will prove these observations not altogether unfounded. The description of a warrior, reposing after the toils of battle, is in the highest style of poetic excellence, and the close of it entirely original.

Thus, seeking rest from toils he long has tried,
The hero throws his pond'rous arms aside;
Spoils for the Loves the glittering arms afford,
And puny fingers grasp the reeking sword,
Exulting out, the rounding buckler climbs,
This in the breast-plate hides his little limbs;
Long struggling that at length uprears the plume,
Down drops the casque—the pigmy finds a tomb;
He staggering falls—loud clangors dash the ground,
While through the group the tittering laugh goes round.

Let these lines be compared with the verses on a similar occasion, by Tickell, and they will lose nothing in the comparison.

So, in the painter's animated frame,
Where Mars embraces the soft Paphian dame,
The little Loves in sport his faulchion wield,
Or join their strength to heave his ponderous shield,

Or strokes the plume in Tityon's blood embued,
And one the spear that reeks with Typhou's blood,
Another's infant brows the helm sustain,
He nods his crest, and frights the shrinking train.

Tickell's Prospect of Peace.

He thus indignantly apostrophizes the phantom of modern philosophy:

Find then a clime congenial to thy mind,
Stern like thyself, that frowns on all mankind;
The icy fane thy theorists may rear,
And thy cold frost-work virtues worship there;
Freeze there to apathy thine iron form,
Or woo the gloomy giant of the storm;
Resume the demon thou hast been before,
Enjoy your loves, and scourge the world no more;
Whilst round thy shore the howling blast shall sweep,
And storms forever rend the restless deep.

Having dwelt on the miseries of revolutionized France, he turns to a contemplation of his native country. The admirers of genuine poetry must be highly gratified with this passage; the sketch of Sydney's death, at the close, is drawn by the hand of a master.

Yet whilst in Horror's ear these tumults die,
My native country steals upon mine eye:
Age of Elizabeth, to thee I turn,
And feel the Briton in my bosom burn;
Then, England, did'st thou bask thy giant pride,
Surrounding nations shrinking by thy side;
Thy chiefs, the sons of nature's vigorous youth
High-born, their virtues of majestic growth;
Experience watching o'er the sacred pile,
Whose welfare is the welfare of the isle;
Valour, that grasps the sword, and breathes a prayer,
And Temperance, bounding from his frugal fare;
There, like a Pharo o'er misfortune's flood,
Towers unimpassioned, awful Fortitude;
Unfelt, hot lightnings hissing scorch his hair,
Below his broken pinions flash Despair—
Yet 'mongst the ranks that crowd the dome of Fame,
A softer virtue founds her noblest claim—
The rose of Chivalry, the Muses' friend,
Oh! gallant Sydney! glorious was his end,
His parch'd lips touch the draught, he hears a cry,
'Tis Anguish, panting with convulsive eye;
He feebly turns the cup aside, and sighs,
'Save that poor soldier!'—thirsts no more, and dies.

The emigration of the French priests, and their kind reception in England, is thus alluded to:

Thus late retiring from their native coast,
Themselves who weep not, but their country lost;
By furies from their homes, their altars driven,
They come, a virtuous band—the priests of heaven;
The hand that pour'd the oil to soothe their woes,
Now draws the sword in freedom's sacred cause.

The following is an animated and not incorrect description of a military parade, previous to the troops taking the field:

Then the long ranks of generous soldiers come,
Whilst thrills the liquid flute and rolls the drum;
Onward they march, no mercenary band,
But arm'd spontaneous for their native land,
Flush'd with no frantic zeal, by meteor led,
Or spectre beckoning round the midnight bed;
To drink no brother's blood their swords are drawn,
Or persecute where iron despoils frown;
To freedom and their King their vows prefer'd,
Who rally round the fane their fathers rear'd;
Protecting Youth extends his arm to save
From insult, Age, who seeks a quiet grave;
Stands the pale virgin, in mute anguish lost,
Whose glowing lover joins the gallant host;
Who feels conflicting passions tear his breast,
Till indignation triumphs o'er the rest;
There thousands kneeling lift the streaming eye,
The breathing pray'r floats trembling to the sky;
Oh! by sweet Mercy usher'd, may it bring Descending Concord hovering on its wing.

Many other passages of equal merit might be quoted, but let these suffice. I have performed what I have long considered as a duty to the memory of a man of worth. If praise comes now, it comes too late, and he is equally beyond the reach of censure. Yet he still lives in the remembrance of his friends, and many, into whose hands this slight notice may chance to fall, will not refuse to mingle their sighs for his loss with those of

Excursion to the Glaciers of Grindenwald.

All mountains, whose summits are eternally covered with snow and ice, are called glaciers; but what is generally understood by the term glacier is an immense collection of ice, which in a long course of time has fallen from the tops of the mountains, filled up the space between them, and even descended into the vallies. Such accumulations are the celebrated glaciers of Grindenwald, which have attracted the curiosity of strangers for ages, and which are the only inducements we have for penetrating into the Alps at this late season.

The inferior glacier lays between the Eiger and the Mettenberg, two of the highest of the Alps; and the superior between the Mettenberg and the Wetterhorn. These two descend into the valley, and are the inexhaustible sources of several streams, which are supplied by their melting. Having a good view of the inferior glacier from our windows, we did not examine it nearer, but early the following morning we set out on foot over rocks and streams, and through fields of snow to see the superior, which is a league distant. The sight we beheld is difficult to describe. Fancy to yourself a vast sea, rushing between two mountains, into a valley, and caught by the frost in its greatest agitation. Such is the appearance of this glacier, which stands up in points like the waves of the ocean. This immense mass of ice is split into clefts, and is continually changing its form as the snows at the foot dissolve. These gaping abysses render it extremely dangerous to attempt crossing the glaciers. The colour of the ice is the most beautiful azure, similar to that of the lakes and rivers of Switzerland, which I cannot yet account for satisfactorily.

All the night we slept in Grindenwald we heard the noises made by the cracking of the glaciers and the avalanches of ice. We could not imagine what produced such thundering sounds till we visited the superior glacier the next morning, when we heard the same noises, and saw an avalanche fall in dust into the valley. You have often heard of these terrors of the Alps, which so frequently prove the destruction of whole villages. The most formidable are produced in the spring, by the melting of the snow, which, on being loosened at the summit of a mountain, by any cause whatever, begins to roll, and collecting, as it descends, a greater and a greater body, perhaps falls at last upon some unfortunate hamlet, and buries it in its enormous mass. This does not happen unfrequently, and the avalanches are the greatest afflictions of the poor peasants, who annually lose their cattle by them. There are some passages in the Alps where the guides take off the bells from the cattle and goats, and caution travellers against speaking loud, lest the motion of the air should loosen the snows above, and a dreadful avalanche be the consequence.

The mountains, which rise around these vast beds of ice and snow, are huge pointed rocks of enormous height, broken into abrupt masses, which are absolutely terrific. Nothing is seen growing, except a little grass in the clefts which the Chamois feed upon. Our guide, pointing to a spot at a great height, told us, that last year, as a hunter of those animals was pursuing them among the rocks, a fragment from above dashed him headlong down a dreadful precipice, when his body was found horribly mangled. This trade is excessively dangerous, as the hunter is sometimes obliged to depend upon the slightest ledge for his support, while in pursuit of his game, which always seeks the most inaccessible places, and at heights which would inevitably turn the head of any one not accustomed to this perilous chase. I assure you the very contemplation of these steeples filled me with horror, and made me involuntarily look to see if my own footing was safe. Most of these mountains are above twelve thousand feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and at least nine thousand above that of the valley.

The superior and inferior glaciers descend so low that in the proper season, I am well assured, you can take ice from them with one hand, and pluck wild flowers with the other.

Having satisfied our curiosity, we were conducted to the place where the horses we had engaged to carry us to the top of the great Scheidegg waited for us. We then resumed our journey up this mountain for several leagues, but rarely out of a walk; our guides followed on foot to take back the animals. You would shudder were you to see the precipices we passed, where nothing could have saved us had our horses made the least false step; and the path was so narrow that we could not even dismount. At first I felt alarmed; but by degrees, and by observing the sagacity of the animals, and their sure footing, I began to pass many staircase paths without apprehension. Many a time has my horse's foot been within six inches of a tremendous precipice, and there was no possibility of passing otherwise, or alighting. These horses, however, may be trusted, as they are well accustomed to the narrow passages of the Alps. Their drivers, after fixing the packages they usually carry on their backs, place them on the outer edge of the path, to prevent their being overturned into the gulfs on one side, by the projections of the mountain on the other, which would infallibly be the case where the bundles they carry to strike against the rocks which jut over the passage. When you mount them yourself, nothing is to be done, but to let them take their own course, and give yourself up entirely to the sagacity of your animal, who appears to know the danger, and looks about carefully before he makes a step. As we ascended, the path became covered with snow pretty deeply, so that I could not have pretended to guide my horse, but I observed whenever there was doubt or danger, he would put his nose down as if to smell the holes that might be concealed. There is scarcely an instance known of one of these horses causing the destruction of his rider, when left to himself, and having learnt this, by the advice of my guide, I threw the bridle over the neck of the one I rode, and, folding my arms, suffered myself to be carried wherever he thought proper to go, and I confess I passed precipices which made me shudder, and think I should never see you more.

As the horses bred in the Alps are accustomed to this perilous mode of travelling, they may be safely relied on, but it would be highly imprudent to bring strange animals to perform the same journeys. There is a story told of an English gentleman and his lady being met in the passage of the Fete noir, where their horses could neither advance nor retreat. I leave you to judge the horror of such a situation.

In our journey up the Scheidegg we saw other glaciers, but they were small; from one of them, situated very high on the Wetterhorn, we saw one of the most beautiful avalanches that can be seen in the Alps. It was of ice, and elevated at a height of some thousand feet. The moment it was detached from the glacier, we heard a roaring like distant thunder, which made us turn our heads to see what caused it, when we beheld it just falling from its parent glacier. As it tumbled from rock to rock, down the immense precipice, it broke into a perfect cloud of dust, of the most dazzling whiteness, which increased in size as it fell, and the sound became louder. This beautiful cloud descended most majestically, following the course of the avalanche, till it spread in dust upon the valley, at the foot of the rock, far, far indeed, from its native glacier.

We congratulated ourselves on having witnessed this beautiful spectacle, and arrived in high spirits at the top of the Scheidegg, which is six thousand feet above the Mediterranean. From thence we looked over the valley of Grindenwald, which appeared like a small mass, neatly coloured, and had a good view of the chain of Alps, among which we distinguished the Wetterhorn, the Mettenberg, the Eiger, and the Jungfrau, whose white tops were just tinged with the rays of a morning sun. On the other side were also high mountains, whose sides were black with forests of pine; beyond these lay the smiling valley of Husli, covered with verdure, notwithstanding the threatenings of the surrounding mountains, on whose hoary tops winter had begun to show his bleak honours. It is scarcely possible, I again say, for any one, who has never seen Switzerland, to conceive the grandeur and savage majesty of the scenes of the Alps.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM PARIS TO AMSTERDAM, IN THE YEAR 1796.

The manufactures of Brussels at present are in a languishing state. The carpet manufactory once so celebrated, in consequence of the death of the master of it, does not work. I expected to have found one of lace, but this fabric is carried on by individuals in their own houses, it is also brought from Mecklin, Mons, and Valenciennes, and sold to the dealers, for the use of foreigners, who frequent in times of peace this capital.

They have three theatres, and it being Sunday night we went to the principal one. It was a French play badly represented by French actors. The greater part of the inhabitants speak French, and indeed I have hitherto found this language the current one through Brabant. They have several fine basins for holding boats, and merchant vessels, with clean convenient quays, these broad canals are supplied with water from the Senne, and should the Scheldt be liberated from the tyrannic avarice of Dutch monopoly, this city by means of its communication with that river, must soon become a place of mercantile importance, both in a domestic and foreign point of view.

As we had agreed upon descending the celebrated canal of Brussels, instead of taking the road by Mecklin to Anvers, we embarked at eight o'clock on board a very convenient boat that sets off precisely at that hour every day of the year if not prevented by the ice. This boat is about fifty feet long, and has three apartments under her deck, which runs fore and aft her whole length. These rooms may not be improperly called the cabin, steerage and fore-castle; as they are each intended for the different classes of passengers who occupy them and pay accordingly.

This canal is about twenty miles in length and has four locks on it, each of which have nearly six feet fall. At three of them we shifted our baggage, and took another boat, which did not occasion a delay of more than ten minutes. At the last lock we waited until the water was reduced to its level, and then passed through the gate. This took about fifteen minutes the difference of the height of water being, as I measured it five feet seven inches. At the little village of Willebroecke this valuable sheet of water ends in consequence of meeting the Scheldt over which there is a well kept ferry.

We met no delay as we found the public diligence ready to take those passengers who had secured their seats at the time of embarking at Brussels, and proceeded through one of the most beautiful roads in Europe for Antwerp, where we arrived at half past four. I cannot look back on this day's journey without pronouncing it the pleasantest in some particulars, of any I ever experienced. This noble canal which carries the navigation of the Scheldt to the basins and quays of Brussels exhibits throughout its whole extent the most charming scenery. The banks of each side have strait lines of lofty trees, planted, in double triple, and in some instances quintuple rows. The canal is seventy feet wide and from fifteen to twenty feet deep.

A few miles below Brussels we meet the magnificent chateau of the Emperor's sister, built about ten years ago. It is most charmingly situated about one thousand yards from the canal, on high commanding ground. This beautiful house with its temples, retreats, grottoes, stables, water-works, &c. was begun and finished in two years by eight hundred workmen, and the owner who could do this deserved to be an arch duchess. We passed a number of elegant country seats, particularly one belonging to a Brussels banker. This class of men, like the farmers general of France, appear to be the richest citizens of the country. Indeed every knoll has its chateau.

About seven miles down the canal we sailed by a very large brick building, which served as a place of correction and employment for vagrants, and petty criminals; the cells of which are so contrived that no two persons were together, except for the purpose of working. An innumerable number of small windows, through each of which nothing bigger than a cat could escape, indicated the distinct apartments. It is now converted into a military French Hospital.

We passed several large galliots deeply loaded. Two that must have exceeded one hundred tons. The rich meadows covered with cattle cropping a most luxuriant herbage, hamlets, mills, churches, groves and whitened cottages, every where meeting the passenger as he gently glides along the lengthened and unruffled surface, present a picturesque scenery, which it is easier to enjoy than to describe. And to finish our optical repast, immediately on crossing the Scheldt (which at Boom, the town we landed at, is five hundred feet wide) we entered a road seven miles long, and so perfectly straight, that you see its whole extent, and which, being bordered by very lofty trees, trimmed for thirty feet from the ground, produce a vista as striking as it is novel. The lands on each side are as black as the banks of the Nile, and if we may conclude from the appearance of the large fields of vegetables, that continually present themselves, not less productive.

We arrived at Antwerp at four o'clock, and got into very convenient lodgings at Louis's Hotel. We were a little surprised to see at the corner of every street a group of a woman with a pretty child either in her arms, on her lap, or playing at her knee; at length we found that the Virgin Mary was the patroness of the city.

It is not easy to stand on the broad, convenient and once bustling quay of Antwerp, by which flows a river three hundred yards wide, and twenty-five feet deep, without a mingled sensation of indignation and pity. The Scheldt (which once by every tide, wafted wealth to this city, and animated the remotest parts of Brabant, because by its reflux it transported the product of its industry to every shore, to be paid by a rich return of the conveniences and luxuries of every climate) has for almost 180 years, rolled a useless flood. By the treaty of Munster in 1648 between the United Provinces of Holland and Spain, the latter were compelled to sacrifice the commerce of this opulent and then capital city to obtain a peace. The Scheldt thus shut, Rotterdam became what Antwerp was!

They say that this city contains fifty thousand inhabitants. On a very full view of the houses from the lofty central steeple of Notre Dame, I should conclude it to be equal to Philadelphia, yet from the quietness and apparent scarcity of the population that prevails through all its streets, I must doubt the estimate; thirty thousand perhaps is near the truth.

Every one in Flanders is under the necessity of wearing a cockade, the priest and the peasant, the foreigner and native. In France you are not safe without this party coloured insignia of citizenship.

In most countries where the Catholic religion predominates, we find that the leaders of this superstition, always took care to engage the exertions of genius to ornament the altars of Fanaticism; therefore it is that a foreigner is necessarily led to the churches to find monuments of the arts. Having seen so many of these objects, I intended in future to have taken a transient view without any sketch. But the cathedral of Antwerp cannot be omitted. This church is five hundred feet by two hundred and forty high, and three hundred and sixty feet in length including its domes; it is dedicated to the Virgin Mary mother of God. It contains upwards of thirty chapels, each inclosed by a balustrade of solid brass, here is also a profusion of marble, cut and fashioned into all shapes, such as saints and princes, apostles and generals, male and female martyrs, cherubs and archangels, crucifixes and candlesticks, of all sizes, with all that variety of trumpery which the church borrowed from gentile and pagan temples, and so successfully applied in the perversion of the human faculties, and the subjugation of mankind: but to these may be added a few pieces of Reubens, and other great masters of the Flemish school, the principal of which however have within eighteen months been disposed of for very different purposes than those their makers intended, and have travelled to Paris to aid the splendor of the proud gallery of that proud Republic.

Here are many pictures of martyrs expiring in agony. Horrid as such representations are, they may be proper enough for a church. Tired with tombs, tortures, and tapers, the eye and the mind are relieved and enraptured by the glorious representation of the ascension of the holy Virgin. This most beautiful painting is on the ceiling of the dome in that part of the church which is called the cross, it is nearly two hundred feet above the marble pavement from which it is viewed. It is finely lighted, and represents a charming woman surrounded by a multitude of smiling angels, triumphantly rising through the skies to take her seat in Heaven! A connoisseur would find something to applaud in the foreshortening of the figures,

The tower is as much admired for its delicacy as for its height of four hundred and sixty-six feet; you ascend by six hundred and twenty two stone steps to the height of four hundred, from whence you have an extensive view of the Scheldt; and if there is a clear horizon, discover the great towns of Mecklin, Brussels, Louvain, and Breda, and Bergen-op-Zoom. One of the bells of this church weighs sixteen thousand pounds.

The different churches are all decorated with pieces of Reubens, Vandyck, Jordains, Teniers, and other celebrated painters which this country formerly produced. Several gentlemen have also cabinets, to which foreigners easily obtain admission. But I did not avail myself of the advantage as pictures begin to lose their attraction.

The bourse or exchange is a plain but very convenient building; it is one hundred and ninety-four feet long, and one hundred and fifty-four broad. It was built in 1531, and the gallery of this quadrangle serves now to furnish rooms for public purposes; but the house and its piazzas are of no kind of commercial use, solitude and silence have succeeded to bustle and bargains.

This city unfortunately has more monks than merchants, the churches therefore all day long are frequented, and at no hour do you meet any one on the exchange.

Finding but one merchant-ship here, and that a Dane, I expressed my surprize to a merchant, that so little enterprize was discovered by the inhabitants, and so little use made of their noble river, now as free open as the Rhine. His answer was, that until peace they could not tell what country they were to be annexed to, or whether the Scheldt was not to be again closed. That their Dutch neighbours would not send their ships up because they looked with a jealous eye on the Flemish commerce; and their conquerors had laid such heavy duties, as discouraged all enterprize on their parts, and deterred foreigners from trading with them.

I was pleased to find that several American vessels had been here. Long, very long, may a wise policy, on the part of our government enable the adventurous merchant of America, to extend her commerce on every sea! and the hardy mariner to display the stars of his country in every port of the Globe!

They have an excellent fish-market, the Scheldt furnishes a part, but their cod, haddock, salmon, soles, and turbot, come principally from Zealand, I observed two rosy gilled hooded friars surveying a parcel of the latter fish with great complacency.

There are several crosses stuck up in different parts of the town, and particularly one of bronze between thirty and forty feet high, which stands on a marble pedestal in the centre of the handsomest street of the city.

The hotel des Ostretins is a vast house two hundred and fifty feet in length by two hundred broad; it is situated near the river and very convenient for the discharge of ships; it is three stories high, the lower one served for storing merchandize; the two others which contain three hundred chambers, served as lodging rooms for the traders. It was built in 1564 by the hanseatic towns for their mutual accommodation. It is now only a melancholy evidence of the former prosperity and opulence of this city; for since commerce perished it has ceased to be serviceable.

The maison de ville, considering the year of its erection, 1560, is a superb house. It is situated in the great place or square of the town, it has a front of two hundred and forty feet by ninety deep. The five architectural orders beautify its facade, and the columns are of marble, the interior of the edifice is correspondant.

Most of its noble rooms are graced by pieces from the indefatigable pencil of Reubens, and from those of Quillin, Helmont, &c. The first of these immortal painters appears to have possessed as much industry as genius. And if he was the master of the variety of works attributed to him, he must have been the most assiduous artist of his own, or any other age.

The assembly of the states of Brabant was holden here in the prosperous periods of Antwerp. They had also their treasury and mint, and the courts of law held their sessions in an appropriate hall. As the golden age of this city has long since passed away, the latter only now remains.

Antwerp is a walled town and has a strong citadel, with its accompaniments of bastions and fosses. It has repeatedly been besieged, and of course several times changed masters. Could the inhabitants have a voice in the councils of their sovereigns the wisest measure they could adopt would be to launch their ramparts into the ditches. Large towns having every thing to hazard and nothing to obtain by a siege ought always to be defended at a distance.

There are three different routes from Antwerp to Rotterdam, one by Bergen-op-Zoom, one by Breda, and one between both to the Maerdick. We chose the latter. It is only thirteen leagues and we were in our chaise with four fresh and able horses by six o'clock, yet we did not get through until two hours after dark. About seven miles from Anvers you enter on a desert of sand, the most barbarous and barren moor I ever crossed. Here the British forces were incamped when the victorious legions of France in the month of December, 1794 marched to Amsterdam, whilst the English confounded and half frozen, with difficulty and loss, escaped to the banks of the Elbe.

After a fatiguing day in crawling over the worst road in the United Provinces, we arrived at a sorry inn, and met a peat fire and a poor bed. At four o'clock next morning we were in the kopyacht (a boat that carries goods) with an excessive cold, but fresh and fair breeze on our way to Rotterdam, distant twenty-one miles.

We soon got up with Gravendeld, under which foreign ships lie, and had several pointed out as Americans. About two miles further, on the opposite shore we passed the large town of Dort: but it is built on so flat a site that it was impossible by moon-light, to discover much of it, excepting its forest of wind-mills. At eight o'clock we landed, and soon found in an excellent breakfast of hot coffee, a succedaneum for much cold and some chagrin.

The street we are in has the appearance of the houses menacing the heads of the passengers: the upper stories of the buildings opposite each other being three feet nearer than the ground floors. We were told that these houses, (and that we should find a great many more such) were thus built in order to have the lower apartments less exposed to the weather. A strange idea. A more natural supposition for Holland, is that former sordidness pilfered from the sky, the inches it was obliged to surrender to the street. The roofs of the old houses are steep, with their gable ends to the street. The modern ones have neither of the above defects, are built of brick or stone, and preserved in the cleanest order.

To a stranger and particularly so to an American traveller, this town exhibits the most novel and singular scenery; a scenery however appropriate to all the mercantile places of Holland. The deep, broad and crowded canals, the sides of which are every where secured by stone or brick masonry; the numerous warehouses, along which, vessels of all sizes from the huge bombs, or hundred feet house-barges of the Rhine, to the swift sailing cutter of the ocean; the bulky bilander of the Baltick, and the handsome ship of America lie, and most conveniently discharge their freights: the streets clean, and shaded with trees. The quiet steadiness the Dutchmen show in doing their respective business, either on shipboard or on the quays, altogether form them as the most extraordinary sea-ports of the world. Few persons, who have ever seen, but must have admired the beautiful street called the Boomies. This delightful place is about the length of west Boston bridge, and runs parallel with the Maese, which is here about six hundred yards wide. The wall, which forms the terrace, is protected by a line of strong pickets drove into the mud. A range of lofty elms runs the whole extent of this street, at the distance of fifty feet from a compact line of very handsome houses of stone or brick. A very fine view of the river is enjoyed by the inhabitants of these houses, who are either merchants or bankers. A full view of the large and handsome edifice belonging to the admiralty of the province, and the partial but picturesque prospect of a large hospital, situated on the opposite bank of the river, incircled with trees, and surrounded with meadows, unite to aid the scenery, which is always animated by the passing of the numerous boats and vessels, which frequent the port, or come to its markets.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Among the hourly proofs of that gross barbarism, which infects so large a portion of this unhappy country, may be enumerated that ostentatious neglect of the classics, so generally prevalent among the citizen slaves of a democracy. A true Indian is naturally averse to any language but the barbarous dialect of his wigwam; an outlaw, or an acquitted felon, knows no tongue but that of falsehood, hypocrisy, and fraud; and as for your puritan and fanatic, why the very foundation of his pretensions rests upon the gross ignorance both of himself and his miserable followers.

It has been quaintly and classically said of a battered courtesan that she was

Omnibus lippis et tonsoribus nota.

When we reflect upon the honourable character of the French usurper, and that of some of his republican associates, we can apply the initial lines of a celebrated glee:

When Bonaparte at court began
To wear long hanging sleeves,
He entertain'd three serving men,
And all of them were thieves.

The correct taste of a literary friend has selected, from a recent work by Mrs. Opie, the following canzonet, which finely describes the affection of a female heart.

Go, youth belov'd, in distant glades
New friends, new hopes, new joys to find!
Yet sometimes deign, 'midst fairer maids,
To think on her thou leav'st behind.
Thy love, thy fate, dear youth, to share
Must never be my happy lot;
But thou may'st grant this humble pray'r,
Forget me not, forget me not.

Yet should the thought of my distress
Too painful to thy feelings be,
Heed not the wish I now express,
And never deign to think on me.
But Oh, if grief thy steps attend,
If want or sickness be thy lot,
And thou require a soothing friend,
Forget me not, forget me not.

Swift, when he is in earnest, has a strength of reasoning, which carries with it conviction. When in jest, every competitor in the race of wit is left behind him.

The Dove of Anacreon is a little poem of such exquisite beauty, that it has challenged the commendation and exercised the industry of Dr. Johnson. Fawkes has translated it well, Dr. Johnson better, but to Mr. Moore must be conceded the glory of rendering it best.

Tell me why, my sweetest Dove,
Thus your humid pinions move,
Shedding through the air in showers
Essence of the balmy flowers?
Tell me whither whence you rove,
Tell me all, my sweetest Dove.
Curious stranger, I belong
To the bard of Teian song;
With his mandate now I fly
To the nymph of azure eye;
Ah! that eye has madden'd many,
But the poet more than any!
Venus, for a hymn of love,
Warbled in her votive grove;
'Twas, in sooth, a gentle lay
Gave me to the bard away.
See me now, his faithful minion,
Thus, with softly gliding pinion,
To his lovely girl I bear
Songs of passion through the air.
Oft he blandly whispers me,
'Soon, my bird, I'll set you free;'
But in vain he'll bid me fly,
I shall serve him till I die.
Never could my plumes sustain
Baffling winds and chilling rain,
O'er the plains, or in the dell,
On the mountain's savage swell;
Seeking in the desert wood
Gloomy shelter, rustic food.
Now I lead a life of ease,
Far from such retreats as these;
From Anacreon's hand I eat
Food delicious, viands sweet;
Flutter o'er his goblets' brim,
Sip the foamy wine with him.
Then I dance and wanton round
To the lyre's beguiling sound;
Or with gently fanning wings,
Shade the minstrel while he sings:
On his harp then sink in slumbers,
Dreaming still of dulcet numbers.
This is all—away—away—
You have made me waste the day.
How I've chatter'd! prating crow
Never yet did chatter so.

Epigram on a noisy fanatic, more famous for his vociferation, than his good sense or rhetoric.

With such velocity of empty sound
Thou pour'st forth nonsense on the audience round,
It seems as if some demon fill'd thy breast,
If not—at least thy pulpit is possess'd,
Thou art its demon, whom we all implore
Once to come out, and enter it no more.

Who died a lamb and liv'd a sheep,
Many a lamb and sheep he slaughter'd,
But butcher death the scene has alter'd.

Voltaire seems to have known his countrymen perfectly when he asserted that they were either monkeys or tygers.

The Charleston Courier is not only conducted with a vigour, vivacity and spirit worthy of better fortune and better times, but it contains more original matter than most of the daily papers published in America.

Voiture was not less famed for his generosity than his wit. Balzac sent to him one day for the loan, of 400 crowns, which he readily lent; and at the bottom of the promissory note for that sum he wrote the following lines: 'I promise, to pay M. Balzac the sum of 800 crowns for the pleasure that he has afforded me of lending him 400. He returned this note by the servant that came for the money. When Balzac read it, he exclaimed 'this note does him more honour than all the letters for which he is so justly and universally admired.'

Mr. Reynolds has received from Mr. Harris, on account of his Play being damned, a note for two hundred pounds, as something handsome towards the funeral expenses.

Mr. Reynolds, we believe, is the first man, who got money for being damned; but many others, we fear, before him, have been damned for getting money.

[Lon. paper.]

Mr. Moore has copied from Anacreon a lovely picture of vernal beauty.

When spring begems the dewy scene
How sweet to walk the velvet green,
And hear the zephyrs languid sighs,
As o'er the scented mead he flies;
How sweet to mark the pouting vine
Ready to fall in tears of wine;
And with the maid, whose every sigh
Is love and bliss, entranc'd to lie
Where the embowering branches meet,
Oh! is not this divinely sweet?

The following is the natural wish of one, who calls for rosebuds before they be withered.

I know that heaven ordains me here
To run this mortal life's career;
The scenes, which I have journeyed o'er,
Return no more—alas! no more!
And all the path I've yet to go,
I neither know, nor ask to know;
Then surely, Care, thou canst not twine
Thy fetters round a soul like mine,
No, no, the heart that feels with me
Can never be a slave to thee!
And Oh! before the vital thrill,
That trembles at my heart is still,
I'll gather Joy's luxuriant flowers,
And gild with bliss my fading hours;
Bacchus shall bid my winter bloom,
And Venus dance me to the tomb.

My Lord Bolingbroke observes, that the people are always the surest instruments of their own servitude.

THE FAITHFUL FRIEND.

By COWPER.

The green house is my summer seat;
My shrubs, displac'd from that retreat,
Enjoy'd the open air:
Two goldfinches, whose sprightly song
Had been their mutual solace long,
Liv'd happy prisoners there.

They sang as blythe as finches sing
That flutter loose on golden wing,
And frolic where they list;
Strangers to liberty, 'tis true,
But that delight they never knew,
And, therefore, never miss'd.

But nature works in every breast;
Instinct is never quite suppress'd;
And Dick felt some desires,

Which, after many an effort vain,
Instructed him at length to gain
A pass between the wires.

The open windows seem to invite
The freeman to a farewell flight,
But Tom was still confin'd;
And Dick, although his way was clear,
Was much too generous and sincere
To leave his friend behind.

For, sitting on his grated roof,
He chirp'd and kiss'd him, giving proof
That he desir'd no more:
Nor would forsake his cage at last,
Till, gently seiz'd, I shut him fast,
A pris'n'r as before.

O ye, who never knew the joys
Of Friendship, satisfied with noise,
Fandango, ball or rout!
Blush when I tell you how a bird
A prison, with a friend, prefer'd
To liberty without.

Epitaph on a grave-stone in a country church-yard in England, on Mrs. Arabella Greenwood, who died in child-bed; written by the Rev. Mr. Greenwood, D. D.

O Death! thou hast cutte downe,
The fairest Greenwood in all this towne;
Her virtues and goode qualities were suche,
That shee mighte have married a lorde or a judge,
But suche was her condescensione and suche her humilitie
Shee chose to take me a Doctor of Divinitie,
For which heroicke acte shee stands confeste
Above all others the Phoenix of he sexe,
And like that bride one younge shee did begette,
That she mighte not leave her sexe disconsolate,
Mie grieve for her is so verie sore
I can onlie write two lines more,
For this and everie goode her sake
Never let a blister be putte on a lying-inwoman's back.

best. The first seems to preserve more of the spirit of the original, than either of the subsequent ones.

Well, shall my friend Fabullus sup with me,
'And soon, should such be fav'ring heaven's decree.
But if the supper's plentiful and rare,

But if, at my treat,
You are anxious to eat,
Remember, my friend, you must bring
Your own dish.

It is somewhat singular that the greater number of poets, whose works have given such splendor to their names and country, have proceeded from the courts of law, a profession which of all others appears least suited to the cultivation or improvement of the talents of a poet. Should a foreigner demand a narrative of the lives of some of our more celebrated wits, he would not regard us without incredulity or surprise, should we refer him for some account of their lives to the registers of the Temple. It is certain, however, that the law has the praise of producing as many poets as judges; and it is no less extraordinary that the church, which we might imagine their more natural element, can produce almost none.

THE LOVER CURED.

Young Damon, with a Lover's stare,
Ey'd Phillis o'er and o'er;
And sure, said he, a form so fair
Was never seen before.
I love that eye, so soft and meek:
And who can e'er withstand
The lovely dimples of thy cheek,
The whiteness of thy hand?
O give me but a lock of hair,
(He said with ravish'd eyes)
That on my finger I may wear,
And kiss the sacred prize.
What female could withstand the shock?
The yielding Fair submits,
Poor Damon clip'd his favourite lock,
And found it full of—nits!

ANECDOTE.

An Actor, of some consideration, (said to be Mr. Cooke) and who has no aversion to 'tipsey revelry,' lately quarrell'd with a supper party of bon vivants, at Manchester; and after a scuffle, in which he broke a pane of a window opening to the street, was forced to make a precipitate exit. Shortly after, he popped his head in at the broken pane, and exclaimed—'Gentleman, I see through my error, and humbly claim your indulgence.' A laugh ensued, and the Hero of the Sock and Buskin was restored to the honour of the sitting.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We are sorry to say that Sydney cannot spell. It is lamentable that this republican namesake of a great patriot, should be ignorant even of the first page of the useful treatise of Mr. Thomas Dilworth, who was a very good man and able schoolmaster, though he never subverted a monarchy, or attempted to teach kings wisdom.

We hope to be allowed the liberty of rejecting a very licentious song on Liberty. We have often thought that the figure on our American dollars of this same republican goddess, exhibited the profile of one of the most impudent harlots to be found in any bagnio.

JUVENIS.

A TALE,

In the versification of Spenser.

No longer beam'd the radiant god of day,
And scarce a murmur floated in the air,
The shepherd whistling homeward bent his way
To happy scenes, devoid of every care;
To smiling boys, whose blooming features wear
The marks of ruddy health, and peace, and joy,
Who strive full oft the father's gift to share,
Some blooming nosegay, or some childish toy,
Which he had kindly purchas'd at the neighbouring fair.

'Twas then a youth, oppress'd with many a woe,
Upon whose cheek oft fell the chrystal tear,
Mov'd o'er the plain, with trembling steps and slow,
Mournful, without a pitying friend to cheer
His sadden'd soul, which like the winter drear,
Was gloomy horror all, where nought but grief,
Keen, piercing grief, was found, nor there
Did smiling Hope e'er bring her sweet relief,
And shed her cheering beams, or bring kind prospects near.

His parents died, ere yet twelve times the sun
O'er his young head had run its annual round,
And ne'er a friend he knew, not one
This orphan's mournful lot with comfort crown'd;
No soothing voice he heard, no welcome sound
Of charity once met his ear, but spurn'd
By all, in lonely solitude he found
Sweet happiness, there oft his bosom burn'd
With manly virtues, hid, like ore, beneath the ground.

A little hut he rais'd with many a clod,
His food was herbs, his drink the limpid stream;
Nature the book which rais'd his soul to God,
And taught him life itself was but a dream:
'Twill soon be past, he cry'd, while many a beam
Of joy then sparkled in his youthful eye,
'Twill soon be past, no more my sorrows seem
To oppress my soul with grief, or raise the sigh,
Ere long the rays of happiness will on me gleam.'

Thus he philosophiz'd—but now remov'd
From calm retirement's ever still retreat,
He sought the fair, whom once he saw and lov'd,
Whom once he saw and lov'd, she look'd so sweet
As she pass'd by his cot on airy feet,
And fled so swift the youth pursued in vain
Thro' many a grove, the gentle muses seat,
Or o'er the mountain, or across the plain,
He found her not, she skimm'd along with steps
so fleet.

Gloomy despair at length bedimm'd his soul,
And now he sought to end his numerous woes,
His eyes, once sparkling, now with horror roll,
And frantic to the precipice he goes;
There gaz'd a moment, then himself he throws
Off the high summit in the stream below,
Clos'd were his eyes in death, no longer glows
His breast with ardour, ne'er again he'd know
The cares, or joys of life; but every vein is froze.

ON CARE.

Away, dull thought, far hence away,
Nor to annoy me dare,

I'll cherish pleasure while I may,
And ever banish Care.

Away, away,
Nor dare to stay,
Corroding Care!

E'er to be sad I hold it wrong,
For sighs infect the air;
Then ever let it be my song
Away, way with Care!

Begone, begone,
Thy power I scorn,
Dull, baseborn Care!

The ills, which grieving mortals know,
Are simple I declare;
Reflection, our most mortal foe,
Ne'er smoothes the brow of Care.
Depart, depart,
Nor wound my heart,
Pernicious Care!

Throughout the world there 'haps no ill
But each man has his share;
The wise laugh on, and gild the pill,
'Tis fools alone seek Care.

Pass on, pass on,
'Tis e'er my song,
Away with Care!
CLEMENT.

SELECTED POETRY.

THE VINE.

[Many years ago, says the Laureate of Great Britain, when I became first acquainted with the botanical system of Linnæus, I had some thoughts of writing a poem on the subject. The plan that suggested itself to me was, to select some conspicuous plant from each of the orders, to consider the sexual distinction as lovers, and the flower as the nuptial pavilion. The example of original imagery, and correct and splendid versification exhibited in Dr. Darwin's Loves of the Plants, precluded every idea of completion, and I dropped all thoughts of the subject. But part of my summer amusement at Stoke park being derived from a fresh perusal of Dr. Darwin's poem, I was induced to try a slight defence of the liquor, which, we are told, 'cheereth the heart of God and man,' from the severe censure of the poet, and, in doing this, I have given a specimen of the plan I had meant to adopt.]

Like clustering tents upon the embattled mead,
See Vitis thick her small pavilions spread;
Beneath each silken veil, with studious care,
Five amorous brothers woo one yielding fair;
From the sweet raptures of the fond embrace
Soon springs a lovely and a generous race,
In purple bright, or lucid vesture clad.
The passer's eye the groups luxuriant glad,
While o'er the enchanting clusters native hue,
Spreads a rich tincture of celestial blue.
Sweet to the taste, the swelling orbs produce
A rich profusion of ambrosial juice;
Mantling and clear, man sees the beverage shine,
And hails, with grateful voice, the power of wine.
Fair and delicious boon of favouring heaven,
To human kind the balm of sorrow given!
By thee inspired, behold on blither wing
Soar the young joys, the muses sweeter sing;
With lighter step the dancing Graces move,
And fiercer burns the golden lamp of love.
But, thoughtless man, beware of foul excess,
Nor draw a curse, where heaven design'd to bless:
Then flies the genial draught, that cheer'd the soul,

And fatal poison drugs the intemperate bowl.
Amid the flowrets of the festal wreath
The serpents writhe of anguish and of death,
Shoots pale disease along the languid frame,
And passion's burning fends the veins inflame.

[The following imitation, by Mr. Boscawen, who has so ably translated Horace, will please the classical reader.]

Epistle, in imitation of Horace, Lib. I. Epist. IV. to a friend, who had retired to the country in disgust at the ill success of a law suit.

My friend, whose candor to my humble lays
Warps your sound judgment into partial praise,
Say, what amusements now your leisure fill,
What studies charm on Hampstead's airy hill?
Does the gay muse you woo'd on Tuscan plains
Still prompt to rival Della Crusca's strains?
Or strive you in your lonely walks to find,
Man's only bliss, serenity of mind?
No dull and lifeless body you inherit,
Devoid of grace, and uninform'd by spirit;
Heaven, when it gave you fortune, gave the art
To use it as becomes a liberal heart.
Can the fond mother wish her boy more blest,
The darling boy she cherish'd at her breast,
Than in just taste and knowledge to excel,
And what he knows, in fluent language tell?
Than fame and favour which on learning wait,
Good health, good temper, and a good estate?
Then, whether flattering hope your breast inspire,
Or care perplex you, or resentment fire,
Heed not the future, grieve not for the past,
But think each day that dawns may be your last.
Thus, calmly brave, secure from fortune's power,
You'll greet with joy each unexpected hour:
And when your friends in social converse meet,
Come, dine with me in Bedford square, or Baker street,
Me you will find more pleas'd than when you went,
Not fat or sleek, but cheerful and content.

SONG, BY ROBERT BURNS.

[The following is one of those simple ballads of the ploughman of Ayrshire, which have been set to such exquisite music by the genius of Pleyel. The reader, who recollects the attachments of a Scotchman, and the misfortunes of some of the hereditary princes of Europe, will easily identify him, whom the poet makes the Preceder say had a right to the hills and vales of Scotland.]

Irish air, 'Captain O'Kain.'

The small birds rejoice on the green leaves returning,
The murmuring streamlet winds clear thro' the vale;
The primroses blow in the dew of the morning,
And wild scatter'd cowslips bedeck the green dale.

But what can give pleasure, or what can seem fair
When the lingering moments are number'd with care?
Nor birds sweetly singing, nor flowers gayly springing,
Can soothe the sad bosom of joyless despair.

The deed that I dar'd could it merit their malice
A King and a father to place on his throne,
His right are these hills, and his right are these vales,
Where wild beasts find shelter, though I can find none!

But 'tis not my sufferings, thus wretched forlorn,
My brave gallant friends 'tis your ruin I mourn,
Your faith prov'd so loyal in hot bloody trial,
Alas! can I make it no better return!

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 87.

MY correspondent, Florian, has the good fortune, sometimes, to attract and deserve the attention of the ladies; but as none of the honeyed sweets of life is entirely pure, he sometimes has the ill luck to incur censure from female lips. His late speculation on the superficial education, and frivolity of American women has excited some accomplished lady to exchange her needle for a crow quill to pierce his literary corselet. This is a most gallant encounter, not surpassed by any of the redoubtable feats of ancient chivalry; and I am happy to add, that the last who has entered the lists has saluted the adverse party not with stern defiance, but with gentle courtesy.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

"For a delicate mind censure must always be an irksome and invidious task." Thus writes Florian. But I do contend, Mr. Saunter, that there are moments, when it is a very delightful task, or why does one, so sage and sentimental as Florian, exercise himself in it so repeatedly? At this time I indulge it as a very agreeable recreation, and I do make some pretensions to a delicate mind, although not to very extensive learning, wherein I cannot meet an esprit on equal terms; but, for the honour of my sex, I must observe, that your correspondent seems to attack us, as if he thought he possessed the exclusive privilege of finding fault. His first essay would have passed unnoticed, had not our witty Beatrice given it notoriety by some sprightly comments. His second, in the 85th number of your Lounger is undoubtedly a very respectable performance, but especially for the elegance of the style, and the deep knowledge therein displayed. Did he attack us in this way, because he had nothing else to do? Did he wish to confound us by his superior learning? Or did he wish to correct the errors of education at the age of twenty or thirty years? If the first motive prompted him to address you, he is excusable, and certainly was better employed, than he would have been at the gaming table, or the drinking club. If the second, he certainly effected his purpose in a most masterly style, for my poor head, for one, was put into such a reel by his circumlocution, that, by the time I found out the subject of his essay, I was obliged to throw down the paper, and could not venture to take it up again, until I had entirely forgotten the long sentences of the exordium. If the third, most laudable of any, influenced him, I fear that he has undertaken an Herculean task, and one that his delicate mind may sink under.

Do not reject a good system of things, until you find one that is better, says one of the philosophers whom I have studied. To your correspondent, therefore, all American mothers look for some better method of education, than has hitherto been adopted in this country. We will give his system a fair trial, reserving the right of rejecting his plan, should it prove fallacious. Can mothers promise more? But, perhaps, this may be construed into a concession that our present system is as defective as the flowery Florian represents. I can, from experience, controvert his assertion.

The schools for female education in this city are certainly better than any on the continent, and by no means deficient in regularity and method. Young ladies are taught, at these public seminaries, all useful knowledge, and music and dancing are only considered as secondary accomplishments by their wise preceptors. Not so, however, by that world, in which they afterwards mingle. Tell me, Mr. Saunter, do you imagine, from your knowledge of the young men in this city, that ladies are valued according to their mental acquirements? I can assure you that they are not, and I am very confident that they never will be, while men indulge themselves in expressions of contempt for one because she has a bare elbow, for another because she cannot sing well; for a third, because she dances awkwardly; for a fourth, because she never made a good pun, nor smart repartee; for another, because she talks too loudly, for others, because they are silent occasionally, and for many because they have never had a chance of being married. This, Mr. Saunter, is the groundwork of our levity, and this is what had led Florian to imagine, that French, music and dancing, are the only things which we learn. And why? Because he, like the rest of mankind, in our city, make them the summum bonum of a woman's merits.

Permit me, sir, through you, to ask your correspondent, whether he would not titter, among his companions, at her expense, if a woman made a Latin quotation, or spoke with enthusiasm of classical learning? Would he not think she was out of her proper sphere, and call her pedantic, if, when a sagacious beau, at a tea-party, ask her if she loved fish, she should mention a learned treatise she had just been reading, 'On the influence of the moon on tides'? Would a woman not be shunned as a 'curst bore,' by modern beaux, that should presume to parse their language by the rules of grammar? Would she not be deemed a wretched hypocrite, who would boldly assert, that she was fond of going to church, and had a high relish for reading the Bible?

If the men will reflect on these truths, they will not be surprised that we are diffident of our learning, and unwilling to display it before the gaudy butterflies of our time, who are so dazzled with their own splendor as to be incapable of seeing or relishing our modest lustre. These women, however, whose merit you and your correspondents are prone to depreciate, have more intrinsic worth than you are acquainted with. And, although at the tribunal of our own countrymen we stand impeached, yet foreigners, from all parts of the earth seek us, and proclaim that American women are the most amiable, correct, and domestic, that can be found. I hope, Mr. Saunter, that our young men will profit by these hints, and consider, that if any deserve reproach for our frivolity, it is neither our parents, preceptors, nor ourselves, but those alone who flutter around us with flattery on their tongues, and deceitfulness in their hearts. Should Florian be so fortunate as to marry, he will discover that learning is not the only requisite in the character of a wife. It can better be spared than various other charms in a woman, which are more happily calculated to 'assuage the bitterness of adverse fortune, and prolong our empire' when beauty shall have vanished. It is not necessary in order to be dutiful or affectionate wives, that we should have studied Demosthenes' Eloquence, or Caesar's Commentaries, or that we should know that Ariosto was an Italian, and Madame de Sevigne could read and relish his beauties.

I know that Tacitus was born of an honourable family, in the first Christian century, in the reign of Nero. That he was made consul in the reign of Nerva; that he wrote annals of Tiberius, Caius, Claudius and Nero, and that of thirty books which he wrote, including twenty-seven years of Roman history, we have only sixteen of his annals, and five of his history, remaining. Now do you think this knowledge makes me a better wife than I should have been without it, or do you think my husband would agree that it 'could assuage the bitterness of adverse fortune'?

No, Mr. Saunter, the acquirements of the head need no reform, but the qualities of the heart must be improved; and I advise your correspondent to begin the work immediately. Tell him to write to us about good nature, charity, patience, resignation, and all the other Christian virtues: for these, he assured, will ensure to us and our associates more bright and tranquil happiness, than all the learning of the heathen philosophers, from the first to the present age. But I am expatiating perhaps too far. I beg you will pardon this length of address, and, perhaps, you may hear from me again.

M. G.

The apology, in the concluding sentence of this well reasoned and spirited letter, is wholly superfluous. Our correspondent has the art of being prolix without tediousness, and general without confusion; and while she continues thus powerfully to defend her sex, and thus brilliantly to adorn her mind, she will always be sure of the notice, not merely of S. Saunter, but of men of a superior cast to any of the Lounger family.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

"Impress it then well upon your minds, Athenians, that while they amuse you here with vain words, in reality all they desire is, that you remain idle at home, and disarmed abroad; that Philip, in the meantime, may accomplish, at his ease, all that is convenient to him. Judge of this by what happens at this time. He has occupied, for a long time, Thrace and Thessaly with numerous troops; if before the season of the Etesian winds, he besieges Byzantium, do you believe that the Byzantines persist in their prejudices against you to such a degree as not to feel the want of your assistance? Ah! if you fail them, they will invite into their walls auxiliaries, whoever they may be, even such as they will distrust more than you, rather than remain at the mercy of Philip, at least if he does not seize upon their city before any one can suspect it; and if we have not troops upon the spot, or if, when we wish to send them, the winds should resist us, there is no doubt to be made the Byzantines are undone.

"But these are a people misled by an evil genius, and their conduct towards us has been insensible—Aye, but these insensible people we must save, and save them for ourselves.

"Are we sure that Philip will not march into the Chersonesus? Has he not said in his letter, that he intended to take vengeance on that people? And is not this another reason for leaving an army, which we already have there, well formed, which is able to defend the country, and interrupt the enemy? If we lose this army, and Philip enters the Chersonesus, what shall we do then? We will impeach Diopithes. This will advance the cause surprisingly! We will send succours. But what if the sea is impassable? But Philip will not attack the Chersonesus. Who told you so? Who will be responsible for him?"

Behold here a model of precision, in hypothetic dialogue, one of the most pungent forms that can be given to discussion. But we must take a great care against a very dangerous inconvenience, into which those are apt to fall, who employ this instrument without knowing the principle and the effect of it. They feign to themselves feeble or silly objections, which are by no means such as have been or can be opposed to them; and, in such cases, this little artifice becomes puerile, and falls back upon them. When we make our adversaries speak, it is necessary to answer to their thoughts, and not to our own; to be very sure of what they can say, and very sure of our reply. In this place Demosthenes puts nothing into their mouths but what they had said, or what they were obliged to say; to avoid inconsistency. Three times he makes them speak, and three times he puts them down, with a single word. He goes on.

"Consider then, Athenians, at what time, and in what season of the year, they advise you to withdraw your troops from the Hellespont, and expose it, without defence, to the enterprises of Philip—What am I saying? Attend to another consideration, of quite a different importance. If on his return from the higher Thrace, he leaves on one side of him the Chersonesus and Byzantium, and attacks Chalcis and Megara, as in the last place the city of Oræa, had you rather be obliged to meet him upon your frontiers, than to find him employment at a distance?"

The orator, well established in the facts, which had explained, and in the consequences to be drawn from them, all which, thanks to the power of his logic, had been but an affair of a few moments, is not afraid to hazard an advice, which he knows very well is not to the taste of the greatest part of the Athenians; but he had reserved, for the support of it, the most powerful means, those drawn from the moral affections of a people whom he had well studied. He knew them sensible to disgrace, jealous of their reputation and of their knowledge, very prone to suffer themselves to be deceived by their negligence, but also very irascible against those whom they saw convicted of deceiving them. These are so many machines which the orator proceeds to employ to set in motion this indolent and inattentive multitude. He has made his evidence shine like lightning; he now proceeds to thunder with the truth: and you will see how a citizen speaks to a people. They had never an idea in Athens, nor in any other part of the world, of giving this title, the people, to a gang of robbers, a mob of highwaymen. These it is necessary to flatter. And it is natural that their abettors and accomplices should flatter them. These must be called, a people essentially good. This was the burden of the song of our tyrants. But Demosthenes knew, and so did the Athenians, that if men were essentially good, they would not have occasion for laws. He spoke to a real people, very susceptible of errors, of weakness, of prejudice; but who had a country, a religion, a morality, and social manners; and to whom, consequently, one might with impunity shew the truth, the naked truth, the severe and poignant truth, provided they were convinced of the sincerity and good intentions of the orator. Those who are not familiar with the ancients, and who know nothing but that base adulation, incessantly lavished, among us, upon the vilest rabble, that abject popularism, so improperly called popularity, will not be able to conceive the bold and vehement veracity of Demosthenes, those bitter and violent reproaches with which he salutes his fellow-citizens, to awaken and enlighten them; and they will be still more surprised at the reception of this discourse, and at the success which it obtained.

"After these facts and reflections, my opinion is, that so far from disbanding the army, which Diopithes struggles to maintain for the service of the republic, it is necessary, on the contrary, to furnish it with fresh troops, with money, and munitions. In fact, if it were demanded of Philip, which he would prefer, that the forces of Diopithes (of what quality soever they may be, I will dispute with no man concerning their character) should be authorised, honoured, reinforced by the people of Athens, or dispersed and destroyed by the malevolence of your orators, who can doubt that this last party would not be that which he would prefer. Thus the thing that our enemy would wish for the most, is precisely that which you wish to do. And will you again inquire, why our affairs go so ill? I will proceed, Athenians, to tell you, without equivocation. I will spread before your eyes the draft of your situation and your conduct. In two words, we will neither fight nor pay. We wish to draw to ourselves the public monies, we refuse to Diopithes those which were legally appropriated to him, and we cavil with him concerning those which he procures, and the use he makes of them. It is thus that we conduct ourselves in all things; it is thus that we persist in our inattention to our own affairs. We applaud, to be sure, as much as you will, those who raise their voices for the honour of the country; but in fact we act as if we were in concert with her enemies. You inquire of those who ascend this tribunal, what is to be done? And I will interrogate you in my turn, and ask of you what I shall say to you? For, I repeat it, if you will not serve the state neither with your persons nor your treasures; if you will neither transmit to Diopithes the funds which are due to him, nor permit him to provide himself elsewhere; in one word, if you will not transact your own business, Athenians, I have no counsels to give you. To what purpose, indeed, can any counsels serve when you permit the licence of calumny to proceed such lengths, as to pursue Diopithes not only for what he has done, but for what he will do? All this, Athenians, you hear with great patience! But you will say, tell us what will happen. Oh! that I can easily do, and that with all liberty; it is not, indeed, in me to speak otherwise.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF SOAME JENYNS, ESQ.

[Few of the fugitive papers of literature can be more interesting than the life of Soame Jenyns, Esq. one of the politest writers of his time; a gallant defender of the citadel of Christianity; a strenuous supporter of limited monarchy; a most able and ingenious expositor of the less luminous passages in the sacred writings; a poet of great sprightliness and fancy, and a prose writer, whose elegantly easy style is pure, unalloyed English, from the mint of Addison. He is, in every sense of the word, a gentleman-like author. Of Shaftesbury it has been justly remarked, that he never could express any thing without the formality, stiffness, and pedantry of his profession. When he laughed it was like an author, and not like a man. On the contrary, in every page of Jenyns, you have occasion to admire his courtly accomplishments, and the urbanity of his style. He is always in his best array, and that is brocade. To every one, studious of the elegant and the dignified in composition, he may be indicated as the glass of fashion, and the mould of form. Above all, he is to be strenuously recommended for the admirable correctness of all his opinions respecting the government of a church, and the government of a state. Whatever may be the opinion of his biographer, who, it is believed, was a presbyterian, and who has done great injustice to the religious, moral, and political character of Mr. Jenyns, it is certain that few writers display more truth and rectitude of sentiment. His contempt for the populace, in which he has the honour to resemble Horace and Burke, his aversion to fanatics, his zeal for all the dignity, glory, and magnificence of government, his hatred of democracy, his scepticism towards the nauseous cant of civil liberty, and his abhorrence for the iniquitous delusions of spurious patriotism, are worthy of the highest praise. His reason and his wit are staunch to the standard of loyalty, and we listen with delight to the lofty and cavalier tone in which he speaks of the ignorance, absurdity, and mischievousness of those presumptuous and vulgar disturbers of the common comfort, who strive to shake the Corinthian column of society.]

Soame Jenyns was born in Great Ormond Street, London, in the beginning of the year 1704. He was the only son of Sir Roger Jenyns, Knt. of Bottisham-Hall, in Cambridgeshire, descended from the ancient and respectable family of the Jenyns of Churchill, in Somersetshire. He was knighted by king William, January 9, 1693-4. His mother was one of the daughters of Sir Peter Soame, Bart. of Hayden, in the county Essex; a woman of great beauty, and of very amiable manners, and elegant accomplishments.

He received a domestic education, at first under the Rev. Mr. Hill, and afterwards under the Rev. Stephen White.

At the age of seventeen, he was sent to the University of Cambridge, and entered a Fellow Commoner of St. John's College, July 2, 1722, under Dr. Edmonson, at that time one of the principal tutors of the college.

He resided there three years, pursuing his studies with great industry; but left the university, as was formerly the usual practice with gentlemen of fortune, without having taken any degree.

From the time he left Cambridge, his residence in winter was in London, and in the summer in the country, in his father's family, as long as he lived.

He early displayed his poetical talents. In 1728, he published The Art of Dancing, a poem in two cantos, inscribed to Lady Fanny Fielding; 1729, he wrote the verses In the Earl of Oxford's Library; in 1730, verses To the Earl of Chesterfield, on his being installed Knight of the Garter; and in 1733, An Epistle to Lord Lovelace. This was followed by the Modern Fine Gentleman, 1746; The Squire and Parson, An Eclogue; The First Epistle of the Second Book of Horace Imitated to Lord Hardwicke; To the Hon. Miss Yorke, on her Marriage to Lord Anson, 1748; The Modern Fine Lady, 1750; and several others, which he collected into a volume in 1752.

Soon after his father's death, at the general election, in 1741, he was chosen one of the representatives for the county of Cambridge, and gave his support to Walpole. He represented it again in the parliament of 1747. In that of 1754 he was member for Dunwich, in Suffolk; and in 1761, took his seat for the town of Cambridge, which place he continued to represent so long as he remained in Parliament.

When Moore began 'The World,' in 1753, he gave his assistance, among others, and contributed Nos. 125, 153, 157, 163, and 178.

In 1755, he was appointed one of the Lords of Trade and Plantations, a place which he held during every change of administration, until it was abolished in 1780, when he retired from the business of parliament. He was, in general, an adherent of the minister for the time being, and was an useful, active, and diligent member of the House of Commons, though he shared, as he admitted in one of his poems, no gift of tongue.

In 1757, he published his Free Inquiry into the Origin of Evil, in Six Letters, 8vo. This work excited much attention, and produced several answers; to which he replied, in an additional Preface to the second edition. He is of opinion, that to produce good exclusive of evil, is one of those impossibilities which even Infinite Power cannot accomplish, and that all evils owe their existence solely to the necessity of their own nature; by which he means, that they could not possibly have been prevented without the loss of some superior good. Many evils, he thinks, will unavoidably insinuate themselves, by the natural relations and circumstances of things, into the most perfect system of created beings, even in opposition to the will of an Almighty Creator; by reason that they cannot be excluded without working contradictions, which not being proper subjects of power, it is no diminution of Omnipotence, to affirm that it cannot effect them. Such is the groundwork of his Inquiry, &c. which was reviewed with great severity by Dr. Johnson, in the 'Literary Magazine' for 1757. He took a revenge unworthy of a man of letters, many years after, in a severe Epitaph on Dr. Johnson.

On the publication of Mr. Hawkins Browne's Latin poem, on the 'Immortality of the soul,' in 1752, Jenyns made a translation of it into English, which was published in Dodsley's 'Collection of Poems,' 1758.

In 1756 he published a pamphlet, intitled Short but serious Reasons for a national Militia, 8vo; and to this succeeded several other performances, both in prose and verse, either in defence of Government, or levelled at some persons in opposition to the measures of administration.

In 1761, he published his Miscellaneous Poems, in 2 vols, 8vo, one which contained some political essays.

In 1767, he published a pamphlet, intitled Thoughts on the Cause and Consequence of the High Price of Provisions, 8vo. This high price he attributes principally to the increase of our national debt, and the increase of our riches, that is, to the poverty of the public, and the wealth of private individuals. This pamphlet is replete with very ingenious observations.

In 1776 he published his celebrated work, intitled A View of the Internal Evidence of the christian Religion, 12mo. This publication was very generally read, and commended in terms of the highest praise, by some, whilst it was spoken of in the slightest manner by others. Though he professes and appears to have written it with a laudable design, yet it has provoked censure from the divine and the moralist, and profane sarcasm from the philosopher and sceptic. He is accused of injuring the cause he professed to defend, by diligently relating, and elaborately displaying the strongest objections which have been raised again the Christian religion, while his mode of refuting them is cold, careless, and unsatisfactory. He seems to have defended Christianity upon principles that lead, as persons may be differently disposed, to scepticism, or to enthusiasm.

His plan is comprehended under the following proposition: 1st, That there is now extant, a book intitled the New Testament. 2dly, That from this book may be extracted, a system of religion entirely new, both with regard to the object, and the doctrines, not only infinitely superior to, but unlike every thing which had ever entered into the mind of man. 3dly, That from this book may likewise be collected a system of ethics, in which every moral precept founded on reason is carried to a higher degree of purity and perfection, than in any other of the wisest philosophers of preceding ages; every moral precept founded on false principles is totally omitted, and many new precepts added; peculiarly corresponding with the new object of this religion. Lastly, that such a system of religion and morality could not have been the work of any man, or set of men, much less of those obscure, ignorant, and illiterate persons, who actually did discover and publish it to the world; and that, therefore, it must undoubtedly have been effected by the interposition of Divine Power, that is, that it must derive its origin from God. Under the third proposition, he reckoned valour, patriotism, and friendship, among fictitious virtue, founded on false principles; and he apprehends that however they have been celebrated and admired, they are, in fact, no virtues at all.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM PARIS TO AMSTERDAM, IN THE YEAR 1796.

Here are no churches, palaces, pictures or cabinets, to arrest or amuse the attention of a stranger. The Beotian Church, of St. Lawrence, has little to exhibit, besides a massy ballustrade of brass, and a few heavy marble pillars, which separates the altar from the nave. From the top of the lofty, but uncouth and clumsy tower, if the traveller is willing to hazard his limbs up a dismal and mean staircase, his curiosity will be gratified, by a distant view of several towns, and much agreeable scenery lying within his very extensive horizon.

The Exchange is a neat building, of free stone, well situated. Its cloisters or piazzas are crowded by one o'clock, and precisely at half past two, a bell rings the merchants off, and whoever stays longer, must pay his guilders—a trait this of Batavian method and punctuality, suitable enough for a country of traders, where economy and thrift are the leading ideas, and considered as even more than minor virtues.

In the principal market place is a statue of Erasmus. He is dressed in a collegiate habit, and makes a very sombre appearance. I could find nothing in the two Latin inscriptions on the different faces of the pedestal, that had enough of point to be worth copying. Sterile sentiments are best clothed in a dead language.

They have a very pretty theatre, situated in the westerly suburbs. The house, last evening, in which a company of French actors played a French comedy, was thinly attended, and the performance was contemptible. In one of the boxes, sat two or three elegant and attractive girls. The Dutch ladies, in general, have not much to boast of what is of so much importance to the sex in other countries, face and figure. It is said, however, that they make very good wives and mothers, and divorces are but rarely known. Polished people, in most countries, dress with fancy, if not taste; and some such there are in Holland: but a flat plain cap, clinging to the temples, is the characteristic head dress of the majority of the industrious and decent females of this modest and methodical republic.*

19th November. Employed our morning in examining some of the extraordinary mills that ply their lofty sails in the neighbourhood. We mounted to the top of a grist mill, that was 106 feet high, the arms of which, were 90 feet, and within pistol shot, were two or three others, from 70 to 100 feet in height. These noble machines are built of brick, and a few of stone. They grind from 12 to 20,000 sacks of wheat annually. But no one can have his corn admitted, until he produce to the miller, a permit, certifying that he has paid the tax upon it. The sacks are all of the same size, and contain about 3 bushels, on which the enormous imposition of 5 guilders, or two dollars, is laid. Few countries tax bread corn, and none so heavily. We next viewed a saw mill. They were then at work for the admiralty, and only 12 saws going. But the owner assured us, he could work sixty at once. The mode of fixing and unshipping the saws, is simple. The same axle gives the motion to the one and to the sixty. The water mills, or those which pump the water from the meadows into the canals, are much inferior, both in bulk and materials.

20th. A very fine morning gave us an opportunity, in the Treuchshuyt, in which we had taken our passage for the Hague, of viewing the gardens, and pleasant houses, which occasionally present themselves on the sides of this canal. For half a mile on each side without the Delft Gate, where we got into our boat, there is a compact range of very neat houses—a few, elegant. To a lover of natural beauties, nothing can be more disgusting, than Dutch gardening. It seems to be a kind of vegetable distortion. Clipped hedges, and the limbs of the trees tortured into formal shapes, are indicative of the Batavian taste for stiffness and artificial beauties. Busts, and statues, without a fig leaf to shelter a charm

* The female multitude exhibit a singular fondness for looking big, or rather round, especially about the hips. They therefore employ various modes of cloathing, to produce this false protuberance. The English and American ladies, not many years ago, shewed a similar taste. The latter now not content with discarding this preposterous retundity, have also dismissed the waste, as being too natural, not to be liable to the imputation of vulgarity.

GEORGE STEEVENS, ESQUIRE.

are continually peeping through the groves, or are seen in the attitude of diving into the fish pond.

We were shewn, at Delft, a plain old house, once the palace of the founder of the republic, the first William, prince of Orange. This great man was shot in this house in 1584, by an assassin, hired for the villainy, by Philip the second. In the great church, is a most noble monument, dedicated to his memory. This magnificent tomb, is worthy the illustrious hero, whose immortal memory it is intended to consecrate.

Delft is a large town, but derives most of its advantages from the situation of it, being nearly midway between Rotterdam and the Hague, having but little trade of its own.—The Dutch India Company having imported such immense quantities of china, as to bring that ware within the purchase of almost all, the manufactory of an inferior kind of procelain, by which this town was formerly celebrated and enriched, is now in a very declining state. Canals, trees, neat stone bridges, quiet, cleanliness, and good order, designate this place, as not inferior to its neighbours in such particulars.

You travel here by hours, not by miles, and therefore, when you inquire how far off such a town is, they reply, that it is one, two or three hours, instead of three or nine miles. The barges move with so much punctuality and exactitude, and the whole country is so intersected by canals, that this mode of estimating distances, is precise enough, and the stranger soon gets accustomed to the language: We here took another boat, and arrived at the Hague at three o'clock.

This very beautiful place, deserves the character which Lord Chesterfield has given it; "That of being the handsomest village in Europe." It is called a village, because it is without walls. It contains forty thousand inhabitants. But if magnificent houses, squares, public walks, broad streets and noble canals, the seat or session of the government, a large garrison, and the residence of the whole diplomatic corps, are any thing in creating a city, this ought to be considered as the first in the Seven Provinces. The Hague is distant about three miles from the German Ocean, and there is a very fine walk through a strait and striking avenue of lofty elms, to the village of Scheveling, which is on the beach at the end of this vista, composed altogether of fishermen. At this little town, you have a boundless view of the North Sea. Nearly on the opposite side of the Hague, is an agreeable outlet, of a mile, extending to the Maison de Bois, a pleasant house of the late Stadtholder. But the pictures, and a great part of that Prince's excellent cabinet of natural history, are now to be found only at Paris.

A convention of the Seven United Provinces, are now in session here, for the purpose of framing a new constitution. The princes having fled, and the old complicated mongrel system being subverted, by the French having overrun the country, it is certainly a favourable time for them, by a consolidation of the different Provinces into one simple and general governmental mass, to erect such a national union of energy and force, as properly administered, may eventually relieve them from that debasement, into which they have certainly fallen. [But more of this hereafter.]

In the course of some political discussion, a Dutch patriot, a little soured with public circumstances, observed that Holland, instead of being the fatted Ox, as France used to call it, ought now to be considered only as the half starved herring, which had slid down the throat of the Leviathan, to escape being devoured.

[Of an editor so conspicuous as to attract the attention of Dr. Johnson, a slight sketch will not be deemed uninteresting, by all who remember that Mr. STEEVENS has been honorably associated with the author of the Rambler, in the office of regulating the text of SHAKESPEARE. Until the year 1765, the plays of this matchless poet, were soiled with age, and blemished by the ignorance of one set of editors, and the rash dexterity of another. But they were gems still, and it was reserved for the joint labours of a JOHNSON and STEEVENS, to exhibit them in the fairest light.]

George Steevens was born at Poplar, in the county of Middlesex, in the year 1736. His father, a man of great respectability, was engaged in a business connected with the East India Company, by which he acquired a handsome fortune. Fortunately for his son, and for the public, the clergyman of the place, was Dr. Gloucester Ridley, a man of great literary accomplishments, who is styled, by Dr. Lowth, poeta natys. With this gentleman, an intimacy took place, that united the two families closely together, and, probably, gave the younger branches of each, that taste for literature, which both afterwards ardently cultivated. The first part of Mr. Steevens's education he received under Mr. Woddeson, at Kingston, upon Thames, where he had, for his schoolfellows, George Keate, the poet, and Edward Gibbon, the historian. From this seminary, he removed in 1753, to King's College, Cambridge, and entered there under the tuition of the reverend Dr. Barford. After staying a few years at the university, he left it, without taking a degree, and accepted a commission in the Essex militia, in which service, he continued a few years longer. In 1763, he lost his father, from whom he inherited an ample property, which if he did not lessen, he certainly did not increase. From this period, he seems to have determined on the course of his future life, and devoted himself to literary pursuits; which he followed with unabated vigour, but without any lucrative views, as he never required, or accepted the slightest pecuniary recompense for his labours. His first residence was in the Temple, afterwards at Hampton, and lastly at Hampstead, where he continued near thirty years. In this retreat, his life passed in one unbroken tenor, with scarce any variation, except an occasional visit to Cambridge, walking to London in the morning, six days out of seven, for the sake of health and conversation, and returning home in the afternoon of the same day. By temperance and exercise, he continued healthy and active, until the last two years of his life, and TO THE CONCLUSION OF IT, DID NOT RELAX HIS ATTENTION TO THE ILLUSTRATION OF SHAKESPEARE, WHICH WAS THE FIRST OBJECT OF HIS REGARD. He died the twenty-second of January, 1800, and was buried in Poplar Chapel. Hayley says of him that

His talents, varying as the diamond's ray,
Could fascinate alike the grave or gay.

The admirable author of "The Pursuits of Literature, a work alike memorable for its utility of satire, its copiousness of learning, and its brightness of wit, often takes occasion to commend the subject of this memoir with highly delicate and discriminating praise. In a strain of noble enthusiasm, and elegant compliment, he thus alludes to his early application to the collation of SHAKESPEARE.

I'll breathe at large etherial air,
Far from the bar, the senate and the court,

And in Avonian fields with STEEVENS sport
Whom late from Hampstead, journeying to his book,
Aurora oft for Cephalus mistook,
What time he brush'd her dew with hasty pace,
To meet the Printer's devil face to face:
With dogs black letter'd in the Stratford chace,
Mouth match'd, like bells, yet of confused race.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Excursion to the Glaciers of Grindenwald.

WE sent back our horses as soon as we arrived at the top of the Great Scheidegg, and set out on foot to descend the mountain. The walk was none of the pleasantest; for we were knee-deep in snow the greater part of the way, and frequently fell into hollows up to our waists, when we could not trace the right path. Towards the bottom of the mountain, we passed through a very gloomy forest of pines and larches, which seemed a fit place for deeds of horror. As we descended lower, we fell in with a romantic little stream, called the Rheigenbach which bustled along by us with some fury, and formed several pretty cascades among the fragments of rock, that had fallen from the heights, and impeded its course. From a high mountain on our left, we beheld a very beautiful water fall, produced by a small stream, which had wandered to the edge of a tremendous precipice, and from the deep gloom of a pine forest, which skirted it, and precipitated itself in a white sheet, but meeting with a projecting rock about half way in its fall, it broke into a cloud of spray which resembled the white dust of the avalanche. But what pleased us most, and detained us half an hour, to admire it, was a rainbow that appeared on the superior part, which as the sun rose, majestically descended with a variety of colours, that were always changing. We were fortunate in arriving, at the only moment of the day, when such a pleasing sight could be witnessed. From thence, we descended, by a path, among the rocks, absolutely resembling a stair case, till we came to a verdant promontory, where travellers usually stop awhile, to admire the beautiful country of Hasli, which this eminence commands. We were now pugged with the only cloud we had met with, (for the sky had been perfectly serene all the day) which settling round the bosoms of the opposite mountains, prevented us from seeing any thing but their rugged summits, and concealed many of the beauties below it.

We quitted our guide and our bundles, to descend along the broken margin of the Rheigenbach, which forms, at this place, some noble cascades. We crossed the abyss, through which this torrent roared, by a stone bridge, of a single arch, far below which, we saw the foaming of the waters. This bridge was shaded, very prettily, by some old beeches, and was covered with goats. We passed among them, with some little apprehension, as there being no walls, on either side, a push from one of them, would, infallibly, have proved fatal, by overturning us into the gulphs below.

We then pursued the torrent, in all its windings, and into its most secret recesses, often with some personal danger, as we were obliged to descend precipices, and clamber over rocks, with frequently little more to depend upon than the overhanging bough of a tree, or the tufts of grass which grew in the crevices. In this manner, we approached, and beheld scenes, that must forever remain invisible to those who will not expose themselves to the same peril, or take the same pains, and we were certainly compensated for all we underwent, by the numerous cascades and boiling cauldrons, we found almost shaded from the light of day, by the thick branching of the mountain shrubbery. Often did we meet with grottos, hollowed out by the beating of the waters, which would tempt a Naiad to take up her abode in them; and rocks, which would defy the skill of an artist to imitate, or a poet to describe. As we continued our course, we encountered a precipice, which was much beyond our power to descend, and compelled us to make a circuitous journey to the green turf we saw below us, which, nevertheless, was not attained without many tumbles, rollings and slippings. From this verdant platform, which seemed formed by nature for the purpose, we beheld the grand fall of Rheigenbach, down an amazing steep, which was white with the foam of the cataract. The spray, which rose in clouds, sprinkled all the neighbouring rocks, and incessantly formed long white vapours, which crept up the sides of the mountain.

We were not so soon satisfied with admiring this beautiful cascade, which is one of the finest in Switzerland, and for which we were indebted to the Pastor Wytenback of Berne, who advised us to cross the Scheidegg, and put into our hands a little printed sketch of the journey, which he had drawn up for the use of travellers. We soon after arrived at the village of Meysingen, which we entered, after crossing the Aar, by a covered wooden bridge.

Meysingen is like all the villages in the valleys, being composed of neat wooden cottages, by roofs, which make an obtuse angle, and project from six to ten feet beyond the walls, serving as a kind of piazza. The gable end is generally made the front, and is often covered with German inscriptions. Instead of a window, they have a chain of windows, with small circular panes of glass, set in lead.

This valley abounds in cascades, which are seen streaming down the mountains in every direction. Many of the hills present the ruin and devastation occasioned by the temporary torrents, formed in the spring, by the melting of the snows, which descending with great violence, tear up in their course, large trees and huge fragments of rock.

As our walk of four leagues from the top of the Scheidegg, with our severe exercise, in descending along the edge of the Rheigenbach, had furnished us with good appetites, we took some small refreshment at Meysingen, and again set out on foot for Brienz, where we soon arrived, after a walk of three leagues, along the flat banks of the Aar. This was a day's journey of twenty miles at least, besides our ride to the top of the Great Scheidegg, which was at least six leagues more.

It is a curious fact, that a pedestrian can travel farther, and with less fatigue, in a mountainous country, than in a level one. I can vouch for this from experience, and I believe it is produced by the continual change in the position of the muscles, which, by this means, relieve each other, whereas in a plain, the same muscles are constantly in tension, and of course, are sooner fatigued. Besides, the keenness of a mountain air, and the grand objects which constantly engage the attention, in such countries as Switzerland, exhilarate the spirits, and enable a traveller to undergo fatigues, which would bear him down in less interesting countries.

The little village or town of Brienz, is placed at the head of the lake of the same name, at the place where the Aar enters it. We found nothing there worth observation; and at day break, the following morning, embarked on the lake, in a little shell of a boat, rowed by one man and two women. This you will think somewhat curious: however, they performed very well, and were so merry, that I scarcely remember ever to have been so much entertained. We breakfasted, during the voyage, on some honey, cheese, bread, wine and cherry spirit, which we had brought with us, very heartily. This spirit, (called in Europe Kirchewasser) is the famous drink of Switzerland, and I recollect seeing it used at Paris, and in Holland, as a liqueur. We shared our provisions with our rowers, whom we relieved, by turns, and finding a spare oar on board, I made use of it, so well, for two leagues and an half, as drew upon me the applauses of my female companions.

The lake of Brienz, is about three leagues long, and bounded, on all sides, by high land. Unluckily for us, the morning was very misty, and the heavy clouds rose no higher than midway; the mountains, which in consequence, appeared all of the same elevation. This often produced strange appearances; particularly when a water fall had its head above the line, when it appeared as if descending from the clouds.

There are some pretty views of castles, towns, and villages, all along this lake, but we saw them to a disadvantage. In a fine day, the prospects must be delightful, particularly towards Grindewald, whose glaciers and pointed mountains, would be distinguished above every thing else.

We landed at Interlachen, from whence we had departed, and walked to the Maison Neufve, where a boat, we had previously engaged, waited for us: a few hours rowing, on the lake of Thun, brought us to the inn of our loquacious landlord, where we found a carriage ready, that brought us last night to Berne, much to his regret, as he promised himself another fleecing of his good friends the American travellers.

We have been engaged to day in visiting our friends, and seeing public institutions. The library is fitted up, I think, with too much elegance. The collection of books amounts to 30,000 volumes: many of them are the donations of English travellers and foreign public officers, who have made Berne their residence for any time.

The library also contains some large bass reliefs, (in the manner of general Pflüger's, at Lucerne) of the country, which are valuable and useful to the Canton. There are also several Roman antiquities, which have been dug up in the neighbourhood.

[To be Continued.]

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. THE LAY PREACHER.

"Here am I, FOR THOU DID'ST CALL ME."

With a voice, O public, so finely modulated, so gratefully soothing to the ear of an ambitious author, that he hearkens to the summons, and is actually indicting a sermon, apologetical for absence from his lay-stall, and for his negligence of the flock.

But who is there among the sons of men, of such self-denying humour, that will not, sometimes, flee from confinement to breathe a little fresh air, and ramble, yea run, a moment, from the drudgery of methodized life?

The clergyman, fatigued with Flavel, and panting under the annual load of heavy sermons, asks from the parish a respite; and, as he cheerily urges his pacer, plodding and slow, like his owner, sings, instead of David's psalms, a hymn to the "Goddess of leisure."

The lawyer choked with the dust of courts, and deafened by the gibberish of the laws, caunters from the circuit; and, placid at his desk, suffers not a plea in bar to obstruct the current of his yawning humour.

The doctor too and merchant in, gaping hours, scorn the recipe and the invoice, and idly dream of subjects more pleasant than subjects consumption, or subjects commercial.

If, therefore, the dignitaries of the church, the Dons in the state, and "the great oneyers" of the mart thus frolick during the holidays of indolence, many circumstances may, at any stage of his course, command a Lay Preacher to rest from his labour. Like a bishop, HORSLEY, or PORTEUS, he is not invested with holy lawn to inspire awe in the vulgar, nor, like those illustrious prelates, is he brilliant and learned to excite the admiration of the wise. When he reflects on the obscurity of his station, and the simplicity of his lessons, he perceives without wonder, the paucity of his disciples. Moreover, within that narrow circle, which may be justly denominated my listening parishoners; Who hath believed our report? Neither by smiles nor by frowns, neither by grave, precepts, nor merry allusion, has the Lay Preacher driven the rake from his mistress, or the reveller from his wine. Men persevere in tracing the path, which Passion has chosen, or Habit has worn smooth, and the monitory sermon if read, is soon forgotten.

To those, who from the intimacy, or partiality of friendship, are anxious that my weekly advice should still be given, and to the public, who have condescended once or twice to ask for me, I will narrate the private motives, which persuade, or compel me occasionally to be silent.

In the first place, I honestly declare, with wonted frankness, that many evil spirits often have dominion over my mind, and that Indolence, Sloth, and Ill-humour, are too frequently suffered to lock up my quills, and overset my inkhorn.

Like a venerable predecessor, I am sometimes the victim of "weariness and painfulness, and watchings," all which are unfriendly to preaching; nor do I believe the archbishop of Canterbury himself, could indite a Pastoral Letter, or make a Visitation Charge successfully, under such unfavourable circumstances.

He, who resolves to speculate, flies, in conformity to the suggestion of HORACE, to the grove; and, in a lonely situation, converses with few, besides his books and himself. But if an author keep no other company, he will not be long qualified to give interest and novelty to his researches. Every line will savour of the lamp, and every page will be mouldy with the damp air of a monkish cell. Hence, to write what the world will cheerfully read, it is absolutely necessary for a Man of Letters to obey the advice of the poet Green, and make

"Trips through the Town, life to amuse,
"To purchase books, and hear the news
"To see old friends, brush off the clown,
"And quicken taste."

Unless he occasionally wander through a great city, and forsake his closet, for a saunter in "Vanity Fair," how could a Lay Preacher correctly describe, or justly censure fashionable follies and the blameful luxury of a Capital? To ridicule, with point and effect, the fantastic foppery of dress, one must actually look across the street, or through the coffee house, and mark the peacock beau "expanding his gayest plumage." To laugh judiciously, at gowns without a waist, or petticoats either transparent or scanty,

* The Facuna of the ancients.

* SHAKESPEARE.

a satiric writer must often gaze at the daughters of fashion, and go, one morning, with giggling girls, to that great band box of millinery, the shop of Miss Chrystal. How could a recluse author know his right shoe from his left, unless he had frequent conferences with Bedford, that modish disciple of St. Crispin, and how, without the lessons of a Tiffin or a Freeman, could he describe a Teoman crown, or the vast circumference of a Chapeau bras?

Now, it scarcely from these premises, need be inferred, that to gather materials for composition, is the work of one day, and to put them into form, is reserved to the next. It is unreasonable to expect that an essayist should be seen with a pen constantly in his hand. His effusions would become wretchedly trite, if he were not permitted to go abroad, searching for some new object, or some new face, to serve as fresh topics for speculation. While I am mingling in the crowd of High-street, lounging in booksellers' shops, listening to the song of glee, laughing with the jocund friend, arguing with politicians, against democracy, or chatting with sensible women, round a supper table, I am, in fact, composing Lay Preachers. The process, though invisible, still continues. I enter hints in my note book, though perhaps I may not expand them in the Port Folio; and keep, for future use, the fruit of my observations, as my tender and prudent mother used to store for me, autumnal apples, to bless my infant palate, in the distant spring time.

But, though for a season, the Lay Preacher's desk has been shut, yet his books have been open, and his thoughts awake. Having seen some novel objects, and read many curious tomes in the course of his vacation, perhaps he is qualified to resume his labours, with some degree of spirit. Through many a pensive eve, he meditates the substantial good of society; and peruses many a heavy book, with a view, by studious chemistry, to extract some essence, to relieve the spirits of his readers. At any rate, as this mode of writing is approved, by those, whom it is his ardent wish to please, he is determined to lay aside every weight of interest, which might bias him to more gainful occupations; to lay aside that sin of indolence, which doth so easily beset an invalid, and an author, and to run with patience the race that is set before him. He looks for recompense, not to the favour of the populace, but to the kindness of the Few; and while he expresses honest thoughts in simple diction, and "strives for the mastery" over Folly and Vice, he is confident of the courteous salutations of his brethren, especially such as be of Cesar's household.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The author of the Pursuits of Literature, whose judgment and taste are sufficient to stamp value on any whom he chooses to commend, thus honourably distinguishes the last editor of Shakspeare—"IAAC REED, Esq. editor of Dodsley's Old Plays, lately republished, is a gentleman of learning, information, and ingenuity, and greatly respected. I mention him with very particular pleasure." In his poem he very playfully alludes to this industrious and useful editor.

"The grave laborious Reed,
Friend to most traders in researches quaint,
Jayman or priest, the sinner or the saint;
Farmer he loves, and Steevens will receive,
Though not Mic Masterre Ireland by your leave.

Among the numerous poetical praises of the muse of SHAKSPEARE, the following not generally known, is among the first both for the propriety of the sentiment, and the dignity and vigour of the expression.

Give me the soul that breathes in Shakspeare's page,
Strength from within, the unresisted rage,
The thought that stretch'd beyond creation's bound,
And in the flaming walls no barrier found,
The PEN RE DIPT IN MIND; I'll hush to rest
The little tumults of a critic's breast.
Eternal verdure bloom in Shakspeare's grove,
Where led by light from heaven, he oft would rove
In solitude and social silence blest;
And in the musings of his mighty breast,
All as he scan'd the volume of the past,
O'er Greece and Rome one wishful glance would cast;
"Mourn not," pleas'd Nature cried, "their sounds unknown,
My universal language is your own."

Goldsmith, in his natural history, pleasantly remarks; because the female bat has two nipples on the breast, and those prominent, as in the human kind, Linnæus has absurdly given this contemptible animal the title of a Primas, and ranked it with man. Such arbitrary associations, produce ridicule, rather than instruction, and render even method contemptible.

In the city of London, every morning supplies the inquisitive with eight papers; every evening, with three, besides others, on various days of the week; and on Sunday morning, on the tables of every coffee house of note, are to be found, all the daily papers. The Chapter coffee house, in Paternoster Row, near St. Paul's, has a very agreeable and useful institution, especially to strangers. All the best periodical works, reviews, magazines, annual registers, &c. lie on the tables, for the general use of the coffee room, together with the popular temporary publications; and a large library is open to every one, who frequents the house, at the yearly subscription of one shilling. All the country newspapers are also regularly filed at this house. Another coffee house deserves to be noticed, for its singular, and complete utility, as to newspapers; this is Peale's, in Fleet street, where is to be found, every newspaper published in the various towns and counties of England, Ireland and Scotland. Persons, who do not chuse to take refreshment, pay three-pence, at Peale's, for reading. There are several coffee houses near the Royal Exchange, in which are to be found, the American, German, and French papers. At the west end of the town, are booksellers' shops, particularly Debrett's, Stockdale's and Ginger's, Picadilly; Ridgway's, York-street. St. James's Square; the Hookham's in Old and New Bond-street; Earle's, Albemarle-street, and Lloyd's, Harley-street, furnished with all the newspapers, and much frequented, about the middle of the day, by fashionable people, and used as lounging places for political and literary conversation.

In the ensuing lines, the poetical reader will recognize a very tolerable parody of part of Satan's address to the Sun, and of Cato's Soliloquy.

Oh, ye, that now with strength superior crown'd
Look from the nail supporting, like the best
Of all the cupboard; at whose sight my shoes
Hide their diminish'd head! to you I call,
But with no fawning voice, and add your name
O boots! to tell you, how I'll use your strength
That brings to my remembrance what support
Ye were; what firm defence against each stone
Projecting craggy, or more dread annoy,
Minute of gravel; or the hateful herb
Of venom multifold, and thorns and furze,
Till time and worse occasion wore ye down.
Well tried, well worn, ye were; and many a mile
Adventurous, on adventure doughty frought
Ye bore my feet fatigued; till time and toil
Mordacious brought ye low; nor did not then
This careful eye perceive nor hand attempt

To stay the coming ill, if ought could stay
The approach of aged ill. Full many a nail
Obdurate with ferran head and point
Of sharpest texture, has for many a day,
Driven by this hand, withstood the grinding rage
Of rocks and roads; though now with glossy sole
Ye shine resplendent, and the cobbler's hand
With scientific skill has stopped each leak,
Where erst the chilly waters found a way,
Not to the foot alluring; yet again
If fail not understanding, ye shall prove
Each various peril; or in stirrup plac'd
Equestrian, or more humble walk at noon
When wealthy wights shall mount the pampered steed

And give the guiding rein; for not to me,
For not to me, in stall well spread and straw'd
Stands the apt courser: No, my boots,—these feet,
These Decemdigitipedum must still
On many a furze-fill'd heath and ragged rock
Annoyant, bear me far with your support.

Through what variety of untried walks,
Through what new scenes and countries must we pass,

The wide the unbounded prospect lies before us,
But vapours, fogs, and tempests rest upon it,
Here will I pause—if there's a walk in store—
And that there is all nature cries aloud
In all her charms—it somewhere sure must lead us,
And that, whereto it leads us shall be pleasant;
But when, or where, or why, or how it shall be
I'm weary of conjecture—This must end them.

Sonnet, written on passing by moonlight through a village, while the ground was covered with snow.

While thus I wander cheerless and unblest,
And find in change of place but change of pain;
In tranquil sleep the village labourers rest,
And taste that quiet I pursue in vain!
Hush'd is the hamlet now, and faintly gleam
The dying embers, from the casement low
Of the thatch'd cottage; while the moon's wan beam
Lends a new lustre to the dazzling snow.
On the cold waste, amid the freezing night,
Scarce heeding whither desolate I stray;
For me, pale eye of evening, thy soft light
Leads to no happy home; my weary way
Ends but in sad vicissitude of care,
I only fly from doubt to meet despair.

Sonnet, written in an Alcove, where Thomson composed his Seasons.

Aerial spirits, who forsook yon sky,
To whisper charmed sounds in Thomson's ear,
Or, shaded from the ken of grosser eye,
Dit to the bard in holy trance appear.
Still grace the sacred grove which once was dear,
On every leaf enweave a druid spell,
And say to the profane, should such come near,
Here did the woodland pilgrim form his cell;
The priest of nature here his temple plac'd
And rais'd the incense of his song on high;
With sylvan honours was his altar grac'd,
His harp was tun'd to heavenly psalmistry:
Here did he pour to Nature's God the strain—
And, should you scorn the worship, shun the fane.

The following whimsical thought occurs in a volume of fanciful poems.

In vain we fondly strive to trace
The soul's reflection in the face;
In vain we dwell on lines and crosses,
Crooked mouth, or short proboscis:
Boobies have look'd as wise and bright
As Plato or the Stagirite.
And many a sage and learned skull
Has peep'd through windows dark and dull.
Since then, though art do all it can,
We ne'er can reach the inward man,
Nor inward woman from without—
(Though ma'am you smile, as if in doubt),
I think, twere well, if nature could,
And nature could, if nature would,
Some pretty short description write
On tablets large, in black and white,
Which she might hang about our throats,
Like labels upon physic bottles.

The following impassioned lines, were written in 1776, by an Anglo American, anxious for the safety of two countries, who ought ever to be linked in bonds indissoluble.

HORACE. Book V. Ode VII: Imitated.

Say, Britons, what wild frenzy draws
Your dreaded swords in impious war:
Sprung from one parent, what dire cause
Prompts your misjudging breasts the horrid fight to dare?

Has not enough of British blood
Been spilt on Canada's wild plain?
Have you not there, as brothers, stood,
To check the haughty foe's presumptuous reign?
No more your swords from faithless Gaul,
Reap glorious harvests of renown;
No more on Spain your thunders fall,
But Britons lie, by Britons hands overthrown:
France triumphs in the fatal tale;
And Spain exulting, views with joy,
Mad faction's hellborn arts prevail,
That every wholesome law, once friendship's bands, destroy.

Tigers than you are gentler far;
On other beasts they only prey:
But you with brothers wage the war,
And rend with impious hand, the tender ties away.
O Britons! Brethren! calm your rage,
Nor with mad hands, in scenes of blood
Like senseless savages, engage:
But know yourselves, and know each country's good.
Let peace her olive branch extend,
And chase wild discord from the plain,
Bid sons to gentle parents bend,
And once again unite, and great in freedom reign.

The following sweet lines to Content, will remind the poetical reader of CUNNINGHAM's beautiful ballad.

O'er the wild heath, at early dawn,
I trace thy foot-steps, gentle power!
At noon, retiring from the lawn,
I seek thee in the shadowy bower.

When chilling blasts and nightly dews
Warn me to quit the drooping grove,
I woo thee to inspire the muse,
Or bless the hours of social love.

And while our offspring void of guile,
Around in sportive frolics join;
I watch'd the fond maternal smile
Of her whose every joy is mine.

Ah! sweet Contentment; heavenly maid,
Wilt thou not hear thy votary's prayer,
Nor the gay sports, nor silent shade,
Nor soft domestic pleasures share?

Vain were the hope: true love disdains
The joys that reach itself alone:
It saddens at another's pains,
It glows with rapture not its own.

As the pale orb of Cynthia throws
Its borrow'd lustre o'er the night,
My soul no native transport knows,
It shines but with reflected light.

Come then, dear Goddess, fix thy reign
In my lov'd Celia's gentle breast;
Chase anxious care, quell murmuring pain,
And, blessing her, preserve me blest.

On a dull Divine who preached up "Patience."

The use of "patience" Somnolus explains,
In tedious, torpid, sleep seducing strains;
And sure his hearers edified must be
Who learn the practice with the theory.

A QUERY.

Ben says the rudest grossest things,
Then swears he never thought to tease you:
But, Ben, was Ralph to kick your shins,
Would you believe he meant to please you?

It is one of the peculiar privileges of the poet to exalt the low, and to dignify the little. Without the magic aid of fancy and of verse, one would suppose that an insect, so apparently contemptible as a grasshopper, never could glitter splendidly, when exhibited by the virtuosi of literature. But a grasshopper has had its poet. Anacreon has advanced this humble inhabitant of the meadows to a station, so lofty, that we are astonished, and so happy, that we almost envy the ephemeron. Such is the creative, such the plastic power of GENIUS, the immortal mind, that of the meanest materials it can frame the most admirable structure.

ODE TO THE CICADA.

O thou, of all creation blest,
Sweet insect that delights to rest
Upon the wild woods leafy tops,
To drink the dew that morning drops,
And chirp thy song with such a glee,
That happiest kings may envy thee!
Whatever decks the velvet field,
Whate'er the circling seasons yield,
Whatever buds, whatever blows,
For thee it buds for thee it grows.
Nor yet art thou the peasant's fear,
To him thy friendly notes are dear;
For thou art mild as matin dew
And still, when summer's flowery hue
Begins to paint the bloomy plain,
We hear thy sweet prophetic strain.
Thy sweet prophetic strain we hear,
And bless the notes, and the reverer;
The muses love thy shrilly tone;
Apollo calls thee all his own.
'Twas he who gave that voice to thee,
Tis he, who tunes thy minstrelsy.
Unworn by ages dim decline
The fadeless blooms of youth are thine,
Melodious insect! child of earth!
In wisdom mirthful, wise in mirth;
Exempt from every weak decay,
That withers vulgar frames away;
With not a drop of blood to stain
The current of thy purer vein;
So bless'd an age is pass'd by thee,
Thou seemst—a little deity.

In an epigram of Antipater from the first book of the Anthologia, the grasshopper is preferred to the swan.

In dew that drops from morning's wings,
The gay Cicada sipping floats;
And, drunk with dew, his matin sings
Sweeter than any cygnet's notes.

Epigram on a Fellow of Trinity College, who was celebrated for having a very large nose, and for writing bad verses.

Our Charles, not a poet,
Why how can you say so?
For if he's no Ovid,
I'm sure he's a Naso.

JOHANNIS SECUNDUS BASIUM III.

Desideratum irriatum, vel os fugitivum.

Da mihi suaviolum, dicebam, blanda puella,
Libasti labris mox mea labra tuis.
Inde, velut presso qui territus angue resultat,
Ora repente meo vellis ab ore procul.
Non hoc suaviolum est dare, lux mea, sed dare.
tantum
Est desiderium flebile suavioli.

TRANSLATION.

One honey'd kiss, sweet wench, I cried,
And quick as thought, thy lips complied;
But swift, as there some serpent lay,
Those swelling lips, thou took'st away;
Ah, call not this a kiss—'twas none,
And only makes me long for one.

MORAL ARITHMETIC.

Flam to my face is often kind,
He overrates my worth and talents;
But then he never fails, I find,
When we're apart, to strike the balance.

Every reader of history and Hume, must remember the gallant exploits of the Marquis of Montrose, who, mindful of his duty to his country, and CHARLES I. employed his courage and care against that accursed herd, who fanatic alike in politics and religion, madly strove to ruin England, by the infamous experiment of Conventicles and a Commonwealth. Indignant at the last atrocity of these barbarians, this accomplished Cavalier, and Mirror of bravery, composed the following noble lines:

Upon the Death of Charles I. Written with the point of his sword, by James Graham, Marquis of Montrose.

Great, good and just! could I but sate
My grief by thy too rigid fate,
I'd weep the world to such a strain,
As it should deluge once again.
But since thy loud tongu'd blood demands supplies
More from Briareus hands, than Argus eyes,
I'll sing thee obsequies with trumpet sounds,
And write thy Epitaph in blood and wounds.

EPIGRAM

On the death of a Dr. Evans, who, like the "egregious Moore," satirized by Arbuthnot and Pope, was famous for the destruction of worms.

Evans, of worm destroying note,
With little folks, who need 'em,
Has all his life been poisoning worms,
And now 's consign'd to feed 'em.

Thus 'twixt our doctor and his foes,
Accounts are pretty trim;
For many years he liv'd by those,
And now they live on him.

AN APPEAL, QUID PRO QUO.

When last we met, I heard from Will,
That all his friends had us'd him ill;
Now by his friends both great and lesser,
I'm told that Will was the aggressor—
How in this case, must judgment run,
For many plaintiffs, or for one?

To a very discreet Lady, with a present of a steel vice.

Chloe so exquisite a maid is,
In word and deed so wondrous nice,
To be on par with other ladies
She surely wants a little vice.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We always wish to hail courteously, infant genius, but "an embryo Bard" we are apprehensive will never arrive at maturity.

"C's" attempt is crude and superficial; though we imagine he might succeed upon less abstruse subjects.

The hints of "B." will not be forgotten.

Many of our readers would be made completely miserable, if they should be doomed for a moment to listen to the "Verses of a happy man."

"Tell Truth," for ought we know, may state a matter of fact, but a Franklin, or some other sage, has said the truth is not to be spoken at all times.

"Nobody" is not guilty of a misnomer.

"The Reverie" is too personal and acrimonious. It does not display the profound knowledge of the human heart, and that dignity of satire which are so conspicuous in the ingenious work of the same name from the author of "The Adventures of a Guinea."

The profound disquisition on the eloquence, of Demosthenes, we hope will persuade the young men in our classical seminaries, not to satisfy themselves with the English versions merely, but to repair to the Greek fountain. Juvat integros accedere fontes.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

The season of sleighing is past, and the belles and beaux of your city must endure the rumbling of wheels for nine long months to come. Perhaps, however, they may still have some relish for a rhyme or two upon their favourite amusement, and the following, though written in a different part of the country, will serve pretty well, (as the almanac makers say) for the meridian of Philadelphia.

TANDEM.

A SLEIGHING SONG.

When calm is the night, and the stars shine bright,
The sleigh glides smooth and cheerily;
And mirth and jest abound,
While all is still around,
Save the horses' trampling sound,
And the horse-bells tinkling merrily.

But when the drifting snow in the traveller's face shall blow,
And hail is driving drearily,
And the wind is shrill and loud,
Then no sleigh shall stir abroad,
Nor along the beaten road
Shall the horse-bells tinkle merrily.

But to-night the skies are clear, and we have not to fear
That the time should linger wearily;
For good humour has a charm
Even winter to disarm,
And our cloaks shall wrap us warm,
And the bells shall tinkle merrily.

And whom do I spy, with the sparkling eye,
And lips that pout so *cherrily;
Round her neck the tippet tied,
Ready in the sleigh to glide!—
Oh! with her I love to ride,
When the horse-bells tinkle merrily!

SELECTED POETRY.

Miss Seward has addressed the following to the poet Hayley.

Horace, Book IV. Ode 7. Imitated.

The snows dissolve, the rains no more pollute,
Green are the sloping fields, and uplands wide,
And green the trees luxuriant tresses shoot,
And, in their daisied banks, the shrinking rivers glide.

Beauty and Love the blissful change have hail'd,
While, in smooth mazes o'er the painted mead
Aglaja ventures, with her limbs unveil'd, Light through the dance each sister Grace to lead.

But, O! reflect, that sport and beauty wing
The unpausing hour—if winter, cold and pale,
Flies from the soft and violet mantled spring
Summer, with sultry breath, absorbs the vernal gale.

Reflect that summer glories pass away
When mellow autumn shakes her golden sheaves;
While she, as winter reassumes his sway,
Speeds with disorder'd vest thro' rustling leaves.

* Shall this word be admitted into the English language? Those who are of opinion that it ought to be so, will say 'aye.' All the ladies vote in the affirmative; therefore, Mr. President Oldschool, do not put your negative upon it.

But a short space the moon illumines the skies;
Yet she repairs her wanings and again
Silvers the vault of night; but no supplies,
To feed their wasting fires, the lamps of life obtain.

[An interesting quality in the writings of Horace arises from his intimate knowledge of human life. There are, perhaps, even in his lyric poetry, more striking sentiments on the subject of morality, more aphorisms, that are remembered and quoted, than any poet, excepting Shakespeare, can produce. Even the fashionable philosophy of his age, which, as usually applied, subverted every generous principle, seems not to have warped his mind from the true interests of society; on every serious occasion it gives place to its severer rival, stoicism, or unites with it in promoting the real welfare of mankind. The following ode, in which the poet complains of the perfidy of Neæra, his mistress, is full of passion, and, from its simplicity, appears to come from the heart.]

'Twas night: serenely on her azure throne,
'Mid lesser stars bright Luna shone,
When thou, regardless of the powers above,
Did'st swear the oath prescrib'd by Love;
And, closely twin'd, as ivy clasps the oak
In fond embrace, the gods invoke,
That 'long as wolves infest the herds, or rise
Orion's storms in wintry skies,
Or wave Apollo's ringlets in the gale,
Or wave Apollo's ringlets in the gale,
Ne'er should our mutual passion fail.'
But soon, Neæra, grief shall rend thy heart
If once I act the manly part,
Nor bear that rivals should enjoy thy charms,
But seek some kinder damsel's arms.
And know, should once a fixt resentment seize,
No more thy hated form shall please;
But thou, who e'er with vain triumphant boast,
Enjoyest the fickle maid I lost,
Though ample herds, rich harvests swell thy
pride,
Pactolus pour his golden tide,
The secrets of the twice-born sage* be thine,
Thy form more bright than Nireus shine,
Soon shall her alter'd love call forth thy tear,
'Twill then be mine to scoff and jeer.

[A song, tender and delicate, like the following, one would hardly expect to glean from the grotesque works of Charles Cotton, who, like a Flemish painter, delights in the low and the burlesque. But if he has travestied Virgil, or jested with Scarron, he appears, on this occasion, to be serious in his address to some beauty of his time, whose sorrow might be mitigated by such refined compliment.]

LAURA WEeping.

Chaste, lovely Laura, 'gan disclose
Drooping with sorrow from her bed;
As with ungentle showers the rose,
O'ercharg'd with wet, declines her head.

With a dejected look and pale,
Neglectingly she 'gan appear;
When, meeting with her tell-tale glass,
She saw the face of sorrow there.

Sweet Sorrow, drest in such a look,
As Love would trick to catch Desire,
A shaded leaf in beauty's book,
Character'd with clandestine fire.

Then a full shower of pearly dew
Upon her snowy breast 'gan fall,
As in due homage to bestrew
Or mourn her beauty's funeral.

* Pythagoras.

Spare, Laura, spare those beauty's twins,
Do not our world of beauty drown,
Thy tears are balm for others' sins,
Thou know'st not any of thine own.

SONNET.

Pensive alone I walk the desert wilds,
Pacing the earth with slow and sluggish step,
Avoiding watchfully all human haunts;
Intently vigilant with speed to shun
The saucy stare, and preying eyes of man.
For, long of gay and cheerful thought bereft,
My form betrays the inward fire that fades me;
And Fancy whispers that the hills and plains,
Rivers and forests, know, tho' deep conceal'd,
The vapid tenor of my weary life;
Yet no retreat so rugged or so wild
In all my devious wanderings do I find
Where Love does not incessantly approach
Conversing still with me, and I with him.

[In Ellis's Specimens of Early English Poetry, we find the following curious acrostic upon Queen Elizabeth. In the Port Folio we should scarcely insert an acrostic, were it not the production of a genuine poet.]

By Sir John Davis.

Early cheerful mountain lark,
Light's gentle usher, morning's clerk,*
In merry notes delighting;
Stint awhile thy song, and hark
And learn my new inditing.

Bear up this hymn to heaven it bear,
E'en up to heaven, and sing it there,
To heaven each morning bear it;
Have it set to some sweet sphere,
And let the angels hear it.

Renown'd Astrea, that great name,
Exceeding great in worth and fame,
Great worth hath so renown'd it,
It is Astraea's name I praise;
Now then, sweet lark, do thou it raise,
And in high heaven resound it.

Lines to the Hon. Mrs. Boscawen, who had erected a seat with inscriptions to the memory of the poet Thomson, the ancient possessor of her house at Hampstead.

To trace great nature's universal sway
With Beauty's charms to blend the moral lay,
Vain were the toil, unless, supremely grac'd,
Enraptur'd Fancy find congenial taste.
Thus, when inspir'd by Thomson's magic power,
Your gen'rous zeal adorns his once lov'd bower,
The votive tablet, and the sculptur'd stone,
Record his Genius and display your own.

EPIGRAM ON A MISER.

They call thee rich, I deem thee poor,
Since, if thou dar'st not use thy store,
But sav'st it only for thy heirs,
The treasure is not thine, but theirs.

* Shakespeare says, in his song in Love's Labour's Lost, 'And merry larks are ploughmen's clocks.' E.

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

"Be assured of this in the first place, (and for this I pledge my head), that all your commanders of vessels, of whatever kind they may be, do not otherwise than Diopithes, and draw money from our allies, the inhabitants of Chios, of Erythrea, in fine of all the Greeks of Ionia and the islands, some more, others less, according to the number of vessels they command. And why do the people furnish those contributions? Do you believe it is gratuitously? No, they are not so unwise. It is that your admirals may protect their commerce, and their possessions: they purchase, at this price, the safety of their ships and their territory; they place themselves under protection from maritime piracies, and the violence of soldiers, although they assure you, with very good reason, that all which they do is only from zeal and attachment for you: could they decently give any other reason for these interested largesses? And do you doubt whether Diopithes conducts like the others? Yes, the people will give him money; for if he has none, and you will not send him any, where would you have him take it to pay his soldiers? From whence should money come to him? From the skies? He lives, and he will live, upon what he can seize, and upon what he can procure, by any means, whether gift or loans. But what is the conduct of those, who, at this day, accuse him before you? They warn all the world to give nothing to a general, whom you are about to prosecute as a criminal both for what is past and what is to come? This is the tendency of all the discourses I hear. He will take cities: he exposes and betrays the Greeks. For you see that these talkers take a great interest in the Greeks of Asia, and are very zealous to defend others, although they think not at all of saving their own country. They talk of sending another general, and against Diopithes! Great Gods, where are we? If he has committed crimes which the laws punish, if he is guilty, let the laws punish him: nothing is wanting for this but your decree, not an army. This would be the height of folly. It is against our enemies, upon whom our laws can have no effect, that we ought to send fleets, armies and money; it is against them that these preparations are necessary. But against one of our citizens an accusation is a judgment. This is enough. This is the part of a wise people, and who speak to you otherwise, would destroy you.

"It is melancholy, I confess, that there are such counsellors among you; but it is more melancholy still, that one of them has only to present himself at this tribunal to denounce to you a Diopithes, a Chares, or an Aristophon, as the author of our calamities, and you receive him, you applaud him, as if he had said marvellous things. But if a faithful citizen comes and says to you, don't believe it, Athenians, it is neither Diopithes, nor Chares, nor Aristophon, who do you this evil, it is Philip! Do you hear him? Without his ambition, Athens would be at peace. You do not, you cannot contradict him: but nevertheless you hear him with pain, and it would seem as if you considered him as acting the part of your enemy. I know very well the cause of this; but, by the immortal gods, do not take it ill if we speak to you boldly, when the question concerns your safety.

"Many of your orators and of your ministers have, for a long time, accustomed you not to dread but in your deliberations, and not at all in your measures of execution; hard hearted and passionate in your assemblies, feeble and soft when it is necessary to act. If they represent to you, as culpable of our misfortunes, one of your fellow citizens, who, you know, is in your power to seize at your pleasure, you desire nothing better: you are quite ready. But when we denounce to you the only enemy over whom you have no power, but by arms, then you hesitate, you know not what part to take, and you suffer yourselves, with great impatience, to be convinced of the truth, which displeases you. It ought to be quite otherwise, Athenians: your magistrates ought to have taught you to be soft and moderate towards your fellow citizens, and terrible against your enemies. But such is the fatal ascendant which your artful flatterers have assumed over you, that you can no longer hear any thing but what flatters your ears, and this has brought you to that extremity, that you have nothing now to deliberate upon but your proper safety.

"In the name of the gods, Athenians, I adjure you all—if the Greeks, at this day, should demand of you a reason for all the opportunities you have lost by your indolence, if they should say to you 'people of Athens, you send us deputies after deputies to convince us that Philip strikes at the liberty of all the Greeks; that he is the common enemy, over whom it is necessary to watch continually, and a hundred other similar discourses. We know all this as well as you; but oh! the most slothful of all men! (it is the Greeks who thus speak to you) when Philip, far absent from his country for ten months, interrupted by the war, by the winter, by sickness, had no means left him of returning to his own country, have you laid hold of this opportunity to deliver the Eubeans? You have not even thought of recovering that which was your own. He, on the contrary, while you were in your own houses, very peaceable and very sound, (if at least we may call sound, those who show so much weakness) he has established, in the island of Euboea, two tyrants under his orders, one at Sciathos, the other at Orea, in the face of Attica, and in such a manner, so to speak, as to have one foot upon your own city. And, to say nothing of other affairs, have you taken any one step to obstruct them? No, as if you had been in concert with him, you have abandoned to him your rights. It is clear then, that if Philip had died ten times for once, you would not have exerted yourselves any more than you have done. Let alone, then, your embassies and your accusations; leave us in peace, since you yourselves love so well to remain so.' Very well! Athenians, do you know of any answer to give to these reproaches? For my own part, I know of none."

You may well imagine, that, after this open reprimand, the orator is too able not to pour some balm into the wounds, he has made, upon their self-love. After having overborne them with reproaches, he presently raises them up again; not by gross flatteries, but by honest praises for all that was noble and generous in the national character, when the Athenians supported it; for all that had been glorious in their political existence, among the Greeks, who had been in the habit of regarding Athens as the rampart of their liberty; finally, for that hatred which Philip bore for the Athenians, and which was for them a title of honour. This second morsel of his discourse is yet superior to the first.

"I know that you have among you men, who imagine they have answered your orator, when they have said to him, what shall we do? I might answer with a single word, and with equal truth and justice: we ought to do every thing which we do not. But I fear not to enter into all the details; I will explain myself fully, and I wish that these men, who are so prompt to ask me questions, would be as ready to execute, when I shall have answered them.

"Begin by establishing this as an acknowledged principle, as an incontestible fact, that Philip has violated his treaties, that he has declared war, and cease to quarrel with one another upon this so vainly and perniciously. Believe that he is the mortal enemy of Athens and of its inhabitants, even of those, who flatter themselves that they are in favour with him. If they doubt of what I say, let them attend to the fate of the two Olynthians, who passed for his best friends, Eutocrates and Leosthenes, who, after having sold him their country, came to so deplorable an end. But that which Philip hates the most is the liberty of Athens; it is our democracy. He has nothing so much at heart as to dissolve it. And he is in the right. He knows, that, even after he shall have enslaved all other people, he can never enjoy his usurpations in peace, as long as you are free; that if any of those accidents, to which humanity is subject, should happen to him, into your arms would all these people throw themselves, who are now attached to him only by constraint; and it is true, Athenians, and it is a justice which ought to be done you, to say, that you do not strive to raise yourselves upon the ruins of the unfortunate; but that you make your power and grandeur consist in preventing any one from becoming the tyrant of Greece, or in overthrowing any one who might become such. You are always ready to combat those, who would reign, and to support all who will not be slaves. Philip, therefore, fears that the liberty of Athens will obstruct his enterprises; it seems to him that she constantly threatens him; and he is too active and too enlightened to bear it with patience. He is, therefore, our irreconcilable adversary; and it is of this, above all things, that you ought to be well convinced, in order to determine you what part to act.

"In the next place it is necessary that you know, with the same certainty, that in all which he does, at this day, his principal design is to attack this city, and consequently that all those who are able to annoy Philip, labour in effect to serve you. Who, among you, can be simple enough to imagine that this prince, capable of grasping at such paltry villages of Thrace, as Mastyra, Drongia, and Cabyra; capable, for the sake of seizing them, of braving the winter, the fatigues and dangers he undergoes; that this man will not cast an envious eye upon our ports, our magazines, our vessels, our mines of silver, our treasures of every kind, that he will leave us the peaceable possession of these things, while he is combating the rigours of winter, to dig up the rye and millet buried in the mountains of Thrace? No, Athenians, no! You cannot believe it.

"Now, then, what does wisdom prescribe in such circumstances, and what is your duty? To shake off, at last, that fatal lethargy, which has destroyed every thing; to ordain public contributions, and demand them of our allies. To take, finally, all the measures necessary to preserve the army we have, since Philip has always one on foot to attack and subdue the Greeks, it is necessary also for us to have one always ready to defend and protect them. So long as you do nothing more than to send, upon an occasion, a few troops, raised in a hurry, I repeat to you, you will advance nothing. You must have troops regularly maintained, intendants of your army, funds appropriated to the pay of the soldiers, a plan of military administration, concerted with all possible care. It is thus that you will be in a condition to demand of your generals an account of their conduct, and of your ministers an account of their administration. If you lay to heart this system of conduct, you will be able to confine Philip within just bounds, and to enjoy a real peace; in this case, peace will be a real blessing; and I acknowledge, that, in itself, peace is a real good; or if Philip remains obstinate in pushing the war, you will be, at least, a match for him.

"It will be said that these resolutions require great expense and great efforts. Yes, I acknowledge it. But consider what dangers await you, if you take not this course, and you will perceive that it is better for you to take these precautions in season, than to wait until you shall be forced into them. Indeed, if a divine oracle had assured you, which no mortal assuredly is able to do, that even in remaining in your inaction, you would not be attacked by Philip; what a disgrace would it be for you, (I call all the gods to witness!) how would you tarnish the glory of your ancestors, and the splendor of this state; if, for the sake of your own repose, you should abandon the Greeks to servitude! Let some other man give you these unworthy councils; let him appear, if there is any one capable of it. Listen to him, if you can bear to hear him. For myself, I had rather die a thousand times, than that such advice should proceed from my mouth."

This kind of provocation, this imposing defiance, is one of those movements whose effect is certain, when an orator has established his irrefragable proofs, his object is to hinder all from attempting to interrupt him, and make him lose the precious and decisive moment, by one of those oblique and disguised resistances, the last resource of those, who no longer dare to contend in front. They have then recourse to partial restrictions, to incidental motions, pretexts for attempting to speak, but which tend only to bring again into discussion, that which they no longer dare to combat, and which seemed to be agreed. It is thus that they sometimes cool the ardour of the general impression, prolong a deliberation which seemed to be terminated, until the minds of men recover from that commotion, produced by the power of truth, and until all the little passions, silenced and disconcerted for a moment, have time to revive. This is what has been so often done among us by motions of order and for amendment, and what an able orator ought to prevent, either by reserving his greatest forces for a reply, or, (which is better, and more certain), by founding the refutation in the proofs like Demosthenes, in such a manner as to overturn, beforehand, all possible objections, to render all contrary advice, ridiculous or odious, to make all men blush either to propose them or to hear them. See here how Demosthenes, in two periods, knew how to shut at once the mouths of the orators, and the ears of the Athenians. He proceeds to multiply his movements in proportion as he perceives the effect of them: he aggrandises and elevates himself in the view of his antagonist, to such a degree as to be able to demand against them capital punishments, and to mark them out as enemies to the state. Accordingly he remained master of the field of battle, like that wrestler, painted by Virgil, who, throwing an enormous girdle into the middle of the arena, and exposing naked his broad shoulders, and his muscular limbs, inspired terror into the boldest wrestlers, and took away all ambition to contend with him.

"But if my sentiments are yours; if you see, as I do, that the longer you connive at the progress of Philip, the more you fortify an enemy, with whom, sooner or later, you must fight, what can induce you to hesitate? What do you expect? Why these delays? these procrastinations? When will you begin to act? When necessity shall compel you? And what will you call necessity? Is there any greater, good gods! for freemen, than the fear of dishonour? Is it this that you wait for? It already besieges you, it presses upon you, and has done so a long time. There is one other necessity, it is true, for slaves....Protecting gods, ward it off from Athenians....Constraint, violence, the view of chastisement. Athenians, I should blush to enlarge on this subject before you.

"It would be too tedious to develop all the artifices which are employed before you and among you. But there is one which deserves to be exposed. Whenever there is any question concerning Philip in this tribunal, there never fail to appear persons who rise up, and cry out 'what a treasure is peace! what a scourge is war! What is the tendency of all these alarms but to ruin our finances!' It is by such discourses that they lure you in your security, and insure to Philip the means of accomplishing his project. It is thus that each one has what he wishes. You remain in your delightful indolence; (and heaven grant that one day it does not cost you dear!) your enemy aggrandises himself, and your flatterers acquire your good will and his money. For myself, it is not you whom I wish to persuade to peace. This care may be safely reposed upon yourselves. It is Philip whom I would gladly persuade to it, because it is he alone who breathes nothing but war. With regard to our finances, have a care of that which will be most ruinous. It is not that which you shall have expended for your safety, but that which you will have lost and suffered, if you will expend nothing. It becomes you, no doubt, to prevent the dissipation of your treasures, but it should be by good order and vigilance, and not by savings wrung from the public safety. That which afflicts me most of all is to see that those same people, who clamour incessantly about the pillage of our finances, which is always in your power to restrain and to punish, are very well contented that Philip should pillage, at his pleasure, you and all Greece. How is it that while the Macedonian renews continually his invasions, while on all sides he takes cities, we never hear these persons condemn his injustice, nor remonstrate against his aggressions; and, on the contrary, as soon as we advise you to oppose his progress, and watch over your liberty, that immediately all of them at once cry out it is a provocation to war. It is not difficult to unriddle all this: they mean if the war we propose should bring inconveniences (and what war does not?) to turn your resentment, not against Philip, but against those who have given you good councils; they mean, at the sametime, to be able to accuse innocence, and secure impunity to their own crimes. Behold the true motive of these eternal protestations against war. For, again, who can doubt that, before any one had thought of proposing it to you, Philip had actually made it. He who had invaded your territories, and furnished against you his succours to the rebels of Cardia! But, after all, if we assume a countenance as if we did not perceive his manœuvres, he will not come to advertise us of them, and give us proofs of them. This would be folly on his part....What do I say? If he should come even upon your territory, he would still maintain that he did not make war. Is not this what he said to the inhabitants of Orea, even when he was upon their lands? to those of Pheres, at the moment when he laid siege to them? to those of Olynthus, at the time when he was on his march against them? He will do the same with us; and if we should wish to repel him, his honest friends will repeat to you, that we are the aggressors. Very well, then, let us bow our necks to the yoke: it is the fate of all who will not defend themselves.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[In Holcroft's new and interesting 'Travels from Hamburg through Westphalia, Holland and the Netherlands to Paris,' a very magnificent work, just received from London, we find an entire chapter dedicated to a generous memorial of the talents and hospitality of the late WILLIAM VANS MURRAY, Esq. ambassador at the Hague.]

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Murray, the American minister, at the Hague; and he, in consequence of what he had heard and read of me, invited me to dinner. His manner was open and well bred; and I willingly accepted the proposal. In a foreign country to meet with a well informed man, who speaks your language, and has been bred under laws and customs that have a great affinity with your own, is a peculiar enjoyment. It is the green mould of Cheshire cheese, which is always poignant to the taste, when at home; but abroad it is a luxury which money can seldom procure.

Mr. Murray, with amiable frankness, told me he knew some of our opinions differed; but that liberal men, acquainted with the world, never made difference of opinion a cause of quarrel. Let them but think and discuss with good humour, and it is the cause of mutual benefit.

All his remarks were of a public nature, and many of them were founded in truth. The American character, he said, was formed on the English; and the Americans, consequently, had in them a mixture of democracy. This mixture perhaps was greater from the daring spirit of many of its original colonists: men who had offended the laws of England, and had been sent into the woods and wilds of America to effect their reform. Here necessity rendered them industrious and orderly; and their audacious habits fitted them to repel the assaults of the native Indians. The progress of the American revolution might be traced: it was prepared, gradual, and for that reason, took a permanent form. In France, the revolution was sudden, the shock violent and the change extreme. The French character, he added, was criminal; but denied that it was vicious. I did not understand the distinction; and he explained it to consist in their impetuosity, and their sudden impulse to act without due reflection. If I rightly recollect, Locke tells us there is no other vice. I perfectly agreed with him that the French had great qualities: that one moment they were magnanimous, at another cruel, and that both were in the extreme.

I know not where he had read it, but speaking of the abolishment of feudal rights, he mentioned one, which finely characterises their capricious tyranny. During the lying in of the lady of the manor, the vassals were obliged to silence all the frogs: if the latter croaked the former were fined or punished.

He maintained it would require a century and a half to render the French as free as the Americans are at present. I hope the calculation was false; but I have fears of which I shall speak in their place. We enjoyed our social hour unclouded by pride, mistrust, or affectation. I know not what we ate, but I know the dinner was excellent: for, exclusive of the meats, which hospitality takes a pleasure to provide, there was "the feast of reason, and the flow of soul." Mrs. Murray honoured us with her company; and the sweetness of her manners gave charms to her understanding. Of this, judging from so short a visit, I can give no decided opinion; but it appeared to be well and perhaps highly cultivated. They have now left the busy world: the forms and seemings and smiles which diplomacy imposes. May they enjoy not only the peace of retirement, but that variety which gives a charm to life: of which tumultuous cities are scarcely more prolific, than the country retreat if well studied and well understood.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF SOAME JENYNS, ESQ.

With the most cheerful alacrity, we resume the life of Mr. JENYNS, an author who will always be perused by every polite scholar with the same pleasure and profit, which are experienced in studying the pages of ADDISON and GOLDSMITH. It should be remembered that in the opinion of the most judicious of the biographers, Mr. Jenyns is entitled to a place among the purest and correctest writers of the English language. He always puts proper words in proper places, and exhibits a most harmonious variety of modulation. He is never muddy in recital, nor impertinent in remark. His logic is strict and his wit is sparkling. But, in the editor's judgment, the chief glory of this dignified author is his political sagacity. His perfect knowledge of that many-headed beast, the people, has enabled him most successfully to deride all the varieties of republican imposture. With the spirit of a BURKE and WINDHAM, he disdained to court the populace with whig grimace, cant and hypocrisy, but powerfully supports a coercive government with his pen from the same generous and just motives, which urged a viscount FALKLAND and a marquis of Montrose to defend it by the sword.

At the close of his work, he makes the following explicit declaration of his belief in the doctrine of the christian religion. 'Should it ever have the honour to be admitted into such good company, they will, immediately, I know, determine that it must be the work of some enthusiast, or methodist, some beggar, or some madman. I shall, therefore, beg leave to assure them, that the author is very far removed from all these characters: that he once, perhaps, believed as little as themselves; but having some leisure, and more curiosity, he employed them both in resolving a question, which seemed to him of some importance—Whether Christianity was really an imposture founded on an absurd, incredible, and obsolete fable, as many suppose it? or whether it is what it pretends to be, a revelation communicated to mankind by the interposition of some supernatural power? On a candid inquiry, he found that the first was an absolute impossibility, and that its pretensions to the latter were founded on the most solid grounds. In the further pursuits of his examination, he perceived at every step new lights arising and some of the brightest, from parts of it the most obscure, but productive of the clearest proofs, because equally beyond the power of human artifice to invent, and human reason to discover. These arguments which have convinced him of the divine origin of this religion he has put together in as clear and concise a manner as he was able, thinking they might have the same effect upon others, and being of opinion that if there were a few more true christians in the world, it would be beneficial to themselves, and by no means detrimental to the public."

Many answers to this work appeared, but only two of them merit notice: "A Series of Letters addressed to Soame Jenyns, &c." by Dr. MacLaine, the learned translator of Mosheim's "Church History;" and "A Full Answer to a Late View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, &c." by the Rev. Henry Taylor, the editor of Ben. Mordecai's Letters to Elisha Levi. "I have the interest of Christianity," says Dr. MacLaine, "too much at heart, not to protest solemnly against your method of defending it. Your View of its internal evidence is certainly exceptionable in many respects. In general your reasoning is neither close nor accurate; your illustrations run wide of the principles they are designed to explain and enforce. One would be tempted sometimes to think that you yourself lost sight of those principles in the midst of the desultory detail of arguments and observations which you bring to support them; and while we admire several fine touches of genius, wit and eloquence, that strike us in the midst of this splendid confusion, we lament the want of that luminous order, and philosophical precision, that are indispensably required in a work of this kind. You look like a man who has been suddenly transported into a new scene of things, where a multitude of objects strike him at once, and who begins to describe them before he had time to consider their arrangement and their connections. Or, to use another figure that comes nearer to your particular case, you look like a zealous and spirited volunteer, who has embarked in a vessel surrounded with enemies, and assailed by tempestuous weather, and begins to defend and work the ship, without that experience in the art of navigation, or the science of defence, that is necessary to ensure success and victory."

In 1782, he published eight Disquisitions on several Subjects, 8vo. In this work, among other ingenious fancies, he communicates his ideas of the pre-existent state of man as a state of punishment, which he attempts to confirm, by a fanciful construction of those passages of scripture, which are commonly adduced in support of the doctrine of original sin. But if the condition of man be indeed so forlorn and wretched, as he represents, it must be likewise entirely hopeless; for if all be wrong at present, it is impossible we should have any proof that things ever have been, or ever will be right. The doctrines which he inculcates in his disquisition on Government, in opposition to the established principles of civil liberty, are in the opinion of Doctor Anderson, inconsistent with the great rights and interests of mankind. In his disquisition on Rational Christianity, he dogmatically condemns the doctrines and spirit of those friends to Christianity, who believe it on rational grounds, and explain it in a manner consistent with common sense; and paradoxically asserts that the doctrines of Christianity are "so adverse to all the principles of human reason, that if brought before her tribunal, it must be inevitably condemned." It will generally, however, be thought by those who are sincere believers in Christianity, that that explanation of the Scriptures which makes them agree with our natural ideas of religion and morals, is as likely to be the true one, as that which ascribes to them doctrines contrary to the principles of reason. His opposition to all the established principles of civil liberty, in his seventh disquisition, was combated in a very sensible and spirited pamphlet, intitled "An Answer to the Disquisition on Government and Civil Liberty, &c." It was likewise ridiculed, with great humour, in the Dean and the "Squire," a political eclogue, humbly dedicated to Soame Jenyns, Esq. by the "Author of the Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers."

This was the last performance which he gave to the world; but he continued from time to time to write verses. Among the last of his occasional compositions, were the burlesque Ode to Lord Carlisle, the Epitaph on Dr. Johnson, the short poem on his Majesty's escape from the attack of a lunatic, and the compliment to Lady Salisbury, 1787.

He died at his house in Tilney-Street, of a fever, after a few days illness, December 18, 1787, in the 83d year of his age, leaving no issue. He was buried in the church of Bottisham. In the registry of burials in the parish of Bottisham for 1787, the following entry was made by the Rev. William Lort Mansell, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, who was then sequestrator of that vicarage.

SOAME JENYNS, in the 83d year of his age.

What his literary character was,
The world hath already judged for itself;
But it remains for his parish Minister to do his duty,

By declaring,
That while he registers the burial of
SOAME JENYNS,

He regrets the loss of one of the most amiable of men,

And one of the truest Christians.

To the parish of Bottisham he is an irreparable loss.

He was buried in this church, December 27,
near midnight,

By William Lort Mansell, sequestrator;
Who thus transgresses the common forms of a Register,

Merely because he thinks it to be
The most solemn and lasting method of recording to posterity,
That the finest understanding
Has been united
To the best heart.

He was twice married, first to Mary, the only daughter of Colonel Soame, of Dereham, in Norfolk, a lady of great fortune, to whom his father was guardian. In this union, as is too frequently the case, his inclinations were less consulted than the advantages that were supposed to be the certain appendages to an alliance with great wealth. The consequence may be imagined. A separation ensued, which his lady did not long survive. He afterwards married Elizabeth, the daughter of Henry Grey, Esq. of Hackney in the county of Middlesex, who survived him.

Three editions of his works were printed during his life. The first was printed in a small 8vo, 1752, the second in two small volumes 8vo, 1761, and the last was printed in one large volume 8vo, 1770. His name was not put to either of these editions; but the title pages of the first and last contain an urn filled with flowers round which a wreath is entwined, charged with the motto to his arms, Ignavis nunquam. In 1790, his works were collected in 4 vols. 8vo, including several pieces never before published, by Charles Nelson Cole, Esq. with "Short Sketches of his Life," which have been chiefly followed in the present account. The first volume contains his Miscellaneous Poems. The second, the translation of Browne, De Animi Immortalitate; five numbers of the "World;" Short but Serious Reasons for a National Militia; Thoughts on the Causes and Consequences of the present high price of provisions; The objections to the taxation of our American colonies by the Legislature; Reflections on several subjects; Thoughts on a Parliamentary Reform; A scheme for the Coalition of Parties; Thoughts on the National Debt, never before published. The third, "A Free Inquiry into the nature and origin of evil, in six letters; On Evil in general, On Evils of imperfection, On Natural Evils, On Moral Evils, On Political Evils; and seven disquisitions, On the chain of Universal Being, On cruelty to inferior animals, On the Pre-existent State, On the nature of Time, On the analogy between things Material and Intellectual, On Rational Christianity, On Government and Civil Liberty, The fourth, View of the Internal evidence of the Christian Religion, and short and cursory observations on several passages in the New Testament, never before published.

His poems were inserted in the edition of "The English Poets," 1790, and have been reprinted with the following additional pieces from Mr. Cole's edition, 1790, written in the Earl of Oxford's Library at Wimple; to a Noddy in Pancharilla's breast, from Bonfarius, given to a lady with a watch; Belphegor, a Fable from Machiavel; a dialogue between the Right Hon. Henry Pelham, and Madam Popularity; a Simile; a passage in Ossian versified; on seeing the Earl of Chesterfield at a ball; the American Coachman; Burlesque Ode, written at the Countess of Salisbury's assembly; Epitaph on Dr. Johnson; on a late execrable attempt on his Majesty's life.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE LAY PREACHER.

"How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard! When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep?"

Not until you have had another nap, you reply. Not until there has been a little more folding of the hands.

Various philosophers and naturalists, have attempted to define man. I never was satisfied with their labours. It is absurd to pronounce him a two legged unfeathered animal, when it is obvious, he is a sleepy one. In this world, there is business enough for every individual. A sparkling sky over his head, to admire, a fertile soil under his feet, to till, and innumerable objects useful or pleasant to pursue. But, such, in general, is the provoking indolence of our species, that the lives of many, if impartially journalized, might be truly said to have consisted of a series of slumbers. Some men are infested by day dreams, as well as by visions of the night. They travel a certain insipid round, like the blind horse of the mill, and, as my Lord BOLINGBROKE observes, perhaps beget others to do the like after them. They may, sometimes, open their eyes a little, but they are soon dimmed, by some lazy fog. They may sometimes stretch a limb, but its effort is soon palsied by procrastination. Yawning, amid tobacco fumes, they seem to have no hopes except that their bed will soon be made, and no fears, except that their slumbers shall be broken, by business clamouring at the door.

How affectionate is the reproachful question of Solomon, in the text? The Jewish prince, whom we know to be an active one, from the temple which he erected, and from the books which he composed, saw, when he cast his eyes around his city, half his subjects asleep. Though in many a wise proverb, he had warned them against the baneful effects of indolence, they were deaf to his charming voice, and blind to his noble example. The men servants and the maid servants, whom he hired, nodded over their domestic duties, in the royal kitchen, and when in the vineyards he had planted, he looked for grapes, lo! they brought forth wild grapes, for the vintager was drowsy.

At the present time, few Solomons exist, to preach against pillows, and never was there more occasion for a sermon. Our country being at peace, not a drum is heard, to rouse the slothful. But though we are exempted from the tumult and vicissitudes of war, we should remember there are many posts of duty, if not of danger, and at these we should vigilantly stand. If we will stretch the hand of exertion, means abound to acquire competent wealth and honest fame, and when such ends are in view, how shameful to wilfully close our eyes. He, who surveys the paths of active life, will find them so numerous and lengthened, that he will feel the necessity of early rising, and late taking rest, to accomplish so much travel. He who pants for the shade of speculation, will find that literature cannot flourish in the towers of indolence, and amid monkish gloom. Much midnight oil must be consumed, and innumerable pages examined, by him, whose object is to be really wise. Few hours has that man to sleep, and not one to loiter, who has many coffers of wealth to fill, or many cells in his memory, to store.

Among the various men, whom I see in the course of my pilgrimage through this world, I cannot frequently find those who are broad awake. Sleth, a powerful magician, mutters a witching spell, and deluded mortals tamely suffer this drowsy being to bind a fillet over their eyes. All their activity is employed, in turning themselves, like the door on its rusty hinge, and all the noise they make in this world, is a snore. When I see one, designed by nature, for noble purposes, indolently declining the privilege, and heedless, like Esau, bartering the birthright, for what is of less worth than his red pottage of lentiles, for liberty to sit still, and lie quietly, I think I see not a man, but an oyster. The drone in society, like that fish, on our shores, might as well be sunken in the mud, and inclosed in a shell, as stretched on a couch, or seated in the chimney corner.

The season is now approaching fast, when some of the most plausible excuses, for a little more sleep, must fail. Enervated by indulgence, the slothful are remarkably impatient of cold, and they deem it never more intense, than in the morning. But all the austerer months have now rolled away, and the sluggard, if he will abandon his couch, at the dawn, may now expatiate, in the open fields, without being benumbed. He may be assured, that sleep is a very stupid employment, and differs very little from death, except in duration. He may receive it implicitly, upon the faith both of the physician and the preacher, that morning is friendly to health and the heart; and if the idler, manacled by the chains of habit, at first, can do no more, he will do wisely, and well, to inhale pure air, to watch the rising sun, and mark the magnificence of nature. Let him, at day spring, wander over the range of the mountains, and search for every green thing. Let him cheer his senses, and excite his imagination, with the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys. Let him open his eyes, and survey the clear firmament, and beauty of Heaven. He will soon rejoice to escape from the thralldom of Sluggishness, and discover the intimate connexion between active Employment and true Felicity.

The morning is given to man, not for drowsy repose, but for energetic exertion, and laborious research. We are exhorted to be up and doing. Innumerable are the subjects, which claim our early care. To know how the world was made, and the operation of the elements; the beginning, ending and midst of the times; the alterations of the turning of the sun, and the change of seasons; the circuits of years, and the positions of stars; the diversities of plants, and the virtues of roots; the violence of winds, and reasonings of men. Above all, let it be remembered, that "Whoso seeketh Wisdom early, shall have no great travail, for he shall find her sitting at his doors."

Dr. JOHNSON, with all that strength of style, and liveliness of illustration, for which he was so eminently distinguished, has described an idler, as one who professes idleness in its full dignity; who calls himself an idler, as Busiris in the play, calls himself the proud; who boasts that he does nothing, and thanks his stars, that he has nothing to do; who sleeps every night, till he can sleep no longer; and rises, only that Exercise may enable him to sleep again.

To avoid meriting a character so disgraceful; to be happy at home, useful abroad, and to acquire all the glories of honest fame, we cannot too often meditate on the omnipotence of Industry. Let the 'torpid monk' vegetate like the creeping ivy, in his dank cell, but youth, ambitious and aspiring, must, like a good soldier, be always on the alert.

Is not the field, with lively culture green,
A sight more joyous than the dead morass?
Do not the skies with active ether clean,
And fann'd by sprightly zephyrs, far surpass
The foul November fogs, and slumb'rous mass,
With which sad Nature veils her drooping face?
Does not the mountain stream, as clear as glass,
Gay dancing on, the putrid pool disgrace?
The same in all holds true, but CHIEF IN HUMAN RACE.

It was not by vile loitering in ease
That Greece obtain'd the brightest palm of art,
That soft yet ardent Athens learn'd to please,
To keen the wit, and to sublime the heart.
In all supreme! complete in every part!
It was not thence majestic Rome arose,
And o'er the nations shook her conquering dart,
For sluggards brow the laurel never grows,
Renown is not the child of indolent Repose.

Had unambitious mortals minded nought,
But in loose joy their time to wear away;
Had they alone the lap of dalliance sought,
Pleas'd on her pillow their dull heads to lay,
Rude Nature's state had been our state to day;
No cities e'er their towery fronts had rais'd,
No arts had made us opulent or gay;
With brother brutes the human race had graz'd,
None e'er had soar'd to fame, none honoured been,
none prais'd.

Great Homer's song had never fir'd the breast
To thirst of glory and heroic deeds;
Sweet Maro's muse, sunk in inglorious rest
Had silent slept amid the Mincian reeds:

The wits of modern times had told their beads
And monkish legends been their only strains;
Our MILTON'S Eden had lain wrapt in weeds,
And SHAKESPEARE stroll'd and laugh'd with Warwick swains.

Dumb too had been the sage historic muse,
And perish'd all the sons of ancient fame;
Those STARRY LIGHTS OF VIRTUE, that diffuse
Through the dark depth of time their VIVID FLAME,
Had all been lost with such as had no name.
Who then had scorn'd his ease for others good?
Who then had toil'd rapacious men to tame?
Who in the public breach devoted stood,
And for his country's cause been prodigal of blood?

Another irrefragable reason for early exercise of the body, and habitual employment of the mind is the inevitable fate of Disgust and Disease, which pursues the wretched victims of Sloth and Lassitude. The poet THOMSON, who was himself sometimes a sufferer from the enervating effects of Indolence, has, in very noble and impassioned lines, contrasted the gloom of melancholy sickness with the purple light of the sane mind in the robust body.

Ah! what avail the largest gifts of Heaven,
When drooping health and spirits go amiss?
How tasteless then whatever can be given?
Health is the vital principle of bliss,
And exercise of Health. In proof of this,
Behold the wretch who slugs his life away,
Soon swallow'd in disease's sad abyss;
While he, whom toil has brac'd, or manly play,
Has light as air each limb, each thought as clear as day.

Oh! who can speak the vigorous joys of health!
Unclogg'd the body, unobscur'd the mind:
The morning rises gay with pleasing stealth,
The temperate evening falls serene and kind.

Lastly, let it be remembered that Indigence and Contempt are the usual companions of the slothful. The vivid apostrophe of SOLOMON to the sluggard is a tremendous warning to every dilaatory loiterer. Thy poverty shall come, as one that travaileth, and thy Want as an armed man. If this be powerless to rouse from the stupor of laziness, from the apoplexy of the soul, the patient is in the last stage of morbid indolence; and can be summoned from the deep sleep into which he has fallen, neither by the drums of glory, nor the trumpets of Fame.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM PARIS TO AMSTERDAM, IN THE YEAR 1796.

The convention, which is composed of members, all chosen by the people, act in the double capacity of the states general, or legislative council, and as delegates, specially empowered to frame a new system of government. When the latter business is completed, the form of government is to be submitted to the ratification of the citizens, and if approved by them, this heterogenous assembly is to be dissolved, and a legislature to be called, under the new constitution. Numerous as are, and always have been, their taxes, their national debt amounts to six hundred millions of florins, or fifty millions of pounds sterling. This debt creates a preliminary and mountainous difficulty in the formation of the new government; the different provinces being very unequally burthened, in this respect, Groningen, Overijssel and Gelderland, owing but little, while the maritime Provinces of Holland and Zealand are very deeply involved.

We passed from the Hague to Leyden, a distance of ten miles, by a pleasant canal, which presents, on both its sides, a great number of summer boxes and gardens. This is the third town in point of size in Holland. It has several very good streets, especially a spacious one that runs through it, extending from the Hague to the Utrecht Gate. About midway, stands the Stadthouse, which is a very large, and considering its age, a handsome building. The town is surrounded by broad ramparts, and concomitant wet ditches. Trees are planted on these ramparts, whence, in different directions, there arises to a foreigner, a charming view of canals and meadows. To the native, it must have too much of sameness; and I confess, that this sort of scenery begins to tire, from its monotony. We were told that there were some pictures of the Dutch school, that were worth viewing; but the arrangement of our time admitted only of our seeing the university, which consists of two brick buildings, mean, both in size and architecture. They contain lecture rooms and a library; the students and pupils, as well as the different professors, having their lodgings in different houses of the town. The wall of the mathematical school room, was crowded with models of redoubts and fortifications. The lecture room of the professors of anatomy, and of the materia medica, had a very numerous collection of skeletons, of all ages and sizes, both of the human kind, as well as of animals; and many anatomical preparations. You see also an excellent and critical preservation, the human fetus, in every stage of its progress, from the impregnated germ, to the moment of parturition; with a variety of other similar pleasant objects, which enable the faculty to convert into a lucrative and sapient business, the most disagreeable, although perhaps the most necessary profession, established in all civilized countries.

The library is opened only once a week, and besides some black folios of civil law, the fathers, as they are called, and some huge biblical commentaries, has not much to exhibit. Scaliger, Boerhaave, and several other imposing names, were once professors here. This university is the most ancient of the five which are established in those provinces. It has always been the most celebrated; but like those of other countries, is now upon the wane. Had the season of the year been more favourable, I would not have omitted a walk through the Botanic Garden; the exotics of which, have been greatly multiplied, by the attention and assistance of the Dutch East India Company.

This town had very considerable manufactories of cloths and different stuffs; but since the invasion of it, by France, its war with England, the difficulties of a revolutionary state, and the discordant views of two violent parties, added to a total suspension of commerce, they are reduced, in common with others of the country, to a very narrow compass.

22nd. November, Again we had recourse to a Trechtschuyt, which landed us in the evening at Haerlem, a place celebrated in the revolutionary and military history of Holland, for having stood a siege of ten months, in 1673, against an army of Spanish veteran troops, headed by the Duke of Alva. The fortifications then, must have been very different from what they now appear, or the knowledge of military tactics much inferior to those of the present day; a single wall of brick, with a deep and broad fosse, filled with water, being the amount of its defensive works.

In the morning, we took a walk of a mile, to view the magnificent house of Mr. Hope, the great European banker, lately of Amsterdam, who, thinking England a safer place for property than his own disorganized country, has withdrawn, with his family, to London. It is situated near a wood, which, with that of the Prince of Orange, at the Hague, are, I believe, the only two in Holland. The front of this palace, is superior to any thing in this province. The noble suit of apartments, which include, a music room, saloon and a gallery, for pictures, may vie with any thing at Versailles. The superb finishing, throughout the whole, with its marble columns, pilasters and staircases, justify the expense of one million of florins, or ninety thousand pounds sterling, which this Chateau is said to have cost. The grounds are laid out in the English style of gardening, and there is a charming hermitage, as well as many marble statues, and other ornaments, to complete the beauties of this retirement. When viewed from the rear, there appears a defect, in its having but one wing. A most valuable collection of pictures, by the first artists, took their flight with the proprietor.

Hitherto no confiscations on the part of the Dutch government, have been decreed against their emigrants. Whether this arises from a dignified rectitude in the present existing powers, or is produced by the apprehension of the result of the present war, it may be difficult to ascertain. But let the motive be what it will, it certainly operates in preventing much individual mischief. From the proximity of this large town to the German Ocean, consequences of incalculable value would result from cutting a canal, which, in a north-westerly direction, of four miles only, would unite it with that sea. But the predominating influence of Amsterdam, has hitherto frustrated this wise and reasonable measure.

A very clear atmosphere enabled us to take a full view of the city, from the steeple of the great church, which stands in a large square, where the markets are held. This church is remarkable only for containing the noblest organ in Europe. Some of the pipes are of a prodigious size. It was Tuesday, and we had an opportunity of hearing its tones. The organist has a salary for playing every Tuesday and Friday, from twelve to one o'clock, for the gratification of all the inhabitants who think proper to attend. There were fifty or sixty burghers, and a few young women, who continued walking during the hour. The sounds had more of thunder than of sweetness. Some of the keys produced a wonderful imitation of the human voice. The pipes are silvered, and the top of the different cluster of pipes, surmounted with statues and other ornaments. This truly musical monument, including the superb marble columns that support it, is seventy feet high.

The manufactories here, were principally of thread and tapes. They also made some silk and velvet goods. But it was their bleacheries that furnished the most employment. The fine linens from Ireland, as well as cambric, from Flanders, were sent here, for the benefit of the waters of the Meer, the slimy qualities of which, were well adapted for whitening. They boast of their alderman Costar, who they say, was the inventor of printing, in 1440.—His first attempt was with wooden types: and they add, that John Faust was a servant of the ingenious Burgher, and while his pious master was at church, stole his imperfect materials, and at Mentz, claimed to himself the merit of the discovery. There is a range of houses, along a broad canal here, which may be called splendid; but no other instances of show, or taste, appear in any thing. The households of the Dutch, are little isolated communities, in which solitude and sordidness are constant inmates.

The distance to Amsterdam, being only ten miles, and the road paved, we took carriage. The canal which lies along this road, had but a single angle in it, excepting that about midway. The land which lies between the lake of Haerlem and a branch of the Zuyderzee, is so narrow, that the canal cannot be carried through it, and here the passengers quit the boat, and walk through a small village, to enter another, where the canal again commences. This lake, or as the map makers call it, Merd' Haerlem, is a large collection of fresh water, about fourteen miles by eight or nine. It is seen, for the greatest part of the way, on the right, and on the left, what is called the I' river, but is in fact, only an arm of the sea. The lake is the highest water, and, at the place of union, or more properly, spot of separation, called the half Wegen Sluice, the dyke, or bank, is nearly fifty feet in thickness. This passage, well guarded, might be made an important defensive outwork to Amsterdam.

30th November. Amsterdam, according to a census lately taken, contains two hundred and nineteen thousand inhabitants, of which forty-four thousand are Jews. It is built in a crescent form, surrounded by a wall of earth and brick. That part of the ditch, which I saw, was deep and broad, and is continued round the ramparts, which are also strengthened, by bastions, at equal distances, on each of which, there is a windmill. It has also eight handsome gates, of free stone. The little river Amstel, runs through it, which supplies the different canals with water; but, in this respect, Rotterdam has greatly the advantage, because the canals of the latter, being fed by the Maase, can never want fresh water; but in summer, the defective stream of the Amstel, does not afford a sufficient circulation, and, of course, the canals become putrid, from stagnation. The streets, which have canals in them, are wide, and made pleasant, by the trees on the sides of the canals. The other streets are narrow, and, for Holland, dirty. They are kept always wet, in consequence of a small cask of water, with holes in it, which is placed in the front of every sledge, (for they have no carts or trucks) in order to keep the stones wet, that the loaded sledge may move easily over the pavement. This is intended to prevent great burthens being carried, which would injure the pavement, if not endanger the street; for the whole city stands on a foundation, which the cautious Hollander sometimes thinks is a little suspicious. Here are upwards of six hundred bridges, many of them of stone. Expensive as they must have been, from the population and trade, in peaceable and prosperous periods, they were indispensable. As they have little of the magnificent or ornamental to exhibit, you are always, (on inquiring what is to be found worth seeing) directed to the stadthouse, as a wonderful work, that supports Atlas, with the world on his back. And when you arrive there, you are informed that this town edifice, is two hundred and eighty-two feet long, two hundred and thirty-two broad, and one hundred and sixteen high, and that it is erected on thirteen thousand six hundred and fifty-nine timber trees, drove into the marsh. Your attendant sells you a little pamphlet, which contains a particular description of the whole house. The different apartments, are mostly finished in marble. All the public rooms have paintings: one of a Dutch entertainment, by Vandyke, will imprison attention; and there is, over the door, in one room, a most admirable description of some children, so ingeniously painted, that within a few feet distance from them, you mistake them for figures in baso relievo. Within the walls, are different prisons. The judicial courts are all holden here. The burgo-masters have also their rooms. The public offices are also kept here; and the celebrated bank of Amsterdam, (the supposed riches of which, for so many years, afforded a fanciful feast to credulity) have their vaults. When the French army took possession of the city, they made some discoveries, that led them to prefer a certain sum, in contribution, from all the provinces, to having recourse to these vaults. Nobody now thinks the bags there, are either so numerous, or so weighty, as Dutch craft, and a peculiar management of this singular institution, once duped Europe into a belief of.

They have a few hackney coaches, but more of a close kind of chairs, fixed on a sledge, to which a horse is tackled, who slowly drags the passenger along, while the driver walks by the side of the machine, holding the reins. Dutch phlegm alone, could have suggested so snail like a movement. Heaven pity the man of an irritable fibre, who stands in need of dispatch in any thing in this country.

In a town, wholly confined to traffic, a foreigner ought not to expect meeting many of those objects, which present themselves in the capitals of other countries. The mercantile traveller, will very naturally be led to the Exchange, and to the quays. The first, he will find a plain, convenient brick building, crowded into a narrow street, in the neighbourhood of the stadthouse; and if he has visited the port first, will be surprised at the vast number of merchants and traders, who fill the former. From the quays, he will see tiers of ships, with their topmasts down, now only exhibiting the melancholy evidence of what their commerce was. At present, foreigners alone are the navigators of what remains of it; and amongst them, our enterprising countrymen appear to have a full share.

The person who would contemplate man in his most humiliated state, should go to the spin house, wherein are confined seven hundred women and girls, and two hundred men and boys, who earn a wholesome, but coarse diet and covering, by spinning and weaving the roughest kind of wrapping. And if he would see human nature still more debased, let him go to the rasp house, and view half naked convicts chained to a block, filing logwood.

The two large synagogues of the German and Portuguese Jews, are worth visiting, if it is only to observe one, among the various absurd modes, mankind have hit upon, for worshipping the supreme Being. What must have been the state of society, when shouting and howling were acts of devotion, and men compelled to believe, that so the deity had ordered! Moses and Aaron might be very shrewd Hebrew politicians, but surely, very unfit legislators for a civilized people.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

When a person, for a splendid servitude, foregoes an humble independency, it may be called an advancement, if you please, but it appears to me, an advancement from the pit to the gallery.

A glass or two of wine extraordinary, only raises a valetudinarian to that warmth of social affection, which had naturally been his lot in a better state of health.

The worst inconvenience of a small fortune, is that it will not admit of inadvertency. Inadvertency, however, ought to be placed at the head of most mens' yearly accounts, and a sum as regularly allowed to it as any other article.

A proper assurance and competent fortune are essential to liberty.

Taste is pursued at less expense than fashion.

The excellent epigram of DRYDEN, upon MILTON, has been deservedly admired; it is not, perhaps, generally known, that he was indebted, both for the thought and sentiment, to a Latin epigram, on Garnier, the French tragic poet.

In Roberti Garnerii opuscula tragica.

Trestragicos habuisse vetus se Græcia jactat:
Unum pro tribus his Gallia nuper habet,
Æschylon antiqua qui majestate superbus,
Grande cothurnato carmen ab ore sonat.
Quem Sophocles sequitur perfectior arte priorem,
Nec minus antiquus, nec nimis ille novus.
Tertius, Euripides, Actæ, fama, theatri,
In cujus labris Attica sedet apes.
Ad nunc vincit eos, qui tres Garnerius unus
Ferna fere tragicis præmia digna tribus.

JOH. AURATUS.

SONNET

On leaving a mineral spring.

Ye scenes, long courted for salubrious powers,
Where nature with her shelter'd meads hath blest
The breezy upland, purpled o'er with flowers,
And latent stream with mineral dew besprent.
In future seasons, may your charms be lent,
While leisure leads along my roscate hours
Thro' the smooth vale, or up the steep ascent,
When spring looks gay, or autumn wildly fours;
For sweet, tho' swift, alas! the moments fled,
As near yon cot, I hymn'd my matin lay,
And hallow'd are the paths peace deigns to tread,
And dear is every vestige of the way.
And blest each scene which frames the mind to share,
"Divine oblivion of low thoughted care."

The "Pupil of Pleasure," a severe, but just illustration of the principles of Chesterfield, and of their fatal tendency on the happiness of the individual, as well as society, is penned with exquisite humour and pathos. The ingenious Hugh Kelly observed, that it was "a happy conception, and safe delivery." Not long after, appeared "Shenstone Green," written for the purpose of shewing the fallacy of the benevolent, but chimerical idea, which the amiable lord of the Leasowes had promulgated, of building a village, filling it with inhabitants, and settling them in such a way, as to be productive of felicity to themselves, and of advantage to the community to which they belonged. This fairy dream, this Utopian scheme, is, at once, most happily ridiculed and exposed. And the reader is equally delighted with the characters introduced, and instructed, by the knowledge of nature, which their development displays.

After the lapse of several years, appeared Mr. Pratt's capital novel, "Family Secrets," in which pleasantry and pathos, humour and gravity, are alternately employed, to enforce some great and important truth, to paint virtue in her brightest attire, and to deter from vice, by the misery attendant on her footsteps. The character of Partington, and John Fitzorton, are not only excellent, but perfectly new to the public; and the traits of Caroline and Olivia, represent two women, which are models for the formation of the human mind and manners, that are almost contrasts to each other, yet equally delightful, and by no means out of the reach of imitation.

The spirits, when exhausted, have scarcely the force to be impatient; but they must be diligently watched, that they do not become pettish.

A recent traveller through the Netherlands, introduces the following anecdote.

I had endeavoured to fall into conversation with two of the passengers, who left the vessel; a youth and an elderly man, but the latter returned me a dry answer; and I am easily repulsed. There was something of contempt in his looks. I wondered what it meant, and I soon discovered. I took off my spectacles, to read, and he exclaimed to the youth, with great self-satisfaction, and glancing at me, hast ich nicht gesart? Did not I say so? The good soul, no doubt, thought it contemptible foppery, and affectation, to wear spectacles. Is there a man, who does not, or cannot recollect, how angry he has often been, that he could not make all the world as wise as himself? There is blindness, that cannot read with spectacles; there is blindness, that cannot read without spectacles; and there is blindness, that can neither read with nor without.

The Welsh poetical triads are a species of composition probably wholly unknown to most of our readers. The following, in the opinion of the translator, contains many valuable observations, expressed with singular brevity.

The three foundations of genius are the gift of God, human exertion, and the events of life.

The three first requisites of genius: an eye to see nature, a heart to feel it, and a resolution that dares follow it.

The three things indispensable to genius: understanding, meditation, and perseverance.

The three things that enoble genius: vigour, discretion, and knowledge.

The three tokens of genius: extraordinary understanding, extraordinary conduct, and extraordinary exertions.

The three things that improve genius: proper exertion, frequent exertion, and successful exertion.

The three things that support genius: prosperity, social acquaintance, and applause.

The three qualifications of poetry: endowment of genius, judgment from experience, and felicity of thought.

The three pillars of learning: seeing much, suffering much, and writing much.

The Botany Bay Gazette, of which some numbers have been received in England, contains the following very characteristic bon mot. An edition of Bailey's Dictionary being put up at auction, the vendue master observed that it was a New Bailey. I am glad of that, with all my heart, replied a bidder, for most of us have had enough of the old one.

The author of the following elegant levities was RICHARD LOVELACE, Esq.* one of the most gay, gallant and accomplished cavaliers in the court of Charles I. Mr. Herdly, with equal taste and propriety, styles him elegant, brave, and unfortunate; the pride of the softer sex and the envy of his own. The affecting particulars of his active life are preserved by Anthony Wood. Many of his verses were written, during confinement in the Gatehouse, Westminster, to which he was committed for carrying a petition from the county of Kent to the house of commons, for the laudable purpose of restoring the king to his rights and settling the government. His pieces, which are light and easy, had been models in their way, were their simplicity equal to their spirit. They were the offspring of gallantry and amusement, and, as such, are not to be reduced to the test of serious criticism.—Winstanley has compared him to Sir PHILIP SYDNEY.

* Agreeably to the testimony of the honest and indefatigable Anthony Wood, he was the son of Sir W. Lovelace of Woolwich, Kent, was admitted gentleman commoner of Gloucester Hall, Oxon, in 1634, and as a proof at once of his own early genius and scholarship, and his sovereign's partiality he was, after a residence of only two years at the University, created a master of arts, on the king's coming to Oxford. It is painful to add that, as it is pathetically expressed by Dr. Percy, the bishop of Dromore, "this elegant writer, after having been distinguished for every gallant and polite accomplishment, the pattern of his own sex and the darling of the ladies, died in the lowest wretchedness, obscurity and want."

SONG.

Why dost thou say I am forsworn,
Since thine I vow'd to be?
Lady, it is already morn
It was last night I swore to thee
That fond impossibility.
Yet have I lov'd thee well and long;
A tedious twelve hours' space!
I should all other beauties wrong,
And rob thee of a new embrace,
Did I still doat upon that face.

SONG.

Amarantha, sweet and fair,
Ah! braid no more that shining hair;
As my curious hand or eye
Hovering round thee let it fly.
Let it fly as unconfin'd
As its calm ravisher the wind;
Who hath left his darling east
To wanton o'er that spicy nest.
Every tress, must be confest,
But neatly tangled at the best;
Like a clue of golden thread
Most excellently unravelled.
Do not then bind up that light
In ribbands, and o'ercloud in night,
But, like the sun in his early ray,
Shake your head and scatter day.

A London newspaper has the following marvellous paragraph.—"Friday morning last, a dog was seen running through the streets of Harrow, with three rats sticking to his throat, the dog, at the same time, howling in dreadful agony. A man instantly seized a gun, killed two of the rats, wounded a sheep, killed a bat, broke four windows, wounded a cow; and the dog escaped with the other rat."

A very thin audience once attending the tragedy of Richard III. the crook barked tyrant had not sufficient philosophy to endure this neglect of his powers; for, losing all patience in the tent scene, he exclaimed, with peculiar emphasis, "I'll forth and walk awhile, and very composedly went home to supper."

A very singular circumstance has lately excited the attention of the neighbourhood of Leeds, in England. A pregnant female, of the name of Applegarth, has actually made an affidavit, before the mayor of that town, at the instance of the parish officers, to the following effect: That she had been employed at St. Cloud, in France, in the palace of the First Consul, as an upper house maid, but was obliged to leave her situation in an early stage of pregnancy, on the breaking out of the war, and that Buonaparte is the father of the child.

SONNET.

'Twere well, methinks, in an indignant mood,
When the heart droops, unfriended, when mankind,
With their cold smiles, have dup'd thy honest mind,
On the sweet heath to stray, while dimly brood
The gather'd grey mists on the distant hill:
Drear should the prospect be, dreary and wide,
No second living one be there espied,
None, save thyself, then would thy soul be still,
Curbing its sorrows with a proud despair,
Then would'st thou tread thy path with firmer pace,
Nor let one scowl on thy resolved face,
Blab to the elements thy puny care
But, sooth'd to think that solitude can bless,
Muse on the world with LOFTY QUIETNESS.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Several communications for the Lounger have been received; some in the careless character of Italian penmanship, and others with a Roman and bolder feature. All these shall have a very candid consideration. No impatient author must be surprised or vexed, whenever insertion of his compositions is delayed; even if the postponement be long, for we have many departments to fill, and numerous communications to regard. The claims of various correspondents are often clashing, and it is delicate and difficult for the most impartial judge to adjust them at once with correctness and dispatch.

We very earnestly hope that the learned, witty, and entertaining author of "CLIMENOLE" will write in this paper, with habitual regularity. Both his principles and his style are perfectly to the taste of the editor, and we have the pleasure to add that the sarcastic and ingenious essays with the above title are very eagerly perused, by all to whose praise an ambitious author would aspire.

During some weeks, in which the editor has been engaged in researches, respecting the text of SHAKESPEARE, he has had frequent occasion to acknowledge the kindness of many literary gentlemen, who have directed his attention to many books, auxiliary to his labours. But notwithstanding his own inquisitiveness and the aid of others, he still has not had the good fortune to find the following, for the whole or any one of which he will be particularly obliged.

Remarks on Shakspeare's Tempest; containing an investigation of Mr. Malone's attempt to ascertain the date of that play, and various notes and illustrations of abstruse readings and passages, by Charles Dirill, Esq. i. e. Richard Sill, 8vo. 1797.

An essay on the dramatic character of Sir John Falstaff, by Mr. Maurice Morgan, 8vo. 1777.

Remarks critical and illustrative on the text and notes of the last edition of Shakspeare, i. e. Mr. Stevens's edition in 1778, by Mr. Ritson, 8vo. 1783.

Remarks on some of the characters of Shakspeare, by the author of observations on modern gardening, Mr. Whateley, 8vo. 1785.

Macbeth reconsidered; an essay, intended as an answer to part of the remarks on some of the characters of Shakspeare, by J. P. Kemble, 8vo. 1786.

The beauties of Shakspeare, selected from his Works. To which are added the principal scenes in the same author, 12mo. 1784. Printed for Kearsley.

A fragment on Shakspeare, extracted from advice to a young Poet, by the Rev. Martin Sherlock, translated from the French, 8vo. 1786.

A concordance to Shakspeare; suited to all the editions, in which the distinguished and parallel passages in the plays of that justly admired Writer are methodically arranged. To which are added three hundred notes and illustrations entirely new.

"Lines to Spring," have often appeared in the papers.

"Nauticus" does not understand a rope in the ship.

"Plain Truth," is downright dunstable.

"Sylvia," has not the sprightliness of her namesake, in Farquhar's Recruiting Officer. This young lady would be much more usefully employed in mending her stockings, than in making verses.

"A Phantom is rightly named: and, on this occasion, we cannot, like Hamlet, "take the Ghost's word for a thousand pounds."

The letter box of the Port Folio is often supplied with the fairest oblations of genius, but we are sorry to add, that it is often crowded with a vile mass of tuneless rhymes, and juvenile trash.

"Some strain, in rhyme, the muses on their racks, Scream, like the winding of ten thousand jacks."

SELECTED POETRY.

[In the creed of ancient superstition, Robin Goodfellow was a kind of merry sprite, whose character and achievements are recorded in this ballad, and in those well known lines of Milton's L'Allegro.

Tells how the drudging goblin sweet
To earn his dream bowl duly set;
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath thresh'd the corn
That ten day-labourers could not end;
Then lies him down the lubber fiend,
And, stretch'd out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength,
And crop full out of door he flings
Ere the first cock his matin sings.

The reader will observe, that our simple ancestors had reduced all these whimsies to a kind of system, as regular, and perhaps more consistent, than many parts of classic mythology; a proof of the extensive influence, and vast antiquity of these superstitions. Mankind, and especially the common people, could not every where have been so unanimously agreed concerning these arbitrary notions, if they had not prevailed among them for many ages. The existence of fairies and goblins is alluded to by the most ancient British bards, who mention them under various names, one of the most common of which signifies 'the spirits of the mountains.'

This Song, attributed to Ben Jonson, though not found among his works, is given from an ancient black letter copy in the British Museum. It seems to have been originally intended for some masque.]

From Oberon in fairy land
The king of ghosts and shadows there,
Mad Robin I, at his command,
Am sent to view the night sports here,
What revel rout
Is kept about
In every corner, where I go
I will o'ersee
And merry be,
And make good sport with ho, ho, ho!

More swift than lightning can I fly
About this airy welkin soon
And, in a minute's space descry
Each thing that's done below the moon,
There's not a bag
Or ghost shall wag,
Or cry, ware Goblins, where I go,
But Robin I
Their feats will spy,
And send them home with ho, ho, ho!

Whene'er such wanderers I meet,
As from their night sports they trudge home,
With counterfeiting voice I greet,
And call them on with me to roam
Through woods, through lakes,
Through bogs, through brakes;
Or else, unseen, with them I go,
All in the nick
To play some trick,
And frolic it with ho, ho, ho!

Sometimes I meet them like a man;
Sometimes an ox, sometimes an hound;
And to a horse I turn me can;
To trip and trot about them round.
But if to ride,
My back they stride,
More swift than wind away I go
O'er hedge and lands,
Through pools and ponds,
I whirry laughing ho, ho, ho!

When lads and lasses merry be,
With possets and with juncates fine;

Unseen of all the company,
I eat their cakes, and drink their wine;
And, to make sport,
I grunt and snort,
And out the candles I do blow;
The maids I kiss,
They shriek—who's this?
I answer nought but ho, ho, ho!

Yet, now and then, the maids to please,
At midnight I card up their wool;
And, while they sleep and take their ease,
With wheel to threads their flax I pull,
I grind at mill
Their malt up still;
I dress their hemp, I spin their tow,
If any wake, and would me take,
I wend me laughing ho, ho, ho!

When house or hearth doth sluttish lie,
I pinch the maidens black and blue;
The bed clothes from the bed pull I,
And lay them naked all to view.
Twixt sleep and wake
I do them take,
And on the key-cold floor them throw;
If out they cry,
Then forth I fly,
And loudly laugh with ho, ho, ho!

When any need to borrow aught,
We lend them what they do require,
And for the use demand we nought;
Our own is all we do desire.
If to repay
They do delay,
Abroad among them then I go,
And night by night
I them affright,
With pinchings, dreams, and ho, ho, ho!

When lazy queans have nought to do
But study how to cog and lie;
To make debate and mischief too
'Twixt one another secretly;
I mark their gloze,
And it disclose
To them, whom they have wronged so,
When I have done,
I get me gone,
And leave them scolding ho, ho, ho!

When men do traps and engines set
In loop holes, where the vermin creep,
Who, from their folds and houses get
Their ducks and geese and lambs asleep:
I spy the gin,
And enter in,
And seem a vermin taken so.
But when they there,
Approach me near,
I leap out laughing ho, ho, ho!

By wells and rills in meadows green,
We nightly dance our hey day guise,
And to our fairy king and queen
We chant our moonlight harmonies,
When Larks 'gin sing
Away we fling,
And babes new born steal as we go,
An elf in bed
We leave instead,
And wend us laughing ho, ho, ho!

From hag-bred Merlin's time have I
Thus nightly revell'd to and fro;
And, for my pranks, men call me by
The name of Robin Goodfellow.

Fiends, ghosts, and sprites,
Who haunt the nights,
The hags, once goblins, do me know;
And beldames old
My feats have told,
So vale, vale, ho, ho, ho!

[All the learned, says the translator, have vied with each other in celebrating this ode. It is one of the two, to which Scaliger gave what he deemed the highest praise, namely, 'that he would rather be author of them, than king of Arragon.' The spirit of its turns, the elegance of its language, and the harmony of its numbers, have, perhaps, never been excelled by Horace himself.

The translation of this ode, by Atterbury, is well known, and has been highly applauded. It is inserted in Duncombe's and in Francis's Horace, and is also to be found in the collection of poems, published by Nichols, at the beginning of the fifth volume.]

The man, whom from his natal day,
Thy smiles, celestial Muse, inspir'd,
Shall ne'er a champion's fame display
For glorious Isthmian toils admir'd.

Shall ne'er the Grecian chariot guide,
Which swift victorious coursers bear,
Nor quell the threatening tyrant's pride,
Bright triumphs lead, and laurels wear.

But the soft-flowing limpid stream,
That winds o'er Tibur's fertile plains,
The clustering grove shall grace his theme,
And wake his fam'd Eolian strains.

Rome, mighty Rome, enrols my name
In her lov'd poets' gentle choir;
And envy now assails my fame
With weaker fangs, with powerless ire.

Oh, blest pierian maid, whose hand
The golden lyre's soft note obeys,
Even the mute fish, at thy command,
Would match the cygnets dying lays.

'Tis thine that, by the passing throng,
As Rome's first lyric bard I'm shewn;
And that I breathe, and please by song,
If yet I please, is thine alone.

A MAN OF PUNCTUALITY.

Hal sent me word he'd dine with me,
Precisely at the hour of three;
But, meeting with some tavern goer,
Agreed to join his mess at four.
With which d'ye think he kept his word?
'Perhaps with both,' no, friend, a third
Happen'd to cross him on his way,
And Hal with him has past the day.

* This pleasing image of the Muse, smiling on the birth of a poet, well expresses the sentiment, that a happy genius is necessary to form that character. [Note, by the translator.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 88.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

THE present season naturally disposes us to connect with it that period of life, upon the just improvement of which is to depend the fruitfulness or sterility of the portion that will follow. Spring is the season of promise and of expectation, and youth is the period of enterprise and of hope. The heart, in the morning of life, dilated with noble and generous expansion, is filled with anticipations of every enjoyment, and prepared for the reception of every delight. In the estimates, which, at this season, are made of future life, difficulties are not to embarrass, or accidents to frustrate. The obstacles between pains and their success are overlooked, experience has not taught disappointment, or long tried efforts at distinction wearied the constancy of diligence, or lessened the eagerness of ambition. Fancy, active in its projections, and plausible in its means, heats to enthusiasm the mind of the youthful candidate for renown. Every pen is to acknowledge the merit of his established excellence, and from every voice he is to hear the grateful music of applause. The claims of undoubted genius are to silence competition, and the laurel of victory to decorate his brow. Fame, with all its allurements, in close perspective, flushes his soul with joy, and imagination, passing through different scenes of human elevation, riots in the luxury of its own creation.

How often such expectations are fallacious, we want not to be informed by the living mortals, who are monuments of it, or by any of the thousands on whose obscurity the grave has heaped its mould. We know how small is the number of those on whom decided superiority is conferred, how many are the causes, by which fruition may be interrupted, and hope cut off. But ungracious is that philosophy which inculcates despondence, and holds out examples to depress; which would restrain youthful enterprise, by telling that its expectations are deceptive, and its attempts vain. Rather let every encouragement be given to ardour so commendable. Let it not be checked by the suggestions of the indolent and insignificant, or abated by the counsels of the unsuccessful or the timid. When eminence is reached this spirit is ever found to have been its prelude. It is the grand incitement to emulation, the nurse of noble sentiment. The philosopher, who attracts notice by the ingenuity of his speculations, or the usefulness of his discoveries, has often relieved the painfulness of thought, by mixing anticipations of celebrity with his early meditations. The orator of established reputation has viewed from a distance the envied height on which it stands. Often, in the chambers of his alma mater, and while submitting to the discipline of preparation, has his heart been swelled by fancied plaudits, and his ear caught the sound of bursting acclamations. The commander of legions has vanquished the foe in other places than the field. The surrender of fortresses, the humbled submission of haughty adversaries, and the full display of the triumphant standard, have marked the early reveries of his ambitious soul.

These are the feelings which form the innocent and profitable recreations of the juvenile mind. Innocent, for they save it from wanderings that may be dangerous; profitable, for they strengthen the resolutions of diligence, and support the labour of exertion. A celebrated heathen, upon being rallied on his belief in the immortality of the soul, and told it was but an idle dream, replied, that, if it were so, he wished not to be awakened from a delusion so pleasing. To arguments that would discourage ardour, let such be the answer of the enterprising youth. If he be told his expectations are illusory, let him reply, he will continue a mistake that exalts the dignity of his nature, keeps his attention from whatever is degrading, and fixes it upon objects animating and elevated. Labour is so wearisome, that the force of incentives, exerting on the mind an active and uniform influence, can alone impart to it vigour, and endue it with perseverance. The desire of distinction, whatever shape it may assume, whether it is to arise from political advancement, or military renown, from extensive opulence, or literary pre-eminence, forms such an incentive, and the moment of its forgetfulness marks the relapse into inactivity and self-indulgence.

The desire of fame has ever characterised the youth of celebrated and illustrious personages. He, who feels not such a desire, will keep his course of calm and unenvied obscurity. The greatest orator and the greatest statesman Rome ever produced, CICERO, whose name reminds us of all that is exalted in genius, and splendid in reputation, had his soul always filled with this animating passion. Pleading for the poet Arctas, and celebrating his fame in letters, 'I have been convinced,' he says, 'from my youth by much instruction, and much study, that nothing is greatly desirable in life but glory, and that, in the pursuit of this, all bodily sufferings, and the perils of death and exile, are to be slighted and despised.' Most men of illustrious fame might be equally full with the Roman orator in acknowledgments of their sensibility to glory. Themistocles, upon being asked what music, or whose voice was most agreeable to him, answered 'that man's, who could best celebrate his virtues.' The Macedonian conqueror made the Iliad the constant companion of his marches. By having ever present to his mind the exploits of heroes and the lustre of conquest, he kept in full blaze the fire of his own ambition. Arrived at the tomb of Achilles 'Happy youth,' he cried, 'you could find a Homer to immortalize my fame.' The sons of indolence may affect the consolation that early ambition is a troublesome and sometimes corrosive inmate of the breast, that it gives to the mind feelings unfriendly to its tranquillity, and produces infelicity by the mortifications to which it exposes; that it robs the pillow of its slumber, and casts a paleness on the cheek. Whatever foundation there may be for this, it is not to be listened to as a motive to dissuade. What pursuit, however inglorious, is free from its solicitudes, and who, but the listless disciple of torpor, will be repulsed, because his course is not always pleasant, or his path always smooth. The solicitudes of ambition are allowed, but they are less to be dreaded than the mischiefs of inactivity, or the repinings of insignificance.

Let the youth, in the spring of life, press on with alacrity in the career he has chosen. He has all the motives of future eminence to kindle up his enterprise, and animate his zeal. Every analogy of nature will remind him of his obligations, and encourage him in his attempts. See how the fruits of the earth, from small beginnings spread into full luxuriance: Like the husbandman, let him sow while the season is auspicious, and the soil kind. The prospect of harvest will mitigate his toil, and be as refreshing dews to his exertion. With a model of successful diligence, 'let him not be prevented by indolence, seduced by pleasure, or diverted by sleep' from the objects his ambition would attain. Let him nourish emulation by the frequent presence of great and distinguished examples. Let the volume of PLUTARCH be often open before him, and let him constantly recollect, that, if he gain not the heights of uncontested superiority, laudable endeavours seldom go without some reward.

MARCELLUS.

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

"Consider once more, Athenians, that you run greater hazards than any other people of Greece. Philip meditates not only to conquer you, but to destroy you. For he knows very well that you are not made to be subjects. If you would be such, you could not; you are too much accustomed to command. He knows that at the first opportunity you would give him more trouble, than all the rest of Greece together."

How very few words were necessary for Demosthenes to awaken, in the Athenians, the sentiment of their power and grandeur! With what an air of simplicity he speaks of it, as of a thing agreed, and of which no man doubted! This, for a vulgar orator, would have been a fine subject for amplification: could there be any more agreeable to treat before such hearers? But what amplification could have equalled those words, so simple and so great. Philip knows you are not made to serve; that even if you would, you could not: you are too much in the habit of commanding. It is one of the characteristics of Demosthenes to attain by turns of thought, which appear common, with a sort of noble and measured familiarity, more than others by magnificent expressions.

"Make war upon him, then, from this day, if you would avoid a total ruin. Detest the traitors who serve him, and consign them to punishment. We can never get the better of foreign enemies, if we do not first punish our enemies within, who conspire with them. Without this you will be wrecked against the rock of treason, and become the prey of the conqueror.

"And what is the reason, do you think, why Philip dares thus outrageously to insult you? Why, at the time when he employs against others, at least the arts of seduction, and even those of real services, should he dare to employ against you, alone, his menaces? Consider all that he has done in favour of the Thessalians to allure them into servitude. By how many artifices did he impose on the unfortunate Olynthians, by giving them at first Potidea, and several other places; all that he does, at this day, to gain the Thebans, whom he has delivered from a dangerous war, and whom he has rendered powerful in Phocæa. We know, it is true, what price has been paid, by the former, in the sequel, for what they have received, and the price that the latter must pay. But for you, without speaking of what you have already lost in the war, how many times, even during the negotiations of the peace, has he deceived, insulted, and plundered you? The places of Phocæa, those of Thrace, of Doriscus, of Pylæ, of Serrio, even the person of Cersobleptes, what has he not taken from you? Whence proceeds this conduct, so different towards you, and towards the other Greeks? It is because we are the only people among whom our enemies have declared protectors with impunity; the only people among whom they can say every thing in favour of Philip, when they have received his money, while he is seizing on the treasures of the republic. It would not have been safe for any one to declare himself the partizan of Philip, among the Olynthians, if he had not seduced them by giving them Potidea. It would not have been safe for any one to declare himself the partizan of Philip among the Thessalians, if he had not assisted them in banishing their tyrants, and had not restored to them Pylæ. It would not have been safe for any one to declare himself the partizan of Philip, among the Thebans, before he had subjugated Boeotia, by destroying the Phocæans. But, among us—but in Athens, when he has appropriated to himself Amphipolis and the country of the Cardians, when he is prepared to invade Byzantium, when he has fortified Eubœa in such a manner as to enchain Attica, any one may, with all safety, raise a voice in his favour; and, from poor and obscure as they were, his friends are become rich and powerful: and we, on the contrary, we have fallen from splendor to humiliation, and from opulence to poverty. For, in my estimation, the true riches of a republic are in the number of her allies, in their attachment, in their fidelity, and these are what we have lost. And while with so much carelessness, you suffer so many advantages to be ravished from you, Philip has become great, fortunate, redoubtable, both to Greeks and Barbarians; Athens is forsaken, and in contempt; rich only in what we display in our markets, poor in every thing that constitutes the glory and the power of a free people."

Despreaux has been called 'the poet of good sense;' we may give to Demosthenes the appellation of 'the orator of reason.' And we have so much need of such a one! Among us they have perverted the understanding, in order to stifle conscience. They have counterfeited at pleasure the human mind; and what do we do here but labour to restore it? Without reason there is no justice, and without justice no liberty. We have acquired, at a great price, the right of expressing zeal for the truth: error and ignorance have done us so much harm!

Let us annihilate the tyranny of words, to re-establish the reign of things. You have seen the proof, that the word liberty may be written on all our doors, when oppression is on all our heads. And who was then the freeman, even in irons, even on the scaffold? He alone who had known how to preserve the independence of his principles. It is then, by reason and by justice, that man can be essentially free. There is this grandeur in man, that he is, by his thoughts, superior to every power that is not conformable to reason; and this alone would prove, that all true grandeur comes from God, to whom we are indebted for thought and reason. It is by this that the just man is able to condemn power, even when it oppresses him; it cannot oppress him but for a moment; he condemns it forever. He can brand it with a word, confound it by a look, humble it even by his silence, which tyranny cannot do, with all its satellites, and all its hangmen.

Honour then to reason and to order, which is its work! Honour to the one, and to the other, and so much the rather, because their names alone have been a long time among us, at first an object of insult, and then a title of proscription. Restore them to their places, and that is sufficient to avenge them. From that hour those of their enemies are marked; and indelible will be the stain.

Let us learn, from the example of Demosthenes, never to be afraid of speaking salutary truth to our fellow-citizens. We never obtain, by demagogical flattery, any thing better than a transitory influence, and a long ignominy. The advantages of demagogues are brittle and precarious, and subject to terrible vicissitudes. This truth, to be felt, has not even occasion for those examples without number, which have passed before your eyes. These, however, ought never to be forgotten. Repeat this lesson to yourselves, without ceasing, that he who deceives the people, understands his own interests no better than those of the public, and dishonours only to destroy himself. I know of no character so abject and so odious as a flatterer of the people: he is an hundred times more so, than a flatterer of kings. For a throne naturally allures flattery, and discountenances truth. The people on the contrary, permit themselves to be deceived, it is true, but they do not demand to be deceived; they have no need of it, and they feel the want of information. They love and receive the truth, when we dare to speak it: and when they reject it, it is for want of light more than from pride or corruption. When they conceive it, they applaud it so much the more, as we exercise towards them a right which is that of all. It is this which renders the truth so hateful and so terrible in the sight of those, who have so much interest in preventing it from ever coming to the knowledge of the people, because they have so much in blinding them. And this policy, common to tyrants, must necessarily have been that of ours, who were destitute of talents as well as courage. It has consisted wholly in giving all power to do mischief to that class of men, who are everywhere the dregs of nations, to those who have nothing, who know nothing, and who do nothing; to that assemblage of nakedness, idleness, and ignorance, composed of all that is worst in the human species: we may judge of them by what they have once done, when once they reigned. But observe, at the same time, that this policy, which imposed for a moment on those who are always dazzled by success, was not less silly than atrocious. Tyrants, who have possessed genius, have never employed instruments, of whom they could not always be the masters; the tyranny, which uses only instruments to whom it is itself a slave, is stupid; for it is always their victim. And what can be more delirious than to invade every thing, without being able to keep any thing, and to erect scaffolds to finish by ascending them? But this belongs to our history, and I return to that of eloquence, and the triumphs of Demosthenes.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF SOAME JENYNS, ESQ.

[Concluded.]

His character seems to have been amiable and respectable. His life had been very active and diversified. He had studied much, he had seen more. He conversed as well as he wrote. His thoughts were sprightly, his expressions neat. His person was diminutive, and of a slight make; and he had a small wen, or protuberance, on his neck. In his youth, he had been so fond of dress as to be distinguished as one of the beaux of his time; but in the latter part of his life, his appearance was rather mean, being generally habited in a Bath beaversurtout, with blue worsted boot-stockings. His religious routine is said to have been singular. From early impression, or strong conviction, he was originally a zealous believer of revelation, and suspected of a tendency to certain fanatical opinions. Gradually losing ground in faith, he wandered into paths obscured by doubt, and became a professed deist; till, by a retrograde progress, he measured back his steps to the comforts of rational christianity. On his death-bed, it is said, he reviewed his life, and with a visible gleam of joy, he gloried in the belief, that his Views of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion had been useful. It was received, perhaps, where greater works would not make their way, and so might have aided the ardour of virtue, and the confidence of truth. He spoke of his death as one prepared to die. He did not shrink from it as an evil, nor as a punishment, but met it with decent firmness, as his original destiny, the kind release from what was worse, the kinder summons to all that is better. As a lay vindicator of divine revelation, he ranks with Milton, Locke, Addison and Newton.

As an author, he has attained no small degree of reputation, by powers which have had every aid that useful and polite learning could give. He possesses a judgment critically exact, an elegant taste, and a rich vein of wit and humour. He is intitled to great praise for many excellencies of style. Mr. Burke has truly said that he was one of those who wrote the purest English, that is, the most simple and aboriginal language, the least qualified with foreign impregnation. To the character of an elegant, he joins that of a sensible and agreeable writer. He has the rare merit of treating, in a pleasing manner, that abstracted metaphysic subject, the origin or necessity of evil, which has perplexed human reason in every age. He has written like a man of taste and acuteness, in the habit of deep thinking. A species of reading often injurious, and generally unentertaining, he has rendered at once interesting and argumentative. But genius, like every power in human nature, is capable of an absurd and pernicious, as well as of a judicious and beneficial application. While it is employed in investigating useful truths, and enlarging the boundaries of real knowledge, it is rendering such important services to mankind, as to merit the highest applause. Of this perversion of genius, his political tracts and philosophical disquisitions afford a striking example. Not contented with that portion of reputation for originality, which is to be acquired in the plain path of truth and common sense, he finds it necessary to employ the subtleties of sophistry in support of opinions which party-attachments led him to adopt, and to exercise his superior abilities in erecting fanciful and paradoxical systems, or in defending some dangerous tenets. His View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion contains many just and important observations; but his method of reasoning is liable to considerable objections. It has not occurred to the advocates of the Christian religion, that doctrines, allowed to be contradictory to reason, are not on this account the less credible, nor have they ever conceived that the virtues of friendship, fortitude and patriotism, do not form a part of the morality of the gospel; much less have they urged the want of these virtues as a peculiar recommendation of its excellence. They are conspicuously illustrated in the character of its author; and it would be easy to produce striking instances, in which his courage and friendship, and concern for the welfare of his country, were actually displayed. The advocates of Christianity, in answer to Shaftesbury and others, have sufficiently vindicated it in this respect. They are unquestionably virtues of considerable importance; and so far as they do not interfere with the general principles of benevolence, which Christianity inculcates, they constitute a part of Christian morality.

As a poet, he is rather characterised by elegance and correctness, than by invention or enthusiasm. He writes with terseness and neatness, seldom with much vigour or animation. He is a pleasing and elegant, but not a very animated or first-rate writer. His expression is concise, his wit lively, his satire poignant, his humour delicate, and his versification easy, flowing, and agreeable. His Art of Dancing, Modern Fine Gentleman, Modern Fine Lady, First Epistle of Horace, Burlesque Ode, &c. are elegant and beautiful compositions. In every one of them there are just conception, lively imagination, correct expression, and clear connection. His version of Browne's 'De Immortalitate Animi,' is a correct and classical performance, which may challenge a comparison with the subsequent versions of Mr. Cranwell and Mr. Lettice. His shorter pieces, in general, may be read with pleasure. We find here and there some indecencies of expression, which we sincerely wish he had avoided. The Epitaph on Dr. Johnson was not dictated by the same spirit of candor and friendship which bedewed the grave of Jenyns, and strewed it with flowers.

His moral and literary character has been delineated by Mr. Cole, in his 'Sketches,' with the zeal of friendship, and the fondness of affectionate remembrance; but he rates his merits too high. His remarks on his style are exceeding just.

"He was a man of great mildness, gentleness and sweetness of temper, which he manifested to all with whom he had concerns, either in the business of life or its social intercourse. His earnest desire was, as far as it was possible, never to offend any person; and he made such allowances, even for those, who, in their dispositions, differed from him, that he was rarely offended with others; of which, in a long life, he gave many noble instances. He was strict in the performance of religious duties in public, and a constant practiser of them in private; ever professing the greatest veneration for the church of England and its government, as by law established; holding her liturgy as the purest and most perfect form of public worship in any established church in Christendom: but he thought that alterations and amendments might be made in it, which would render it more perfect than it is in its present state, and which he earnestly desired to have seen accomplished by those who were properly authorised.

"In private life, he was most amiable and engaging; for he was possessed of a well-informed mind, accompanied by an uncommon vein of the most lively, spirited, and genuine wit, which always flowed very copiously amongst those with whom he conversed, but which was tempered with such a kindness of nature, that it never was the cause of uneasiness to any of those with whom he lived; this made his acquaintance much sought after, and courted by all those who had a taste for brilliant conversation, being well assured that they would be delighted with it where he was; and that, though they did not possess the same talent, they never would be censured by him because they wanted it.

"This so gentle an exertion of so rare a quality, he not only strictly observed himself, but was always much hurt if he observed the want of it in others; and considered every sally of wit, however bright it might be, which tended to the mortification of those who heard it, as one of its greatest abuses, since he looked upon all pre-eminent gifts of the mind, bestowed by nature, as much for the happiness of others, as of those who possess them.

"No person ever felt more for the miseries of others than he did; no person saw, or more strictly practised, the necessity imposed on those who form the superior ranks of life, whose duty it is to reconcile the lower classes to their present condition, by contributing the utmost to make them happy; and, thereby, to cause them to feel as little of that difference as is possible; for he was most kind and courteous to all his inferiors, not only in his expressions and in his behaviour, but in assisting them in all their wants and distresses, as far as he could; ever considering his poor neighbours, in the country, as parts of his family, and, as such, intitled to his care and protection.

"He spent his summers at his house in the country, residing there with hospitality to his tenants and neighbours, and never suffered any places at that season calculated for public diversions to allure him; for he said he could, at that time, do more good in his own parish, than in any other situation.

"He frequently lamented the prevailing fashion of the later times of his life, which carried gentlemen with their families from London, when it is deserted by all whose absence can be dispensed with, to places far distant from their houses and ancient seats in the country; opened chiefly for the reception of those, who wish to continue the scenes of dissipation they have left: whence it is that the money which should revert to the districts from which it was received, is turned into a different channel; tenants are deprived of the advantages they are in some degree intitled to, from its expenditure amongst them; hospitality done away, and the stream of charity, that would otherwise have gladdened the hearts of their poor neighbours, is stopped; their inferiors deprived of their example, encouragement, and protection, in the practice of religion and virtue, and thereby the manners of the country altered for the worse, which necessarily occasions great mischiefs to the public.

"When he was in the country, he constantly acted as a magistrate in his own district, and attended all those meetings, which were holden for the purposes of public justice.

"From the general opinion that was entertained of his inflexible integrity, and superior understanding, he was much resorted to in that character at home.

"Unknown to Sir Robert Walpole, and unconnected with him by acquaintance or private regard, he supported him to the utmost of his power, till he retired from his high station. He seldom or ever spoke, whilst sitting in Parliament.

"From having long had a seat at the Board of Trade, and constantly attending his duty there, he gained an understanding of the great outlines of the commercial interests of his country.

"As an author, so long as a true taste of fine writing shall exist, he will have a distinguished place amongst those who have excelled. Whatever he hath published, whether he played with his muse, or appeared in the plain livery of prose, was sought for with avidity, and read with pleasure, by those who at the time were esteemed the best judges of composition. A minute criticism on their several excellencies is unnecessary, as the public sanction hath stamped their merit. Suffice it to say, that his poems are on the most pleasing subjects, and are executed with a warm animation of fancy, sterling wit, and, at the same time, great correctness.

"He wonderfully excelled in burlesque imitations of the ancient poets, by applying their thoughts to modern times and circumstances; which might be well expected, after his short but excellent strictures on this manner of writing, prefixed to his imitations of the first epistle of the second book of Horace's Epistles, inscribed to the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke.

"How far he followed the rules there laid down, must be determined by those who shall read and compare the original with the translation, in which it may found, that, in this kind of imitation, he hath gone through a poem of three hundred lines, without ever losing sight of the original, by introducing new thoughts of his own.

"As a writer of prose, whoever will examine his style, will find that he is intitled to a place amongst the purest and correctest writers of the English language. He always puts proper words in proper places, and hath, at the same time, a variety in different members of his periods, which would otherwise tire and disgust the reader with their sameness: a failure which may be found in some of the works of those to whom the public have ascribed a superior degree of merit. But this variety occasions no difficulty or embarrassment in the sense intended to be conveyed, which always at first sight appears clear, and is easy to be comprehended, so that the reader is never stopped in his progress to study what is meant.

"This is his characteristic as a writer, on whatever subject he engaged, whether it were serious or called for his wit, whether political, moral, religious, or metaphysical, his matter is always most pertinent to the subject which he handles; he reasons with closeness and precision, and always by a regular chain of argument arrives at the conclusions which he professes is his design to establish. And whoever will attend to the exertions of his mind, manifesting at some times the truest humour and the most lively wit, at other times the most regular chain of argument, with the nicest discrimination and marked differences of abstract ideas, cannot but allow, that as wit consists in quickly assembling ideas, and putting those together with readiness and variety, wherein can be found any resemblance; and judgment, on the contrary, is carefully separating ideas from one another, and examining them apart; I say that he cannot but allow that our author was one of those very few who have appeared in the world possessed of these two almost discordant talents of the understanding."

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM PARIS TO AMSTERDAM, IN THE YEAR 1796.

The Dutch are not deficient in hospitals, and other public charities, yet there is a multitude of beggars in the streets of their cities; and in Amsterdam, more than in the other towns of Holland, and they are the most importunate of all the tribe of mendicants. This is, in a great measure, owing to the vast number of Jew families that compose nearly a quarter of the city. This unfortunate and persecuted nation are not permitted, here, to learn any regular trade or profession, lest they should become too influential. Thus the cruel bigotry of the Christians on one side, and the pertinacious adherence of the Jew, to a monstrous and ridiculous system of idle and imposing ceremonies on the other, have for ages, kept millions from participating the equal privileges of social institutions. What wild havoc in the confined circle of human happiness have religious lawgivers uniformly committed! One indeed is contented with punishment extended only to the fourth generation, while another, refining on cruelty, makes the soul immortal in order to make it more exquisitely miserable!

2nd. Dec. The season has now got so in advance, that it leaves me to regret that I did not take a summer tour through Holland and Flanders in my way to Paris. A traveller who is desirous of seeing large towns, the inhabitants of which are honest, frank, industrious and mildly superstitious; or a fertile and charming country every acre of which is carefully cultivated, and superabounding with produce, will find them all in Flanders. And he who wishes to observe commercial cupidity, and avaricious bustle, will not be disappointed in the seaports of Holland; but he will also meet with canals, gardens, villages, and mills, almost as numerous as the trees which shade the streets and adorn the waters of this singular amphibious country; and a number of the neatest towns in Europe.

The only literary institution of any note in this capital, originated about twenty years ago, and is called the Felix Meritis. It is composed of four hundred subscribers, who have a large handsome edifice in which their meetings are holden. The society is divided into five different departments, viz. One for commerce, in which is included navigation, agriculture, manufactures and traffic. The second embraces physics, another drawings and designs; the fourth music; and the fifth general literature. The meetings hold out an occasional agreeable intercourse to its supporters. Professor Van Swinden, a physician of learning and labour, one of its principal founders, confessed to me that there had not arisen from it that public benefit which he had at first flattered himself: and it is rather to be considered as a place of refined amusement, than an establishment of solid learning; rather as a gratification to the vanity or taste of individuals, than promotive of any general utility or national improvement. The music room is a lofty saloon thirty-six feet high, by seventy-two and fifty-four in dimensions. I was last evening at a subscription concert, which is conducted wholly by amateurs of the science. The room was filled with genteel people, and the young gentlemen who were the performers, received some merited applause.

The Dutch are fond of chimes, your ears are therefore perpetually saluted by the tinklings of the bells in the different steeples, and your lodgings disturbed with the melodious warblings of hand organs, which abound in every street. Whatever the multitude might think, was I one of their Burgo Masters, I certainly should consider it a duty to arrest these itinerant murderers "of the music of sweet sounds," as public nuisances.

There does not appear to be a very cordial confidence placed in the Convention which is sitting at the Hague. That assembly which ought to have been a selection of their choicest spirits, and most enlightened citizens, is a compound of harsh, inveterate patriots, and raw discordant statesmen, who are better at resentment and demolition than at the discovery and union of those nice, but just and firm principles of the social compact, which, while they secure the rights of the citizen, provide vigour and resource to the administration of the state. A long period, therefore, in all probability must elapse, before these divided and disastrous provinces obtain any stable political consequence. Most agree in lamenting their disorganized government; and all in reprobating the conduct of the English for involving them in their war against the French republic; nor are their gallic allies beloved for compelling them to combat the British Lion. Thus alternately degraded, plundered and despised by each of these gigantic powers; destitute of union, commerce, spirit and character, should they continue to exist at all as a distinct government, it must be by the sufferance and assent of Great Britain and France, neither of which will acquiesce in their becoming a dependent department to the other.

Here, as at the Hague, we had an opportunity of seeing a specimen of the Batavian guards. Their uniform is blue and red: the men are all young, and their laurels are yet to be gathered. The French hussars, who are to be found in every town of importance from Paris to Amsterdam, make a different appearance. Alert and animated, they shew that they feel the triumphs of their country, and rejoice in the garb of its heroes. By the treaty of offensive and defensive alliance which these provinces entered into with the republic of France, they stipulated to pay to the government, one hundred millions of Florins (equal to four millions of Dollars) and to clothe, feed, and pay twenty-five thousand French soldiers, who were to be employed in their service. When the rash and rapid march of the army, last summer, under Jourdan, from the Rhine to the Danube, terminated as the able, experienced, and brave Pichegru, foretold it certainly would, in defeat and disgrace, Bournonville was ordered on with these French battalions in Dutch pay, to check the career of the archduke Charles, and they have ever since been occupied in fighting the battles of France; but thereby, say the Dutch, our frontiers are protected from the insults and ravages of the imperial armies. The seven united provinces have discharged about one half of the enormous contributions they were assessed by their conquerors; and their new friends will no doubt find the method of soon getting the remainder.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Neufchatel, Oct. 26, 1800.

My Dear Sir,

We left Berne early on the 23d, and passing through a country which offered nothing remarkable, arrived at Soleure, the capital of the canton of the same name, where we dined at a table d'hôte with a number of very ill-bred French officers—There is nothing worth seeing at Soleure but the church of St. Urso, which has some claim to attention from the elegance of its architecture both internal and external. This canton you perhaps know is Roman Catholic.

A Mr. Wallier was so polite as to shew us his fine private cabinet of natural history, on our requesting to see it. He first asked whether we were French. On our enquiring the reason of this question, we found he had been a hostage in the hands of that nation, and was treated so harshly that he has ever since held them in utter abhorrence. We were much pleased with the curiosities shewn us, particularly a sea-egg, perfectly petrified, for which, Mr. Wallier said lord Spencer offered him a hundred louis!

Soleure lays at the foot of the mountains of Jura, which appear to be a mass of calcareous rock, but thinly covered with soil. This celebrated chain does not resemble the pointed cliffs and needles of the Alps, but is rather like the blue ridge in America, the line flowing and unbroken. Our road lay along the Jura all the way to Bienne, but we saw nothing remarkable. A little before we arrived, we were stopped by a custom-house officer, who demanded to search our baggage, as we were entering the département of the Haut de Rhin, which robs Switzerland of the little canton of Bienne; a few good words and the more powerful argument of half a crown, saved us a great deal of trouble just as it grew dark, and obtained us a certificate to enable us to pass out of the republic without examination.

We arrived at Bienne too late to see any thing of the town and lake; the former, however, has nothing to interest one en passant; we set out again early the next morning, and from a hill in the neighbourhood saw the whole lake and the adjoining country. We breakfasted at a dirty little tavern on the neck of land which separates this from the lake of Neufchatel, which we had a fine view of, all the way to this place, where we arrived to dinner. We had also a transient view of the small but pretty lake of Morat.

One principal object at Neufchatel was to see the two younger sons of my friend Mr. — which we had promised their father to do. They were under the care of Mr. B. a Swiss gentleman, whose family is well known in this country for its literary talents and patriotic publications. He has travelled all over Europe with foreign noblemen, and after finishing the education of the two elder sons accompanied them in their travels through France, Germany, Italy, Denmark, and Sweden. He has promised the father to make the same tour with the younger.

I was received with open arms by this worthy man, and the amiable young — who have compelled us to pass our time principally with them. Never was I pressed more to make a stay anywhere and indeed the inducements were great, but our desire to cross Mount Cenis before the season was too late, obliged us to decline all the parties and excursions planned for us. We, however, remained this day that we might accompany them to the isle de S. Pierre, in the lake of Bienne, celebrated for the residence of Rousseau, who shut himself out from the world on this island for near three years.

We rode, in a carriage, from Neufchatel to the borders of the lake of Bienne, on which we embarked in a small boat, and in forty minutes were landed on this little spot. Our first visit was to the chamber (in the only house on the island) which the eccentric Jean Jacques occupied, where we all of course made our own reflections. The walls and doors were covered with the names of those who had made a pilgrimage here, and even the ceiling was not spared. In a room that had once been occupied by Rousseau, one would expect to find something worthy of remembrance, but I am sorry to say, I saw nothing that did any credit to his admirers. A great deal of bad verse, and paltry common place

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE LAY PREACHER.

"Hate not laborious work, neither husbandry."

The dissolution of ice and snow being now fully accomplished by that potent chemist, the sun, the provident husbandman, refreshed by the rest of winter, and gladdened by the view of many a spot of vivid green sward, thinks it time to leave his afternoon pot of beer unfinished and prepare for the labours of spring. But, since many, attached to ease and the fire side, are unwilling to put their hands to the plough, and strive to put off the evil day of furrowing the fields, I will endeavour to convince every procrastinating labourer, that nothing is so laborious, as having nothing to do.

If a fretful farmer, who, in some rainy day, thinks no employment is so toilsome as that which he exercises, will cast his eyes upon the various idlers, sauntering along with pale cheeks and gouty limbs, from Dan to Beersheba, he will be convinced that moving in July, and haling wood in December, are less fatiguing than pleasure's race. When an inquisitive being asks why there is so much vice and misery in this world, I conceive no answer would be more pertinent, than because the vicious and the miserable have, at some period of their lives, been haters of laborious work and husbandry.

What is it but this aversion to labour, and a phantastic wish to be free from care, that urges so many to exchange health for whisky, and their money for a game of cards? Why are so many rheumatic limbs propped by crutches? Why does the attorney commence such frequent suits for the innkeeper; and why in a jail are the debtors' rooms crowded? If the hoe, the spade, and the field could speak, they would say "because men hearken to the whispers of fancy, or the persuasions of indolence, and forsake us, the best allies in life's warfare."

Unless the sower go forth to sow, he cannot expect sixty, or a hundred fold. Unless men sometimes love laborious work, and husbandry, they will not reckon much fine gold, nor be eagerly enquired after in the gate. The ages of miracles are past; and I know not whether man has a right to expect that providence will interpose particularly in his favour, and give him bread, if he will not be at the pains to leaven it.

That ancient adjudication, which sentenced Adam to eat bread in the sweat of his brow, has been harshly denominated a curse, by unthinking christians. But it is demonstrable that the necessity for labour is one of the highest blessings of life, and without this necessity, other blessings would lose half their value. In the initial stanza of one of his first compositions, a favourite author has uttered this eternal truth with equal grace and energy;

O mortal man, who livest here by toil,
Do not complain of this thy hard estate
That, like an emmet, thou most ever moil,
Is a sad sentence of an ancient date;
And, certes, there is for reason great;
For, though, sometimes it makes thee weep and wail,
And curse thy star and early drudge and late,
Withouten that would come an heavier bale
Loose life, unruly passions, and diseases pale.

The ancient poets, delighting in fiction, have amused themselves and credulous readers with a gorgeous description of the golden age. An age, which, according to poetical chronology, existed prior to the primal curse. In this blest period, as the fables of Orion feign, no coulters pierced the earth's surface, honey distilled from oaks, and wine gurgled spontaneously from springs. This is undoubtedly a vision of the observations, filled the place of wit, elegance, and taste.

In this room is a trap door which leads to the one under it, to which this singular genius retired when he heard any visitors coming up the stairs to see him. When they entered the room below, he made his escape up through the trap-door. "Am I so strange an animal," he used to say, "that every body must come to gaze upon me through curiosity?"

After ordering dinner, (which you will allow we could not dispense with even in the habitation of Rousseau) we took a walk round the island, and admired the variety of beauties it contained, of hill and dale, forest and field, meadow and vineyard. It is an enchanting little spot, just suited to the romantic mind of the citizen of Geneva.

Mr. B—— pointed out to me the favourite walk of Rousseau, which was in an elevated alley of lofty trees, bordering a steep bank of the lake, and affording a fine view of the chain of Jura, with the little white villages, at its foot, reflected by the lake. At the end of the walk, is a grass platform, from whence we could admire the range of Alps from Grindenwald almost to Savoy. In a summer house, at the other end, the visitors, in the fine season, dance. We were unfortunately, about ten days too late for the vendangis, or vintage, when all the neighbouring inhabitants resort here on a Sunday, to the amount of several hundred, to dance. This island is also the Sunday excursion of the Bernois, and the inhabitants of the cities in its vicinity, during summer.

We were entertained, during dinner, by two itinerant musicians, whom we afterwards took from the island, in our barque. On our voyage home, we might have been compared to those heroes, who accompanied Jason, in search of the golden fleece, for, like them, we had music on our poop.

A little distance from St. Pierre, is a small island, of about a hundred yards in circumference, which, from its appearance, was no doubt joined to the former; it is little more than a huge bank of earth and stones, on which some zealot has planted a liberty tree. This island is remarkable for being one of the objects on which Rousseau exercised his eccentricity, for one day remarking on a visit to it (you will be pleased to observe it was the boundary of his excursions for three years) that no animal whatever lived there; he determined it should no longer be uninhabited, and accordingly bought a pair of rabbits, and placing them upon this new dominion, cried "I give you this territory, increase and multiply." His command was well obeyed for they increased to such a degree that the place got the name of the Isle of Rabbits, and they enjoyed their territory undisturbed till the revolution, whose fatal effects even reached this poor little place, which had been so long a terra incognita, and the rabbits were all destroyed.

The Isle de St. Pierre was not exempt from the evils of war, and I heard with sorrow the account of the fierce conflict which took place between the French and Bernois, when the former invaded it.

It was dark long before we reached Neufchâtel, so that we had nothing of the landscape to interest us; but the conversation of Mr. B. was so very pleasing and instructive, that we thought the way short. Among the number of anecdotes, which he related respecting the late revolution, and the invasion of the French, was the following, which I thought worth preserving, as it strongly marks the brave and firm character of the Swiss Cantons, who alone possess the valour of their ancestors, and who alone have made any resistance to the incursions of their enemy.

night. But, if it had been realized, and men, like the austere governor in the gospel, could have reaped where they had not sown, and gathered where they had not sown, such a state of inaction would produce an extreme of weariness, more intolerable than the drudgery of the field. A profound observer* has remarked that if all the year were playing holidays, to sport would be as tedious as to work; and if we mark the men of pleasure, whom the legacy, or the partiality of parents has enriched, we shall discover the truth of this observation. Who is so anxious, who loses so much rest, who so worketh with his hands, as the nocturnal gamster? What perils, what storms, what fatigue the drunkard encounters, navigating the raging ocean of wine.

To what injury, and to what infamy is the libertine exposed, who nightly haunts the recesses of debauchery, or who provokes the vengeance of the husband by tempting the loyalty of the wife. What toils, what watchings, what anxieties are endured by every sensualist, whether he roves through the Haram of Variety, or labours to sully the purity of virgin innocence: yet all these make delight a trade,

"And coy perdition every hour pursue."

For myself, I cannot help thinking, that cutting tender grass is more easy, than cutting unlucky cards; that the labourer with a corn basket on his shoulder is lesss burdened, than the tipler with the load of his stomach; and that the "flaxen headed plough-boy," tracing the straight and undeviating furrow, has a lighter task to fulfil, than he, who bewilders himself in the mazes of wantonness, who in the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night, hurries after her, who is emphatically called "the strange woman," and † whose house is the way to Hell, going down to the chambers of Death.

Repair then with alacrity, happy husbandmen, to laborious work. Trust me, ye sleep sounder than he, who advises you, and who is destined to have no acres to till, but who, with throbbing temples, toils over the weekly sermon. As I wander through rural lanes, with a head perplexed with anxious thought, and with a heart lacerated by many an arrow of adversity, still I am always tranquilized, when I regard the operations of agriculture. I gaze with pleasure at your bursting barns, your well ordered cottages, and your fruitful fields. I see that, in consequence of your labour, you are healthful and happy. While you, jocund, drive your teams afield, and inhale the balsamic flavour of the earth, you consult your fortune by the one, and your preservation by the other. Continue to venerate the plough and to feed the ox, and you will turn up gold with the first, and draw to your dwellings fine gold with the second. Let others, as it has been eloquently said, dig for facitious wealth in the bowels of the earth, your brighter ore is derived from its upper stratum.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. EDITOR,

Conceiving, from several happy circumstances, which have been lately brought about by the

* SHAKESPEARE; who in numerous passages of his matchless dialogues, faithful to truth and nature, has eloquently recommended habitual industry, and who was himself a signal and glorious example of ardent application, associated with the most creative genius.

† This picturesque phrase of king Solomon, expressed with all the energy and magnificence of oriental diction, is peculiarly memorable, because every apothegm of the Jewish Prince was the dictate of experience, as we abundantly learn both from his domestic history and public declarations.

wisdom of our rulers, that they may be somewhat perplexed in devising ways and means to satisfy the various demands of government, I have ventured to suggest an easy plan to draw forth the energies of the people: I mean a new mode of taxation; which, if adopted, I humbly conceive, would greatly assist our administration in its operations, without in the least endangering its popularity. But as my scheme is entirely novel, I beg your indulgence while I endeavour to explain it.

No man, I presume, will doubt, in this enlightened day, of the ability of every real patriot, to meddle with the affairs of government, I hope, therefore, I need say nothing of my motives.

It is well known, that the fifteen millions, of dollars which we paid for Louisiana, were entirely out of the calculation of our cunning financier, when he talked so prettily about repealing the internal taxes. How is this money to be paid? None of us, surely, can be ignorant of the disagreeable sensations which the name of taxes always excites in every real republican bosom; and we all know the extreme sensibility of republicanism, which when in power, would scorn to hurt the feelings of the meanest citizen. I have indeed heard it hinted, that the Louisianians are to be sweated for this same sum, and that the powers of the king of Spain are to be transferred to the P—t for this purpose. This base, absurd, and unfounded calumny, scarcely deserves a refutation. Who does not shrink at the very idea? I could here make use of federal calculations (and it would not be the first time that we have made use of them) to prove, that this splendid event in the annals of our country, would cost each individual but a few cents; and who, I proudly ask, would exchange the fine feelings of generosity for this paltry sum—particularly, as it is the only gratification we can expect to reap from the bargain?

Besides all these powerful arguments, Mr. Editor, to shew that we must divine some method of obtaining money, I have been further induced to offer this scheme, in order to find something for our legislators to do, for which, sir, entre nous, I am apt to think they will be greatly obliged to me.

Having said thus much, by way of introduction, I shall proceed with due haste, to the interesting object of this communication. I beg leave to observe that for reasons above specified, I have preferred the word fine to that odious, old-fashioned term taxes—and here I might take occasion to assert my claim to genuine republicanism, which always changes the names of things although the form and substance be retained.

I propose 1st, That a fine be imposed on all printers who shall be guilty of publishing the truth in their papers; for it is universally admitted that the federal papers are the only ones which ever publish the truth; and as, under such circumstances, the truth is a libel, this fine would have the merit of falling exclusively upon the enemies of the country, which would be another glorious epoch in "the annals of our country."—It would also hold out an additional inducement to the democratic editors in the United States, to adhere rigidly to their ancient habits.

2nd. I propose, that a fine be imposed on all persons concerned in a duel. This, I flatter myself, no man will object to—its intention being obvious. We are now in danger of losing two zealous democrats by this anti-republican practice; and, for aught I know, we might in the lapse of ages, lose one or two more in the same manner, which would certainly, at any time, be a great loss to the community: It is time, therefore, for the public good, to interpose legislative authority. I declare, at the same time, that neither Mr. Randolph nor Mr. Alston have any knowledge of this proposition.

3rd. I propose, lastly, that a fine be laid on all persons who shall refuse to get drunk, in honour of Mr. Jefferson, on the 12th day of May next. I need say little in defence of this proposal; all real republicans will at once see its utility, as it will affect none of our imported patriots, or native democrats.

I shall say nothing, Mr. Editor, of the great importance of these discoveries, or the immense sums they would produce; but I shall end by requesting that you would not throw out the least hint or insinuation that they were communicated by

A FEDERALIST.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[Every circumstance which relates to those persons whose writings we admire, awakens and interests our curiosity. The time and place of their birth, as it is remarked by an accurate scholar, their education and gradual attainments, the dates of their productions, and the reception they severally met with, their habits of life, their private friendships, and even their external form, are all points which how little soever they may have been adverted to by their contemporaries, strongly engage the attention of posterity. Not satisfied with receiving the aggregated wisdom of ages, as a free gift, we visit the mansions where our instructors are said to have resided, we contemplate with pleasure the trees under whose shade they once reposed, and wish to see and converse with those sages, whose labours have added strength to virtue, and efficacy to truth.

SHAKSPEARE, above all writers, since the days of Homer, has excited this curiosity in the highest degree; and perhaps no poet of any nation was ever more idolized. His biography, written by Rowe, has been read perhaps with more eagerness, than any life in Plutarch. The subsequent article presents no additional information, respecting the Bard of Avon, but concisely tells all that can be known of his domestic character.]

An account of the man who has obtained the admiration of his country, who, after a period of two centuries, is still mentioned with pride, and whose excellence has defied all imitation, unites the double interest of esteem and curiosity. In the life of our immortal SHAKSPEARE we feel this interest increased by the astonishment with which we view the commencement of his career: the eldest among the ten children of a dealer in wool, brought up to the business of his father, and engaged early in domestic cares, he appears to have taken a direction very opposite to the acquirement of that splendor which is attached to his name. He was born at Stratford, in Warwickshire, in the month of April 1564, and, after some slender literary attainments at a grammar school, he embraced his paternal avocation, married, and became a father before the twentieth year of his age. In that state his wonderful talents would have been buried had not a singular incident called them into action. A neighbouring park, belonging to Sir Thomas Lucy, had been frequently plundered, and Shakspeare had, with many others of his own age, committed the depredation. Sir Thomas followed up his repeated threats with a prosecution: Shakspeare revenged himself in a severe ballad, in which the knight was treated with the most satiric freedom; and then took refuge in London.

On his entrance into the capital, he appears to have been reduced to such extreme distress, that to hold the horses of those who frequented the theatre, and to depend on their liberality, were, for some time, all the employment, and all the subsistence he could procure. At length, admitted to some subordinate office within the playhouse, he obtained the notice of the players, and occasionally performed some under parts on the stage. He then perceived the tenor of his genius, and aspired to supply his deficiencies as an actor by merits of a higher nature; as an author he began to display the powers of his mind. The force of nature and genius united, with attentive study, to suit the reigning taste of the superior, and the peculiar humour of the inferior orders of the public, ensured him success. Patronage soon followed admiration, and he is said to have been rapidly raised to fortune, as well as fame, by the generosity of the Earl of Southampton; to whom, in terms of the highest gratitude, he has dedicated his two most considerable poems, intitled Venus and Adonis, and the Rape of Lucrece. But the favours he experienced were not confined to the courtiers: the queen herself conferred on him many marks of esteem, and not only continually honoured the performance of his dramas with her presence, but even condescended to point out objects to him; and the comedy of the Merry Wives of Windsor is said to have owed its origin to her desire of seeing that inimitable medley of wit and profligacy, Sir John Falstaff, in love. Thus, with little advantages from education, and with the obstacles of disgrace and penury to overcome, arose this Genius of Nature to the notice of his country and of his prince, and to the ceaseless admiration of futurity. If our astonishment at such an elevation can be increased, it must be by the modesty of his retirement from applause, satisfied with ease and a moderate competency. At his native town he purchased a handsome residence, where, withdrawn from all the business of the drama, he passed the residue of his life. He died on the twenty-third of April, 1616, at the commencement of his fifty-third year, and appointed his youngest daughter and her husband, whose name was Hall, his executors. He was buried at Stratford, where a monument was erected to him, and another was raised in Westminster Abbey, in 1740, at the public expense. The first edition of his plays, collected together, was published in 1623; but the principal edition, with the corrections and illustrations of various commentators, with a glossarial index by Mr. Reed, and with notes by Johnson and Steevens.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Among many curious, new and valuable books, lately imported by Mr. Samuel F. Bradford, and Messrs. Conrads, of this city, are "The Chances, or Nothing of the new School, by a disciple of the old School." This Novel is favourably reviewed in more than one literary journal.

Goodes "Life of Geddes," the celebrated roman catholic translator of the Bible, is an interesting and amusing volume of biography.

"Commentaries on Classical Learning," by the Rev. Mr. Urquhart, are entitled to great attention from every lover of the literature of the Greeks and Romans.

And Dr. Aikin's "Letters on English Poetry," addressed to a young lady, display the wonted graces of his pure and elegant style, together with a fund of useful criticism.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In his tour to the Hebrides, Boswell says, we next went to the great church of St. Giles, which has lost much of its original magnificence in the inside, by being divided into four places of presbyterian worship. 'Come,' said Dr. Johnson jocularly to principal Robertson, 'let me see what was once a church.'

No wonder that he was affected with a strong indignation while he beheld the ruins of religious magnificence. I happened to ask where John Knox was buried. Dr. Johnson burst out 'I hope in the highway. I have been looking at his reformations.'

Politeness is of great consequence in society. It is fictitious benevolence. It supplies the place of it among those, who see each other only in public, or but little.

Pratt's "Liberal Opinions," is a novel of an original cast; and its success induced the author to lay aside his adopted name, and assume his real one. The adventures of Benignus, in which it is supposed Mr. Pratt shaded some particulars of his own life, and the character of Draper, are admirably drawn, and will bear a comparison with the most felicitous productions of Fielding, Smollet, or Richardson.

The felicity of a London life, to a man who can enjoy it with full intellectual relish is apt to make existence, in any narrower sphere, seem insipid or irksome.

Boswell, in his character of Johnson, declares that he was a sincere and zealous Christian of the high church of England, and monarchical principles, which he would not suffer to be questioned; steady and inflexible in maintaining the obligations of piety and virtue, both from a regard to the order of society, and from a veneration for the Great Source of all order; correct, nay stern in his taste; hard to please, and easily offended; impetuous and irritable in his temper, but of a most humane and benevolent heart; having a mind stored with a vast and various collection of knowledge, which he communicated, with peculiar perspicuity and force, in rich and choice expression.

There is not, says ANDISON, a more useful class of society, than Merchants. They knit mankind together in a mutual intercourse of good offices, distribute the gifts of nature, find work for the poor, augment the wealth of a nation, and increase the comforts and conveniencies of life.

To censure trade,
Or hold her busy people in contempt,
Let none presume.
Trade to the good physician gives his balms;
Gives cheering cordials to th' afflicted heart;
Gives to the wealthy delicacies high;
Gives to the curious works of nature rare;
And when the priest displays, in just discourse,
Him, the all-wise creator, and declares
His presence, power, and goodness, unconfin'd,
'Tis trade, attentive voyager, who fills
His lips with argument.

The judicious wish of Shenstone was to always have a heart superior, with economy suitable, to his fortune.

It is a miserable thing to be sensible of the value of one's time, and yet restrained by circumstances from making a proper use of it. One feels oneself somewhat in the situation of admiral Howe.

The following is a delightful feature in the mind of a liberal scholar:

One part of his character was no less amiable than uncommon; so totally free was he from envy, the vice of little souls, that he was always eager to encourage the appearance of literary merit wherever it could be found; and, if any person had cultivated a particular branch of learning more assiduously than himself, he took a real pleasure in receiving information, and what was still more rare at his age, in renouncing ancient prejudices, and retracting opinions, which he allowed to have been precipitately formed.

There is no word in the Latin language that signifies a female friend. "Amica" means a mistress; and, perhaps, there is no friendship betwixt the sexes wholly disunited from a degree of love.

Perhaps an acquaintance with men of genius is rather respectable than satisfactory. It is as unaccountable as it is certain, that fancy heightens sensibility, sensibility strengthens passion, and passion makes men humourists.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"Eugenius" has remained silent too long. During the vernal months, we hope to hear him warble, and we will not only gladly listen to, but print his songs.

From "Beatrice" we expect, occasionally, an essay in that easy style, which so agreeably expresses her good humoured opinions.

"M." we hope, will keep her promise. She cannot tire our readers with the multitude, or offend them by the choice of her topics.

"Asmodeo," to our great joy, has again addressed us.

"The Rural Wanderer" will always find a congenial home in the Port Folio.

The "Ode of the first book of Horace," has some merit; but many of the lines are too prosaic.

The "Epigram" is defective in two essential particulars, wit and point.

The "Description of a storm on the Atlantic," is of so roaring and dashing a nature, that our brains became perfectly giddy, during the violence of the tempest.

It is with pleasure we recognize the hand of one of our female correspondents, though she has, on this occasion, suppressed her accustomed signature.

The Editor cannot find either in the public library or private collections of Philadelphia, the following tracts, which, he hopes, this advertisement may yet obtain for him, from some man of letters, willing to assist literary labour, not uselessly employed.

Imperfect Hints towards a new edition of Shakspeare, written chiefly in the year 1782, 4to. 1787.

The same, part the second and last, by Samuel Felton, 4to. 1788.

Cursory remarks upon the Arrangement of the Plays of Shakspeare, occasioned by reading Mr. Malone's essay on the chronological Order of those celebrated pieces, by the Rev. J. Hurdis, M. A. 8vo. 1792.

A familiar address to the curious in English poetry, more particularly to the readers of Shakspeare, by Thersites Literarius, 8vo. 1784.

Many juvenile authors, who are in haste to be enrolled among the Literati, before they have passed the noviciate of discipline, will do well to reflect upon the mighty difference between the vis viva animi, the irresistible impulse of genius and the mere love of scribbling. To P. then we must exclaim:

If you're willing to quit all pretence
To judgment, reason and to common sense;
If you are pleas'd your verses should be seen,
Mixt with enigmas on a medley skreen;
If this suffice you, and you think this fame,
Write on, and welcome, write, in folly's name.

THE MOUNTAIN SHEPHERD.

A FRAGMENT.

Nor are thy stormy sorrows yet forgot;
Profanely yet dost thou arraign high heav'n,
Still dost thou murmur at thy adverse lot,
Ungrateful for the various blessings given?

Unthinking mortal! wilt thou never know
That human thought could ne'er the eternal scan,
The earth's a scene of variegated woe,
And perfect happiness is not for man.

A calm reliance on the mighty power,
Who sees it right that thou should'st suffer here,
Who deals thee grief, through life's short fleeting hour,
Will guide to realms unsullied with a tear.

On that rely—still dost thou droop and grieve,
Come, let us leave this solitary vale,
And, as we drink the cheering breeze of eve,
List to the mountain shepherd's mournful tale.

For not o'er vice alone doth misery spread
Her ruthless sway, or rend the guilty mind;
The breast of innocence full oft hath bled,
To every woe devoted and resign'd.

On yon rich mountain, whose aspiring top
Climbs to the clouds, Palemon's cottage stood;
Around his flocks the thymy herbage crop,
Or lave their fleeces in the winding flood.

At early morn he'd jocund carols sing,
Nor would he change with kings his happy lot,
While breathing sweets, and blushing as the spring,
His beauteous Ellen grac'd his humble cot.

Young Lubin, pride of all the village youth,
Enamour'd gaz'd on bashful Ellen's charms;
The Mountain Shepherd, conscious of his truth,
With blessings gave her to his faithful arms.

The rural toil, the rural sport was theirs;
Far from the senseless world's tumultuous noise;
Strangers to guile, their bosoms knew no cares,
And only throbb'd with love or friendship's joys.

And while with scented hay they spread the ground,
Or blithely drew the loaded team along;
Then would the dales and woodland meads around
Echo the Mountain Shepherd's artless song.

A smiling boy (lovely as poets feign
The god of Love) the parents wishes bless'd;
Who, while his grandsire bore him o'er the plain,
With infant fondness hung upon his breast.

Blue was his eye, and sparkled bright with health,
Four summers on his cheek their bloom had shed;
Dearer to Lubin than the wide world's wealth
Were the fair ringlets waving on his head.

One fav'rite lamb, bedeck'd with many a flow'r,
Was Edwin's fond companion in his play;
To adorn his neck, ah! luckless was the hour
That near the stream induc'd their steps to stray.

Of vivid buds, pluck'd from the neighbouring wood,
A glowing wreath his infant fingers twin'd;
From his soft hand it dropt into the flood,
And gaily sail'd before the fluttering wind.

Stay, garland, stay! the charming prattler cried;
But who the wretched Ellen's woes shall tell,
When, heedless bending o'er the rushy tide,
Into the rapid stream he headlong fell!

Loud shriek'd the mother, as convuls'd she stood,
By force withheld from plunging in the wave,
Lubin, distracted, leap'd into the flood
To snatch his treasure from a watry grave.

With dauntless breast he stem'd the flood awhile,
And bore his darling up above the tide,
But, by the current dash'd, and spent with toil,
Both, both together sunk, alas! and died!

LINES WRITTEN IN AFFLICTION.

In sportive youth's fair, cloudless day,
Bright Hope illum'd each rising hour;
All then was innocently gay,
And love diffus'd its softest power.

The seasons pass'd unmark'd by woes,
My heart had sweet content in store;
I careless pluck'd the blushing rose,
Regardless of the thorn it bore.

But death, who severs earthly ties,
Spread his dark mantle o'er the scene,
And sorrow's deep impressive sighs
Hath mark'd the hours that intervene.

Come, meek religion, to my aid,
Teach me to kiss thy chastening rod,
That, when the last great debt is paid,
My soul may rest in peace with God.

SELECTED POETRY.

[This is a jealous ode, addressed by Horace to his mistress Lydia. He expostulates with the inconstant fair on her preference of a rival, whom he describes as riotous and profligate. Perhaps the passion of jealousy was never more beautifully described. But his translator observes the taste of the lover could not be very delicate, if he sighed long after a mistress, whose intemperance he describes in such strong terms. We may presume this ode was written in Horace's younger days. Telephus, his rival, seems to have been a handsome and accomplished youth. Addison has finely translated the beginning of this ode. See his travels, p. 202, and the Spectator, No. 171.]

HOR. LIB. I, ODE 13.

Translated by BOSCAWEN.

Whene'er thy voice extols my rivals charms,
When every grace thy lavish praise bestows,
Thy roscat neck, soft taper arms,
With what fierce flame my bosom glows!

From their fix'd seat my tranquil spirits fly;
The wonted colour from my cheek retires,
Whilst tears, just stealing from the eye
Witness the slow consuming fire.

I rage, whene'er the beauties of thy breast
Rude broils and drunken revelry disgrace,
When the fierce spoiler has imprest
Rude kisses on thy tender face.

Ah! could'st thou hear my fondly warning strain!
Ne'er couldst thou hope a constant bliss to prove,
With him, who dar'd those lips profane,
* That breath the nectar'd sweets of love.

Happy, thrice happy they, whose blameless joys
Spring from the unbroken union of the heart,
No murmurings vex, no strife annoys,
But their last day alone shall part.

[The following lines from CHATERTON'S African Eclogue, called Heccar and Gaira, produced in 1770, when he was not seventeen years of age, have been given as an instance of the sublimity of that genius, which was capable of producing the poems under the feigned name of Rowley.]

GAIRA.

Rouse not Remembrance from her shadowy cell,
Nor of those bloody sons of mischief tell.
Cawna! O Cawna! deck'd in sable charms.
What distant region holds thee from my arms?
Cawna, the pride of Afric's sultry vales,
Soft as the cooling murmur of the gales,

* This line, though perfectly poetical, may serve to show how inadequately the most elegant version transuses the beauties of the Latin tongue into our own. We are often obliged to see nothing but the wrong side of the tapestry. The original is

"oscula, quæ Venus

Quinta parte sui nectaris imbuat."

† White Men, ———

Majestic as the many-colour'd snake,
Trailing his glories through the blossom'd brake;
Black as the glossy rocks where Eascul roars,
Foaming through sandy wastes to Jaghir's shores;
Swift as the arrow, hastening to the breast,
Was Cawna, the companion of my rest.

The sun sat low'ring in the western sky,
The swelling tempest spread around the eye;
Upon my Cawna's bosom I reclin'd,
Catching the breathing whispers of the wind:
Swift from the wood a prowling tyger came;
Dreadful his voice, his eyes a glowing flame;
I bent the bow, the never-erring dart
Pierc'd his rough armour, but escap'd his heart;
He fled, though wounded, to a distant waste,
I urg'd the furious flight with fatal haste;
He fell, he dy'd—spent in the fiery toil.
I stripp'd his carcase of the furry spoil,
And as the varied spangles met my eye,
On this, I cried, shall my lov'd Cawna lie.
The dusky midnight hung the skies in grey;
Impell'd by love, I wing'd the airy way;
In the deep valley and the mossy plain,
I sought my Cawna, but I sought in vain;
The pallid shadows of the azure waves*
Had made my Cawna and my children slaves.
Reflection maddens, to recall the hour,
The Gods had given me to the Demon's power.
The dusk slow vanish'd from the hated lawn,
I gain'd a mountain glaring with the dawn.
There the full sails expanded to the wind,
Struck horror and distraction in my mind,
There Cawna, mingled with a worthless train,
In common slav'ry drags the hated chain.
Now judge, my Heccar, have I cause for rage?
Should aught the thunder of my arm assuage?
In ever-reeking blood this javlin dy'd
With vengeance shall be never satisfied;
I'll strew the beaches with the mighty dead,
And tinge the lily of their features red.

HECCAR.

When the loud shriekings of the hostile cry
Roughly salute my ear, enrag'd I'll fly;
Send the sharp arrow quivering thro' the heart,
Chill the hot vitals with the venom'd dart;
Nor heed the shining steel or noisy smoke,
Gaira and Vengeance shall inspire the stroke.

[Mr. MOORE, a recent poet, is much admired in England, for the singular sweetness of his versification, and for a certain glow in his descriptions, mildly ardent, like the setting suns of CLAUDE. We shall, occasionally, select from his works some of the most pleasing specimens of his genius as a Poet, and of his tenderness as a lover.]

TO JULIA.

In allusion to some illiberal criticisms.

Why let the stingless critic chide,
With all that fume of vacant pride,
Which mantles o'er the pedant fool,
Like vapour on a stagnant pool.
Oh! if the song, to feeling true,
Can please the elect, the sacred few,
Whose souls by taste and nature taught,
Thrill with the genuine pulse of thought,
If some fond feeling maid, like thee,
The warm eyed child of sympathy
Shall say, while o'er my simple theme
She languishes in passion's dream.
"He was, indeed a tender soul—
"No critic law, no chill controul
"Should ever freeze, by timid art,
"The flowings of so fond a heart."
Yes, soul of nature, soul of love,
That, hovering, like a snow-wing'd dove,
Breath'd o'er my cradle warblings wild,
And hail'd me passion's warmest child.
Grant me the tear from beauty's eye
From feeling's breast the votive sigh,

* "The idea of an African calling the Europeans 'the pallid shadows of the azure waves.' (say the Critics) is very happy. A similar thought had been well expressed a few lines earlier.

"The children of the wave, whose pallid race Views the faint sun display a languid face."

Oh, let my song, my memory find
A shrine, within the tender mind,
And I will scorn the critic's chide
And I will scorn the fume of pride
Which mantles o'er the pedant fool,
Like vapour on a stagnant pool.

[The following elegant extract is taken from the poems of Sir RICHARD FANSHAW, published with the translation of Il Pastor Fido, 1676.—The five first lines are part of another sonnet, and some of the thoughts resemble the Spanish and Italian conceits, but we cannot refrain from admiring the allusions to the sanguinary death of the rose, and to the massacre of the innocents by Herod.]

Thou blushing Rose, within whose virgin leaves
The wanton wind to sport himself presumes,
While from their rifled wardrobe he receives
For his wings purple, for his breath perfumes.
Blown in the morning thou shalt fade e'er noon;
What boots a life, which in such haste forsakes thee?

Thou'rt wondrous frolic, being to die so soon,
And passing proud a little colour makes thee.
If thee thy brittle beauty so deceives,
Know then the thing that swells thee is thy bane;
For the same beauty doth in bloody leaves
The sentence of thy early death contain.
Some clown's coarse lungs will poison thy sweet flower,

If by the careless plough thou shalt be torn,
And many Herods lie in wait each hour
To murder thee, as soon as thou art born
Nay force thy bud to blow, their tyrant breath,
Anticipating life to hasten death.

VERSES TO A LADY

Who had consulted a fortune teller.

When fair Eliza seeks to know
Her future lot of bliss or woe,
By witches and their spells;
Vainly they mark her natal hour,
Unconscious of the mighty power
That in her beauty dwells.

What various hearts enchanted lie,
By the soft magic of her eye,
Where ambush'd love beguiles;
What hapless youths, by charms undone,
In vain lament they cannot shun
The witchery of her smiles.

Though destiny obey her breath,
The good and ill, though life and death
Depend on her alone;
Sole arbitress of others fate,
Lest dangers unforeseen await,
She trembles for her own.

Ah, then let gentle pity charm
That bosom, which, by nature warm,
Indifference now congeals.
Cheer the sad heart with doubts oppress'd,
And let thy sympathising breast,
Relieve the care it feels.

There is much point in the following Epigram.

As two divines, their ambling steeds bestriding,
In merry mood, o'er Boston neck were riding,
At length a simple struture met their sight,
From whence the felon takes his hempen flight,
When, sailor-like, he squares accounts with hope,
His all depending on a single rope—
"Ah! where, my friend," cries one, "where now were you,
"Had yonder gallows been allow'd its due?"
"Where," quoth the other in sarcastic tone—
"Why, where but riding into town—ALONE?"

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

Section 4....Examples of the greatest powers of the art of oratory, in the two harangues for the Crown, the one of Eschynes, the other of Demosthenes.

A FEW preliminary observations are indispensable in this place, to discover the importance of this trial, and the great character which Demosthenes so long sustained in Athens, where the profession of an orator was a kind of magistracy, and was, particularly for Demosthenes, so solid a power, that Philip, as historians inform us, said that of all the Greeks he dreaded none but Demosthenes.

After the loss of the battle of Cheronea, the Athenians, apprehensive of being besieged, ordered their walls to be repaired. It was Demosthenes who gave them this counsel, and to him they committed the execution of it. He advanced, from his own fortune, a large sum, which he made a present to the republic. Ctesiphon, his friend, proposed to honour him with a crown of gold, as a recompense for his generosity. The decree was passed, and it ordained that the proclamation of the coronation should be made at the Theatre, during the Feasts of Bacchus, when all the Greeks assembled at Athens, to be present at those spectacles. Eschynes had been a long time the rival and the enemy of Demosthenes. He possessed great talents, and a fine voice, which he had occasion to exercise, having commenced by being a comedian. But he had also a venal soul, and was, almost publicly, in the number of the mercenary orators, whom Philip pensioned in all the republics of Greece. Demosthenes alone, as honest as he was eloquent, had remained incorruptible, and the Athenians were not ignorant of it. Accordingly, it was not the first time that he had received the same honour, which was now decreed him by Ctesiphon. But here, envy believed it had found a favourable opportunity. The fatal battle of Cheronea had beaten down the power of Athens, and rendered Philip the arbiter of Greece. It was Demosthenes who had advised this war, the event of which had been so disastrous. Eschynes flattered himself he should be able to render him unpopular in this point of view, and tear from him the Crown that was offered him. He attacked the decree of Ctesiphon, as contrary to law. His accusation turns upon three points. 1. A law of Athens forbids the coronation of any citizen, charged with any branch of administration, before he should have rendered his accounts, and Demosthenes, charged with the reparation of the walls, and the administration of the spectacles, is still accountable. This is the first infraction.

2. Another law forbids that a decree of coronation, passed by the Senate, should not be proclaimed any where but in the Senate itself: and that of Ctesiphon, although rendered by the Senate, was to be, according to the tenor of it, proclaimed at the Theatre, second infraction. Finally, and this is the foundation of the cause, the decree purports that the Crown is awarded to Demosthenes for the services which he has rendered, and which he does not cease to render to the republic; and Demosthenes, on the contrary, has done nothing but harm to the republic. This last accusation was to draw after it the censure of the whole conduct of Demosthenes, since he had interfered in the affairs of the state; and this was the principal object of his enemy, who strove to ravish from him both the honours which had been granted him, and the glory of having deserved them. The quarrel commenced two years before the death of Philip: but the political troubles of Greece, the embarrassment of public affairs, and the danger of the conjuncture, retarded the pursuit of the controversy, which was not argued and determined till six years afterwards, when Alexander was already master of Asia.

One is tempted to deplore the melancholy talents which Eschynes displayed in a bad cause. Through his flowing and brilliant elocution, we perceive, at every moment, the weakness of his materials, and the artifice of his lies. He gives to all the laws, which he quotes, a false and forced sense, to all the actions of Demosthenes a malicious and improbable turn. He accuses him of every thing, of which he is himself guilty; he reproaches him with being sold to Philip, whose pensionary he himself is; and the more he feels the defects of his proofs, the more he exaggerates his expressions, which is, in every kind of calumny, the method of detractors, who hope in this manner to excite in others an illusion which they cannot raise in themselves. With regard to Demosthenes, his cause was fair, it is true: what man, under an accusation, ever had a more beautiful one to defend? The object was to justify, in the eyes of all Greece, the opinion which the people of Athens had of him, and the recompense, so flattering and so splendid, which they had thought he merited. Moreover, he had in his favour the greatest of all advantages, the truth. He relates not a single fact without having his proof in hand, and every assertion is followed by the lecture of a public act, which confirms it beyond dispute. But, after all, he argued against envy, which is always so favourably heard; and he was obliged to act the part always dangerous of a man, who speaks of himself, and who recalls to remembrance the good he has done. This was the greatest of all difficulties. We shall see that he knew how to overcome it. But it is just to recite, in the first place, certain passages in the discourse of his accuser.

Although he gives a very false interpretation, as it is always very easy to do, to all the laws with which he pretends to support himself, it was of importance to him, nevertheless, to establish in the first place, that the sacred respect which is due to the laws, ought, above all things, in a free state, to prevail over every other consideration. This is the foundation of his exordium; and this morsel is treated with a dignity and gravity conformable to the subject.

"You know, Athenians, that there are three sorts of government among men: the empire of one, the authority of a small number, and the liberty of all. In the two first, every thing is done according to the will of the monarch, or of those who have the power in their hands; in the last, all is submitted to the laws. Let every one of you then recollect, that the moment he enters into this assembly to judge of the violation of the laws, he comes to pronounce sentence on his own liberty. It is for this that the legislature requires of you this oath: I WILL JUDGE ACCORDING TO LAW, because it was sensible that the observation of these laws is the maintenance of our independence. You ought, therefore, to regard as your enemy whoever violates them, and to believe that this transgression can never be a fault of little consequence. Suffer no man to take away your rights. Have no regard to the protection which your generals too frequently afford to your orators, to the great detriment of the state, nor to the petitions of strangers, who, more than once, have intervened to save the guilty. But as every one of you would be ashamed to abandon in battle the post confided to him, you ought also to blush to forsake the station in which your country has placed you, for the defence of our laws and liberties. Remember that all your fellow-citizens, those who are present at this trial, and those who have not been able to attend, repose in your fidelity the care of maintaining their rights. Recollect your oath, and, when I shall have convicted Ctesiphon of having proposed a decree, contrary to the truth, and to our legislation, abrogate that unjust decree, punish the transgressors of the laws, and avenge and establish, at once, that liberty which they have outraged."

We pass over the juridical discussion, and the narration, as long as it is unfaithful, of the administration of Demosthenes, and come to the place where Eschynes flattered himself to have the greatest advantage. After the battle of Cheronea, the Athenians were so far from attributing the ill success of the war to the orator who had advised it, that they assigned to him, by a common voice, the honour of pronouncing, according to the custom, the funeral eulogium of those citizens, who had fallen on that fatal day, and to whom they had erected a monument. This appointment was glorious: Eschynes and all the orators had solicited it. The accuser, arrived at this epocha, recalls the memory of that in which Demosthenes had carried the resolution for the war, and collects, in this point, all his powers to overwhelm him under the weight of the public calamities.

"It is here that I owe my lamentations over all those brave warriors whom Demosthenes, in contempt of the most sacred auguries, precipitated into such manifest danger; and it is he, nevertheless, who has dared to pronounce the eulogium of his victims! It is he, who, with his fugitive feet, which served his cowardice in the plains of Cheronea, has dared to touch the monument, which you have erected to the defenders of their country! O thou, the weakest and most useless of men, when it is necessary to act, but the most confident when called to speak, have you the effrontery to maintain, in presence of our judges, that you have merited a Crown? And, if he dares to say it, will you, Athenians, support him in it? Can this impostor take away your judgments and memories, as he has taken the lives of his fellow-citizens? Transport yourselves for a moment, in imagination, to this assembly at the theatre: behold the herald advance, and hear him pronounce the decree of Ctesiphon; represent to yourselves the tears which will then flow from the relations of all those illustrious deceased, not for the misfortunes of the heroes of our tragedies, but for their own calamities, and your infatuation. Who is there among the Greeks, who has received any education, who is there that will not groan, when he recollects what passed heretofore upon the same theatre, in happier times, when the republic was better governed? Then the herald, pointing out to the people the children of those parents, who had perished in battle, invested them with glorious armour, while he pronounced these words, at once the eulogium and the encouragement of virtue—"these children, whose fathers died courageously for their country, have been educated at the expense of the state, till the age of puberty: at this day their country furnishes them with the armour of warriors, and places them in the first rank in the spectacles." This was heard formerly; but what will occur at this day? What will the herald say, when he shall be obliged to produce in public, and in presence of these same children, the man who has rendered them orphans? If he pronounces the words which compose the decree of Ctesiphon, do you believe that his voice will suffice the truth, and conceal our shame? Do you believe, that they will not answer, by a general acclamation, that this man (if, indeed, a coward can merit the name), that this man, whom they crown for his virtue, is, in fact, a pernicious citizen, that he, whom they crown for his services, has betrayed his country, both in the tribune and in battle? Ah! by all the gods, Athenians, do not offer this affront to yourselves; erect not upon the theatre a trophy so injurious to yourselves; expose not Athens to the ridicule of Greece, and open not the wounds of your unfortunate allies, the Thebans, whom you have received within your walls exiles and fugitives, by the fault of Demosthenes, whose venal eloquence has destroyed their temples and monuments. Recollect all the evils they have suffered; behold the old men in tears, and the widows in despair, compelled, for life, to forget that they have been free, reproaching you with filling up the measure of their misery, instead of avenging them; conjuring you not to crown, in Demosthenes, their destroyer, and the scourge of Greece, and to guard yourselves against the influence of this sinister Genius, who has destroyed all those who have been unfortunate enough to abandon themselves to his counsels. What! when one of the pilots, who transports you from the Piræum to the Salamine, has had the misfortune to strike upon the rocks, even when it is not his fault, you forbid him, by law, forever after to conduct a ship, you will not allow him a second time to put the lives of Greeks in danger, and will you permit him, who has caused the ruin of all the Greeks, and yours with theirs, to continue to govern you?"

It cannot be denied that this passage presents a contrast aptly imagined. The orator exerts himself as well as possible to render his adversary odious and unpopular. He calls around the tribunal the ghosts of those unfortunate citizens, and places them between the people and Demosthenes; he invests him with these avenging apparitions, and forms them into a rampart round about him, which he seems to forbid him to break through. Very well! This is the place in which Demosthenes will overwhelm him, as soon as he resumes the argument. He will destroy, with a single phrase, all this apparatus of mourning and vengeance, which his rival had erected against him.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Neufchatel, Oct. 26, 1800.

My Dear Sir,

I do not know whether you will recollect, that the smaller cantons always possessed more of the spirit of ancient republics than the larger, which from various causes became, in a great measure, aristocracies, in their form of government. The general assembly to which the inhabitants of the former delegated their powers, both legislative and executive, and out of which the magistrates were chosen, was called the lands-gemeind, and had a president called the landammén. This body assembled generally in an open plain, where the affairs of the canton were discussed in the presence of their people.

When the French army had advanced considerably in Switzerland, and were marching to revolutionize the little canton of Schwitz, a meeting of this respectable assembly was called, to consult upon the best means of defence. Notwithstanding the insignificance of their numbers, the brave Switzers determined upon resistance, and nothing was wanting but a chief to lead all the men of the canton to battle, who, though few, possessed the true Lacedæmonian spirit, and were as resolute to defend with their lives, an Alpine pass, as Leonidas and his Spartans that of Thermopylæ. After some little debate they chose for their general, a young man of the name of Aloes Reding, who was much esteemed by his countrymen for his character and talents. This youth,* whose name deserves and will have a glorious place in the history of his unfortunate country, having some grounds to fear he should be appointed, had kept aloof from the assembly, and secreted himself in a cavern to be out of observation, and, if possible, to be forgotten for the moment. The Swiss peasants sent in search of him, discovered his retreat, and dragged him before the lands-gemeind, where he was saluted as chief. He rose and addressed the assembly in such terms as these: "My fellow countrymen, it was not from fear of marching at your head that I was absent from my duty, but the consciousness of our inferiority of numbers, which induced me to decline contributing to raise up your valour on such unequal terms; but since you will have me to be your general, you must swear that I shall run my sword through the first man that shall give an inch of ground." This speech was applauded by all present; they swore to obey him in every thing, and immediately ran to arm themselves with what they could find. You may easily conceive what a

* Every body is acquainted with the spirited conduct of Reding, last year, in his attempts to restore the ancient liberty of Switzerland, and the persecution he met with, in consequence of his brave conduct—my friend seems to anticipate the figure he made since he was in Switzerland.

figure such a handful of peasants would make, half armed, without uniform and undisciplined. They immediately took possession of the pass of Schendelieg, and waited for the French, whose number was eleven thousand, while they scarcely amounted to three thousand five hundred! Yet valour in the cause of liberty can perform miracles. They never gave way in the least, but died fighting man to man, and making a dreadful slaughter of their enemies. Finding them so obstinate in keeping their ground, the French proposed a cessation of arms, and endeavoured to persuade them that they only wanted to pass through this canton, and that their liberties should be preserved. The French general offered to sign a treaty with them, by which they should be permitted to remain armed, but to disperse to their houses, in which case no contribution whatever should be exacted from them, but on the contrary, they should be protected. This agreement was signed on the spot, and the credulous Swiss, relying upon the faith of a perfidious general, retired quietly to their houses. The next day the French entered the canton, attacked them separately, disarmed every man, and levied a heavy contribution on the poor peasants, whose only fault was a reliance upon a solemn compact.

I do not recollect the name of the French general, but this shameful transaction will reflect eternal disgrace upon him. You may rely on the truth of the preceding anecdote, as Mr. B. had it from Aloes Reding himself, in a tour he lately made with the young — to the canton of Switz. He says that brave young man intends publishing an account of the whole affair.

This is one among a number of stories of the same nature, which I have heard in Switzerland. Never was a country under a greater despotism than this is at present. Every month brings new contributions and new soldiers to quarter; in short, there is an universal complaint of the distress which prevails every where, the destruction of commerce and manufactures, the poverty of the lower class of people, who want means to cultivate their ground, by which reason there is not a sufficient supply of bread, and the government, influenced by the French, dare not permit the importation, or rather the French, on whom they depended for supplies, do not permit the exportation.

The present government of Switzerland is merely provisional, and will be settled just as the French please to have it. The legislative body consists of forty-two or forty-three members, and the executive of seven, one of whom is president of the whole; but this is merely a nominal government, for they can do no earthly thing which is contrary to the wishes of the French minister. The people feel and appear miserable, and desponding. Society, which was once upon so excellent a footing that strangers from every part of Europe resorted to it, and most of the pleasant towns on the borders of the lake of Geneva, could boast of the residence of an illustrious foreigner, is now scarcely known. The scene is quite changed, and a stranger is mortified at the little welcome he receives; and if he does gain admission into a family, not entirely broken hearted, he hears nothing but mournful complaints, and desponding exclamations. Traveling, and living in Switzerland, which was never very cheap, are now half as expensive again, and, till peace restores every thing to its former state, must become still dearer.

It is universally agreed here, that had the cantons been united, and free from the jealousies and private piques, which unfortunately existed among them, they could have made a formidable, if not an effectual resistance to their invaders and oppressors. One hundred and twenty thousand men, which they could have brought to their frontier, would have changed the whole face of the war, and in all probability, might have produced a peace long ago. But alas! the intriguing spirit of their enemies, who knew how to sow divisions among them by means of their emissaries, has proved their destruction; and the boasted liberty and patriotism of Switzerland, held up as examples to mankind for so many ages, have turned out to be mere shadows, and, if they ever existed, were confined to the smaller cantons, among whose scanty vallies and inaccessible mountains only, independence appears to have taken up her abode. For though the small cantons have been overpowered, they cannot be said to be conquered; and, however paradoxical it may appear, though bound with strong fetters, they are still free.

Prefects, commissaries, and municipalities, have usurped the place of the ancient magistracy, and there is little doubt that whatever forms the French may adopt, in the administration of their municipal affairs, the poor Swiss must humbly imitate their example.

Neufchatel is a small district, which united with another in the neighbourhood, called Vallangin, was before the revolution in alliance with the Swiss cantons. Seeing the danger that threatened them at an early period, they put themselves under the protection of the king of Prussia, to whose neutrality they are indebted for having escaped the disasters which have overwhelmed their greater allies.

The king is represented in this principality by a governor, who occupies the castle of the town of Neufchatel, and the expenses are paid by this district and Vallangin, as well as an annual contribution to Prussia. In the castle I saw the portraits of Frederick the great, his successor, and the present king.

The neutrality, and consequent tranquillity of this place, were the inducements which led Mr. B. to bring his pupils from Vevay, where their studies were continually interrupted by the military situation of that town, and the number of soldiers always quartered in their house.

Mr. B. told me he was intimately acquainted with Voltaire, Rousseau, and Gibbon, with the last of whom he used often to dine, while he remained at Lausanne: he mentioned several little anecdotes concerning these celebrated characters, which I found extremely interesting.

The town of Neufchatel is small but well built. It is principally supported by the commerce and manufactures of the district. Some of the merchants possess immense fortunes, particularly the principal one, Mr. Portaleze, who is said to be worth twenty millions of livres, or about a million sterling.

The chief public building is a new and elegant town-house, the erection of which is due to the benefactions of one of its inhabitants. Mr. David Pury was an orphan boy, who, finding his friends could do nothing for him, went to Lisbon, where he pursued the diamond trade till he acquired an immense fortune, and became banker to the court. In his prosperity he never forgot his native place, but as he increased in wealth, remitted money for the support of the hospital, and at his death, not long ago, at an advanced age, he left to the town of Neufchatel a million of livres, to be expended in public buildings. The present town-house was erected out of that fund.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM PARIS TO AMSTERDAM, IN THE YEAR 1796.

Rotterdam, Dec. 5.

We yesterday arrived here by the way of Leyden and Delft, leaving Haerlem and the Hague on our right. The seats and gardens that so frequently present themselves on the canals, led us to remark the rusty and unhealthy appearance of the bark, which universally prevails among their trees. This, united to the clippings and fantastic shapes of their shrubberies, and paltry ponds, reduce these expensive gardens to insipid parterres, instead of being the natural, lively, verdant, lovely retirements of pleasure, taste and fancy.

I spent a very agreeable evening on the Bomes, at Mr. Beeldemerker's, a merchant of extensive dealings, and the American agent. The lady of this gentleman with her two daughters, both under the age of fourteen, spake the English, French and Dutch languages, with a most pleasing facility. And the father and his two boys, added the German, to the other dialects of the family. The relative situation of this country, with respect to Germany, France, and Great Britain, promotes as well as facilitates the acquirement of the language of each. The affinity also between the sounds of the English and Low Dutch, lead the common people to understand them, and the great intercourse which has so lately ceased between London and Rotterdam, accounts for our language being so generally known.

A practice which has been discarded these fifty years in other parts of Europe, still prevails in Holland, that of giving vales. The servant, therefore who attends you to the street door, always holds out his itching palm, on your departure, for his perquisite.

7th Dec. There are two ships of war building in the public yards, one a vessel of sixty-eight guns, the other of thirty-six. The frigate is nearly fit for launching. The heavy ship appears too short to sail well, but may serve for a Dutch line of battle ship. After visiting all parts of the yard, and the different work-shops, located in a large brick building, which extends the whole front of the dock yards, and is two stories in height, we spent some time in an apartment of one of the commissioners of the admiralty, who did not discover much disposition to answer the various questions I put to him, although he appeared satisfied that they were the mere dictates of curiosity, rather than excited by a view of catching any profitable knowledge, or obtaining any suspicious information. It seems that the crews of their men of war are fed with provisions furnished by the captain of each ship, who is allowed at the rate of six stivers per day a man, for that purpose. This officer is of course naturally led to create a profit from this privilege. The consequence is, that the men are badly provided, and of course dissatisfied. The fleet therefore is lying at anchor, half manned, and worse officered, while the English squadrons are sweeping the channel, and insulting the whole coast of their enemies, from the straits of Gibraltar to the mouth of the Elbe. There is another cause of discontent to the sailors; under the administration of their exiled prince, the fishermen and seamen found employment and good wages; without reasoning on the unavoidable change of the public circumstances, these people, destitute of national pride, and that vis feruida mentis which influences and inflames more vigorous spirits, hate the war, and ask for peace and the fishery. Can this be the country, of the Van Tromps and De Ruyters! Can one century have produced such degrading effects of avarice, and a phlegmatic love of quietude! that patriotism which in other nations stimulates to preserving the honour, dignity, and glory of the country, here is either not understood, or is contemned.

9th Dec. A fall of snow accompanied by a severe frost, has brought out the usual species of winter street gaiety. The ladies are all enjoying the amusement of sleighing, as it would be called in America. The lady sits in a snug little car, while a gentleman places himself on a narrow seat behind the machine to guide the horse, and a servant stands on the runners to protect the lady from the effects of the horses heels, who would otherwise fill the car with clotted snow, thrown up by his hinder shoes. The horse is decorated with different coloured worsted harness. Inconvenient as these little carriages are from the great number which are flying through the streets, the ladies must be very fond of this sportive exercise. The love of splendor, so natural to the female heart, and attachment to finery, which never fails to excite cheerfulness in women, may be the cause of their attachment, more than a relish for exercise, to this hazardous amusement.

The children also have their humbler cars, which are made large enough to contain two, and are directed by a servant who fixes his hands on the back and pushes them forward. There were more female than male servants at this business. This is an excellent way of diverting young children, giving them at the same time a seasoning of the weather.

Family horses are mostly black. There is economy in this, especially where a pair is kept. They are large and well proportioned. The mares of Flanders are proverbially fine: and it is from that country that horses of shew are principally purchased. The dray and working breed are very large, but they have a mode of frosting their shoes so high, both in summer and winter, that the animal must be greatly incommoded from being thus placed upon stilts. Another species of inhumanity very frequently occurred at Amsterdam. A barbarian butcher will tie two or three oxen to the railing of a bridge, or some other most exposed spot, where they are kept without food, until extreme hunger compels the beasts to raise a hollow bellowing. As soon as this takes place, it is considered as the signal for slaughter, and the knife soon puts an end to their sufferings.* By the shaking and struggle of the poor animal they say that the meat becomes more tender, and such is the unfeeling police of this city, that this infernal cruelty is tolerated, and the inhabitants very contentedly eat their beef on such terms! Luxury! What savage acts dost thou give rise to!

Fuel of all kinds, particularly of wood, is so scarce that the price is exorbitant. At Amsterdam, where the citizens, in time of peace, are supplied from the coal pits of England and Scotland, they are now necessitated to burn turf. And with all their economy, the consumption is immense, and excites the astonishment of the stranger, who, with doubting eyes, sees the inhabitants of a country, so flat and sunken as to be half the year inundated, and the northern quarter of which is several feet lower than the ocean which rolls on its beach, burning up the scanty soil which heaven has allotted to them! At Rotterdam they get an inferior sort of coals from Germany, and have some wood, but both are dear. The American, who has been always accustomed to large fires, and piles on wood with as much indifference as he would if trees were produced like grass, while shivering under the cold of December, is very apt to curse a country wherein neither solar, nor factitious warmth is to be found more than three months in the year.

* The boy and his bird, is another species of teasing torment; but here the parent is more to blame than the child. In the one it is indulged from thoughtlessness. The permission of the other ought to be charged to stupidity.

They continue, clandestinely, or in neutral bottoms, to export to England large quantities of cheese, and some butter. And a certain portion of British manufactures still find their way here, the prohibitory decrees of the convention to the contrary notwithstanding. These commercial interdictions, are, in this country, absurd ones, because they create more inconvenience to themselves than to their enemies. The latter may lose some trade, but the former are sacrificing their comforts, and conveniencies, on a very problematical experiment, and increasing the ground of that ill humour, which so generally discovers itself in a detestation of the war.

The city gates are always shut at an early hour of the evening. One reason assigned for this caution is to prevent the farmers from smuggling meat into the town, duty free. Provisions of most kinds pay a tax. The public exactions throughout the Dutch territories are various, although not quite so numerous or burdensome, as they are in England. Throughout Europe, the book of rates is a bulky volume. The million, in all countries, (our own excepted) appear born for little other purpose, than to work, vegetate, and grumble, and in this respect, the form of government, makes but little difference. Britons love glory, the splendour of which is to be acquired only by wars. Their ministers, therefore, during the present reign at least, have studied to gratify this godlike propensity. An English ambitious statesman has no dislike to an order of things which promotes his power. Battels, "charming battles," demand taxes and taxes encrease influence. Mr. Pitt commands the treasury, and rules the house of commons; and John Bull, goaded as he is, admires his talents, and wonders at his resources! On this side the channel the Hollander, in sulky silence, contemplates the loss of the colonies of the republic, the annihilation of the commerce of his country, and the degradation of its spiritless military and naval force; smokes his pipe, swallows his vapid and muddy coffee, and meanly hopes that the French will not resign them into the hands of the English, whilst the Frenchman, with the maxim of Horace engraven on his heart,

Carpe Diem
Nec nimium crede Postero

enjoys his weak wine, and bread, is content to laugh to-day without anticipating the anguish of to-morrow; fights or fiddles with equal spirit; and fondly fancies that renovated France like republican Rome, is able, and of right ought to govern and insult the world.

12th Dec. The canals being all frozen over, and such large masses of ice, made in the Maese, that Capt. Benson, of an American brig, with whom I had engaged a passage for Dover, subscribed to my opinion, that the time of his sailing ought not to be calculated upon. His owner, Mr. Calhoun, agreed to accompany me to Maeslandsluice, and try our chance for procuring a passage to Yarmouth or Harwich, by a licensed country Boat. We have been disappointed, but we have had an opportunity of seeing that place, as well as the towns of Delfthaven, Schiedam, and Flaarding.

Maeslandsluice lies on the easterly side of a branch of the river running between this town and the Brill. It contains four thousand eight hundred inhabitants, used to employ one hundred and forty sail of large fishing vessels, and carried on a beneficial trade with their late friends on the other side of the North Sea. It has nothing to excite curiosity. The inhabitants speak well of their * somnolent prince, and complain that nothing has gone well since his departure. I here met a confirmation of a former note on Dutch dress. At the house where we resided, there was a beautiful girl, possessing a face fair as Hebe's, every feature of which emanated health and loveliness. Tall, and with a form that might have graced a queen, had not her short petticoats, and most absurd taste for looking big, defeated the effect, and reminded you of a rose bud stuck upon a beer barrel.

Flaarding, is the next town to Maeslandsluice, and lying contiguous to the river, the inhabitants were almost wholly engaged in the fishery. They are now out of employment, and of course discontented. Numerous ranges of unrigged herring smacks were the only objects worth noticing.

At the distance of three miles you enter Schiedam, remarkable for its distilleries of gin. The inhabitants are said to exceed ten thousand, and they have upwards of two hundred distilleries. In times of peace and commerce, the exports of gin and herrings, rendered it one of the most flourishing towns on this noble river. The vast quantities of grains, which the distilleries discharge, are pumped into well boats and transported, by the canals, to the consumers, for many miles, in all directions, to feed cows and other cattle, who are fond of, and fatten upon this wet provender. The farmers' barns, which are all situated close to the canals, have their reservoirs purposely for this species of food, which is conveyed to them by spouts communicating with a pump fixed in the well boat. The being able to convert the refuse of their cisterns and stills to so profitable a purpose, must have been one reason for their extending the distilleries of this fascinating and pernicious liquor on so large a scale, as almost exclusively to supply all countries with it.

Delfthaven, also, had its share of the fishery, and is impatiently waiting for a general peace to again launch its many smacks into the Maese, and be enabled to change its pickled and smoked fish for tobacco and coffee, the two great articles of Dutch luxury.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE LAY PREACHER.

"Yet all this availeth me nothing so long as I see Mordecai the Jew, sitting at the King's gate."

Now, had he been sitting in sackcloth and ashes, or weeping, with his head covered, or "under the shade of melancholy boughs," or in any of the postures of grief and suffering, we should not be surprised at Haman's declaration of his uneasiness.

But at first view, it has a very odd aspect, that a Jew's seat at a gate should ruffle the temper of an Agagite. Whether Mordecai sat or lolled; whether he was upright or prone, most men would have passed by, probably on the other side, and said not a word concerning so simple a mode of being. 'Twas an ordinary every day occurrence; and one would suppose that the Medes and Persians, as they approached the palace of their sovereign, would have been so engrossed, by schemes to obtain court favour, that they would not have observed Mordecai, or any body else, in so idle a posture.

But, among that parasitical herd, which naturally watched the opening of the King's gate, there was one proud, and captious mortal, whose bad heart every random arrow could wound.

Shame on my feeble conceptions, and faltering pen, I cannot generalize the inimitable topics of oriental narration. To elucidate my text, "I must a tale unfold." Nor shall the story suffer from my unskillfulness; for it shall be told from the BIBLE.

In the annals of the princes of Persia, as partially detailed in the book of Esther, Ahasuerus in a fit of good humour after a sumptuous feast, promoted Haman, by allowing him to take precedence of contemporary princes, and enjoining upon the courtiers, obsequious homage to the favourite. This, it appears, was "capricious partiality to a new face," for there was nothing in this minion's character, that could recommend him to any patronage. A promotion so unmerited, though assented to, from selfish principles, by a complying court to no one appeared more absurd than to Mordecai, one of those refugee and unhappy Jews, whom the sack of Jerusalem had compelled to be a pensioner upon bounty, in foreign climes. Lynx-eyed to discern, and bold to resent, his spirit, like his body, was erect at the sight of Haman. Enraged at this cavalier treatment from an outcast and an alien, Haman seeks, not to privately assassinate Mordecai alone, but by a master stroke of revenge to sacrifice his nation. Artfully representing to his credulous master the dispersion of the Jews, their attachment to their own, and contempt of the Persian legal code, he obtained a mandate for their extinction. Behold Haman on the pinnacle of favour; the first friend of him, who reigned from India to Ethiopia, over an hundred and seven and twenty provinces. Every selfish, every malevolent passion gratified: selected from numerous nobles, and invited with his King to the banquet, which a humiliated princess prepared. "Be, ring these honours thick upon him," who would not, like Haman, on that favoured day, issue forth "joyful and with a glad heart." Who would suppose that such gaiety could be instantly extinguished, and that a check could be found in so rapid a career?

But, although the elated favourite, left his lodgings so cheerily, and took such lofty steps through the streets of Shushan, there was "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence" in his way, sufficient to prostrate his pride. For Mordecai, anxious for his countrymen, and eager to learn the success of Esther's intercession in their behalf, had posted himself at the King's gate, a station whence he could ascertain the transactions of the palace. The independent Jew, conscious of the machinations, and detesting the malignity of his rival, "stood not up nor moved" at his approach.—And what then, Haman, could "the tender fork of a poor worm" touch the giant to the quick? Was it in the power of a poor, and forlorn man, lying supinely, without the palace gate, to torment one, who had such free access within? Yes, it was in the power of Mordecai to mortify that pride, which was thy ruling passion. Even if it be the minutest molehill, whatever obstructs the course of inordinate affections, is a mountain in the way. Though the honoured Haman held the key of Mordecai's life, though his posts were flying on "young Dromedaries," with that barbarous decree, which would cause Jewish blood to redden every synagogue; and though his power would so soon be felt, he was wretched, unless it were acknowledged. In that torturing hour, all the plumes of his vanity drooped; the "ring" which his king, and the invitation to the banquet which his queen had given, were both forgotten. For "he was full of indignation against Mordecai." He dissembled his woe abroad, but it was that he might give it full vent at home. To his astonished friends and wife, after particularizing the circumstances of his opulence, his numerous progeny, his elevation, and the partial favour of Esther, in associating him and his prince, in her parties; he adds, yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai, the Jew, sitting at the king's gate."

Many eloquent divines, who have selected Haman's exclamation for their theme, have made the folly of his pride their moral. But the application, which the Lay Preacher wishes his readers to make, is the absurdity of being engrossed by any single passion. Whether a philosopher looks at the book of Esther, or the throng of men, wherever he discerns a being, intent alone to gratify the ruling propensity, he discerns a wretch and a criminal. He, over whom avarice, ambition or love, tyrannizes, is for the most part destitute of all pleasures. For common and cheap ones, "which come to all, come not to him." The acutest moralists TUCKER and PALEY, will convince any man, that the study of intense delights destroys a relish for the more simple. Pride will not meet continual homage, the exchequer of avarice cannot always be filling, ambition is sometimes denied "the highest seat," and love will not be eternally mutual. To every pursuit in this unlucky world a check is incident, and oftentimes, true to it, as the shade to its substance. I would not therefore advise tottering man to rest his whole weight upon one stay, lest haply it might break and pierce him. If Haman had been moderate in his desires, and taught himself to derive as much felicity from the prattle of his "children," the smiles of "Zeresh," the "glory of his riches" and manifold promotions, as from the obeisance of a Jew, he would not have smarted, though he saw an unmannerly Mordecai in every wicket in Shushan.

* The exiled ci-devant Stadtholder is entitled to this epithet, in more senses than one. The English newspapers, only, ridicule his corporeal drowsiness.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF THOMAS CHATTERTON.

[In Vol. I. of the Port Folio the reader will find a life of CHATTERTON, from the pen of Dr. AIKIN. This Biographical article, though very elegantly, was, perhaps, not very accurately compiled. It was not sufficiently copious; and it always appeared to the Editor, that, though Dr. Aikin is distinguished for his candor and urbanity of criticism, yet, on this occasion, he displayed an indifference, not to say an intolerance, towards the memory of one, who, with all his defects, is eminently intitled to the pity, as well as to the admiration of posterity. Of this wonderful boy, the ensuing biography is copious, correct, and just. It is complete and catholic. It exhibits all the evidence, respecting a far-famed controversy; it ably defends all the tenable parts of Chatterton's character; it exhibits a fair picture of his noble genius; and, in a spirit of candour, it presents every liberal and generous opinion, suggested either by an admiration of his talents, commiseration of his sufferings, and regret for his frailty.]

For the personal and literary history of Chatterton, 'the boy of Bristol,' the world is obliged to Mr. Tyrwhitt, the original editor of the 'Poems supposed to be written by Rowley,' 1777; Lord Oxford, author of 'Two Letters to the Editor of Chatterton's Miscellanies,' 1779; Mr. Herbert Croft, author of 'Love and Madness,' 1780; Dr. Milles, editor of 'Rowley's Poems,' in 4to. 1782; Mr. Bryant, author of 'Observations on Rowley's Poems,' 1782; Mr. Warton, author of 'An Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems attributed to Rowley,' Mr. Malone, author of 'Cursory Observations on the Poems attributed to Rowley,' 1782; Mr. Badcock, writer of the articles on the Rowleyan Controversy, in the Monthly Review, 1782; and Dr. Geo. Gregory, writer of the article Chatterton, in the fourth volume of the Biographia Britannica, printed separately in 1789.

The elegant and accurate narrative of Mr. Croft derives an additional value and importance, from being the vehicle of Chatterton's letters to his mother, and an interesting letter from his sister, Mrs. Newton. The laboured narratives of Dr. Milles and Mr. Bryant exhibit strong proofs of the temerity and credulity of the learned writers; but they contain something to amuse curiosity, and something to afford information; particularly the anecdotes furnished by his patrons Mr. Catcot, and Mr. Barret; and the intelligence communicated by his companions, Mr. Thistlewaite, Mr. Smith, Mr. Ruddal, Mr. Carey, &c. The candid and comprehensive narrative of Dr. Gregory, 'contains all the particulars which are known concerning that extraordinary character, collected in one view,' and form a valuable addition to the stock of biographical narratives, already in the possession of the public.

The facts stated in the present account are chiefly taken from the narratives of Mr. Croft and Dr. Gregory, with the addition of such particulars, as subsequent communications in that valuable miscellany, the Gentleman's Magazine, and other publications, have supplied.

Thomas Chatterton was born at Bristol, Nov. 20, 1752. The office of sexton of St. Mary Redcliffe, in Bristol, had continued in different branches of his family for more than 150 years. John Chatterton, the last of the name who enjoyed that office, died in 1748. His father, Thomas Chatterton, was the nephew of the sexton. In the early part of life, he had been in the station of a writing-usher to a classical school, was afterwards engaged as a singing man of the Cathedral of Bristol; and latterly was master of the free school in Pyle-street, in that city. He died in August 1752, about three months before the birth of his son.

By the premature loss of his father, he was deprived of that careful attention which would probably have conducted his early years through all the difficulties that circumstances or disposition might oppose to the attainment of knowledge.

At the age of five years, he was committed to the care of Mr. Love, who had succeeded his father in the school in Pyle-street; but either his faculties were not yet opened, or the waywardness of genius incapacitated him from receiving instruction in the ordinary methods, and he was remanded to his mother, as a dull boy, and incapable of improvement.

She was rendered extremely unhappy by the unpromising aspect of his infant faculties, till he fell in love, as she expressed herself, with the illuminated capitals of an old musical manuscript in French, which enabled her to initiate him in the alphabet. She afterwards taught him to read, from an old black-lettered Testament or Bible; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that his peculiar attachment to antiquities, may, in a considerable degree, have resulted from this circumstance.

On the 3d of August, 1760, when he wanted a few months of eight years of age, he was admitted into Colston's charity-school, in St. Augustin's Back, in Bristol. In this institution the boys are boarded in the house, clothed, and taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. The school hours, in summer, are from seven o'clock till twelve in the morning, and from one till five in the afternoon; and in winter, from eight to twelve, and from one to four. The boys are obliged to be in bed every night in the year at eight o'clock, and are never permitted to be absent from school, except on Saturdays and saint-days, and then only from between one and two in the afternoon till between seven and eight in the evening.

The first years of his residence at this seminary passed without notice, and, perhaps, without effort. His sister, indeed, in her letter to Mr. Croft, remarks, that he very early discovered a thirst for pre-eminence, and that even before he was five years old, he was accustomed to preside over his playmates. To the same purpose, it is said, that, when very young, a manufacturer promised to make the family a present of some earthen ware, and on asking him what device he would have painted on his—'paint me,' said he, 'an angel, with wings and a trumpet, to trumpet my name over the world.'

It appears from Mr. Thistlewaite's letter, published by Dr. Milles, that he formed a connexion with Chatterton towards the latter end of 1763, by means of his intimacy with Mr. Thomas Philips, the assistant master of the charity-school, who possessed a taste for history and poetry; and by his attempts in verse, he excited a degree of literary emulation among the elder boys. It is very remarkable, that Chatterton is said to have appeared altogether an idle spectator of those poetical contests; he apparently possessed neither inclination nor ability for literary pursuits, nor does Mr. Thistlewaite believe that he attempted a single couplet during the first three years of his acquaintance with him. Whatever grounds Mr. Thistlewaite might have for his opinion, Chatterton, doubtless, at that period, was possessed of a vigour of understanding, of a quickness of penetration, a boldness of imagination, far superior to the talents of his companions.

If he produced any compositions, his exquisite taste led him to suppress them. In the meantime, he was laying in stores of information, and improving both his imagination and his judgment.

About his tenth year, his sister informs us, he acquired a taste for reading, and began to hire books from a circulating library, with the trifle allowed him for pocket-money.

As his taste was different from children of his own age, his dispositions were also different. Instead of the thoughtless levity of childhood, he possessed the gravity, pensiveness, and melancholy of maturer life. 'His spirits,' his sister says, 'were rather uneven; sometimes so gloomed, that for many days together, he would say very little, and that by constraint; at other times exceedingly cheerful.' His intimates in the school were few, and those of the most serious cast.

In the hours allotted him for play, he generally retired to read; and he was particularly solicitous to borrow books. Between his eleventh and twelfth year, he wrote a catalogue of the books he had read, to the number of seventy, consisting chiefly of history and divinity.

The earliest existing specimen of his composition, is a poem called the Apostate Will, printed in 'Love and Madness,' which appears by the date, April 14, 1764, to have been written at the age of eleven years and a half, and was probably transcribed from the remains of a pocket-book, which his sister had made him a present of, as a new-year's gift, and which he returned at the end of the year, filled with writing, chiefly poetry.

This fact is a strong contradiction to Mr. Thistlewaite's assertion; but Chatterton might, at that time, exercise himself in composition, without being under any necessity of imparting his compositions to Mr. Thistlewaite or Mr. Philips.

At twelve years old, he was confirmed by the Bishop. His sister adds, that he made very sensible and serious remarks on the awfulness of the ceremony, and on his own feelings preparatory to it.

He soon after, during the week in which he was door-keeper, made some verses on the Last Day, and paraphrased the ninth chapter of Job, and some chapters of Isaiah.

The bent of his genius, however, more strongly inclined him to satire, of which he was tolerably lavish on his school-fellows; nor did the upper master, Mr. Warner, escape the rod of his reprehension.

From what has been related, it is probable, that he was no favourite with Mr. Warner; he, however, found a friend in the under master, Mr. Haynes, who conceived for him a strong and affectionate attachment.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Messrs. Conrads, of this city, have just imported, and propose soon to publish

The history of the life and age of Geoffrey Chaucer, the early English poet, including memoirs of his kinsman, John of Gaunt. Comprehending views of the progress of society, manners, and the fine arts, from the dawn of literature, in Europe, to the close of the fourteenth century, with characters of the principal personages in the courts of Edward the third, and Richard the second; by William Godwin, author of Political Justice, &c. 2 vols, 4to. illustrated with portraits. This work, which appears to be, for the most part, pure from any of the offensive doctrines of its author, is candidly criticised in all the foreign journals to which we have had access.

Proposals, are issued by Messrs. Hudson and Goodwin, of Hartford, Connecticut, for publishing by subscription, a series of papers which originally appeared in the newspapers, under the title of THE ECHO; with other fugitive poetical pieces. The work will form a duodecimo volume, probably of between three and four hundred pages; price one Dollar.

PUBLISHERS' ADDRESS.

To those who have read the newspapers for ten years past, the title of this work will be familiar. The plan of it was probably original. It was at first intended to ridicule the pompous style of writing, which many of those who contributed to the gazettes, had adopted. But, as the spirit of party increased in the country, and every thing became absorbed in politics, the authors happening to be of one sentiment, gave their pieces a political cast. Intimately connected with The Echo, were the New-Year's Verses, which appeared from time to time, from the office of the Connecticut Courant. As all these publications have appeared only in the perishable form of a hand-bill, or a newspaper, a wish has been often expressed, that they might be published in a more secure and lasting form. To gratify this wish, the authors have agreed to correct the various pieces, to add the necessary explanatory notes, to write one or two additional numbers to the Echo, and to have the whole published in a volume. Subscription papers will be sent to various parts of the country, and the work will go to press, as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers appear to defray the expense of publishing.

Messrs. SWORDS, enterprising and intelligent booksellers at New York, who are careful of the correctness of their press, as well as curious of the choice of fine paper, and the beauty of splendid type, have just published, in a handsome octavo volume, a fine edition of Dr. Darwin's "Temple of Nature." It is very correctly executed, and we mention this circumstance with emphasis, because a slovenly style of typography is too often permitted to disgrace the American Press; and we think the gentlemen concerned in the publication of the above work are not sharers in a negligence, which is the bane of literature, and the opprobrium of printing.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mrs. Griffith very pertinently remarks that SHAKESPEARE abounds in reflections upon the instability of popular favour. One of the similes by which he expresses himself, is admirably suited to the occasion.

— This common body
Like to a vagabond flag upon the stream,
Goes to and back laqueying the varying tide,
To rot itself with motion.

ANDISON, very poignantly says of certain dull Sectaries that they want parts to be devout, and could as soon make an epic poem, as a pertinent prayer.

Holcroft, in his recent travels, speaking of the national character of the French, introduces a remark expressed with much energy.

A people, whose temper is so restless, whose territory is so vast, whose power is so prodigious, whose politics are so pervading, and whose claims to dominion, moral and physical, are so imperious, cannot but excite a general and pre-turbed state of emotion: there is an interest in whatever appertains to them; and however trifling the individual actions may be, those actions, as they relate to this mighty whole, connected with all they have done, and all they threaten, are full of portentous augury. We feel, it is true, on some occasions, a melancholy, and others a visible disappointment, while we examine the grains of sand of which the cloud capped mountain is composed; but astonishment returns, when we find its base immeasurable and its summit lost in obscurity.

In a book of travels through the United States we read the following merited praise of our hospitality to the stranger.

I eat my dinner in a log house on the road. It was kept by a small planter by the name of Homer. Such a tavern would have raised the thunder and lightning of anger in the page of my brother travellers in America. But the lamented scarcity of American inns is easily accounted for. In a country, where every private house is a temple, dedicated to hospitality, and open alike to travellers of every description, ought it to excite surprise that so few good taverns are to be found. When, therefore, the travellers through the United States, curse in their pages of calamity, the mosquitoes, and fleas, and bugs, and ticks, that interrupt their slumbers, they make the eulogium of American hospitality.

Lord Chancellor More, thought a man making choice of a wife, was like one, who thrusts his hand into a bag of snakes, with the hope of bringing out a single eel, that chanced to be in it. He might, says he, happen to light upon the eel, but it is an hundred to one but he is stung by a snake.

We mentioned, some time since, that Mr. Rusher, of Banbury, had invented a new species of types, for which he had obtained a patent. Mr. Rusher has since been engaged in carrying his invention into practice and he will shortly publish with his new types, an edition of Dr. Johnson's Rasselas.

[Lond. Mo. Mag.]

Dr. Carey's "Skeleton of the Latin Accidence," say the editors of the Monthly Magazine, is an ingenious and elegant little manual, attractive to the young learner, by its brevity and compressed form, and highly advantageous to him by its perspicuity. It consists of a single folding sheet, divided into eight tables, of which the declensions, adjectives, and pronouns, occupy the first three, and the conjugations the remaining five, while by the discriminate use of the hyphen, and the italic characters in conjunction with the Roman, the radical letters, the variable increment, and the invariable termination are distinctly pointed out; though more distinctly still by the additional introduction of the coloured lines.

In a very respectable British magazine for January 1804, we perceive, with pleasure, that honourable mention is made of Mr. CHARLES B. BROWN, an ingenious author, who by his 'Wieland,' 'Edgar Huntley,' 'Arthur Mervyn,' &c. has attracted the regard of those readers, who have a taste for a purer style of English composition, than is common in this gothic country.

'The Algerine Captive,' a well written novel, the production of an American, and a favourite friend of the Editor of the Port Folio, is commended in all the literary journals of Great Britain. It must be truly grateful, it must be a soothing triumph to the ingenious author to learn that his book is perused in the country of his ancestors. In his native country, his motley fellow citizens were too much occupied in the shallow devices of an infamous democracy, and in perusing, with the eagerness of Shylock, 'the bond, the bond.'

These are, say the British reviewers, the real adventures of an American physician, and are told with uncommon spirit and animation. We meet with much curious information respecting the Algerines. This publication yields much instruction as well as entertainment. The reviewers then extract the whole chapter, in which Dr. Underhill so sarcastically describes the miserable servitude of a schoolmaster, in our new, barbarous, and ungrateful republic, and they add, very truly, that it will impart some idea of the troublesome nature of the office in the new world.

In addressing a volunteer corps in Wales last week, the worthy Clergyman made use of the following language: 'But, neighbours, let it not be said that I, the Minister of Peace, am going out of my province to urge you to deeds of blood; or that, in a spirit of selfishness, I prompt you to dangers which I am unwilling to share with you. No! these deeds of blood are not of our seeking. If the ruffian banditti of France invade our free soil, we have no choice—we must defend ourselves, or perish. The brave seek not blood, but will shed the last drop of their own in the cause of their country. And I pray you consider me not in the light of one who, urging you to deeds of valour means himself, on the approach of danger, to retire in safety by favour of your arms; I have no such intention believe me. My professional engagements forbid me now to take upon me the character and occupation of a soldier; but my profession authorises me to exhort you to be true to your king, your country, and your God. When the land is once defiled by the touch of the French footsteps, that disability will cease; then it may be my duty to join you; then it will be my glory to fall with you, if fall we must; or to share the honour, happiness, and well-earned security, which I trust, is in reserve for us. and I urge it as my concluding request to you—to your commander—however numerous your enrolment, (and I hope it will comprise all who have the ability to march) however numerous I say your enrolment, I urge it as my most earnest request, that you will reserve a single musquet, and that (if no employ is allotted me wherein I can be more useful to my country) you will allow me to bear it in your ranks.'

London Paper.

Mr. Calonne died of a complaint in the chest—a very natural death for a Financier. ib.

FROM COLMAN'S NEW-YORK HERALD.

Having seen the following lines in manuscript, we obtained a copy for publication, trusting to the courtesy of the authoress, whoever she may be, to pardon the liberty we take. Our motive is to second the Muse in bestowing a just tribute to the professional excellence of a young artist, who has acquired a decided superiority over all his competitors.

To say he is successful in his likenesses, is only allowing him a degree of merit, common to many others with him. But for spirit of execution, sweetness and clearness of colouring, particularly in his female heads, preserving the effect without diminution through the highest and most exquisite finishing, Mr. Malbone certainly stands unrivalled in our country. We feel the more confident in pronouncing this judgment, from having lately seen the following high eulogium from the President of the Royal Academy. 'I cannot conclude,' says a gentleman in London, to his correspondent in this city, 'without mentioning to you the very handsome compliment that was lately paid to a young countryman of ours, by the celebrated Mr. West. Mr. —, whom you know, told me he was present when Mr. West, a few days since, observed to Mr. Monroe, the American ambassador, that he had seen a picture, painted by a young American artist of the name of Malbone, which no man, in England, could excel.'

Addressed to Mr. MALBONE, on his painting a miniature likeness of a friend.

Wilt thou permit an humble muse
To twine a transient wreath for thee,
Of lowly flowers, that sweets diffuse,
Though Fame's bright laurels brighter be?

Can I, unmov'd, gaze on this face,
Where life in ev'ry feature glows,
And still the lovely likeness trace,
Nor hail the Art from whence it rose?

'Tis her's!—that look of blended thought!
Those mildly-pensive, serious eyes!
And thou this fair enchantment wrought;
For matchless merit is thy prize.

Say, where's the artist who till now
To ivory cold, warm breath has giv'n?
Yet thou, immortal Malbone, thou
Can'st stay the soaring soul from heav'n.

No more let blooming beauty mourn
The stern, relentless hand of Time,
That many a fragrant flow'r hath shorn,
And op'ning buds, before their prime;

For thou can'st rescue from his scythe
Each winning grace—Thy pencil, true
To Nature's touch, gives speaking life,
And bids it flourish, ever new.

Whoe'er beheld thy rosy Hours,*
And could unfelt their beauties see,
The mind is his where darkness lours,
And his the heart that mine should flee.

May mem'ry to thy mind present
The PAST, with gentle, placid mein,
Where Hope, prophetic spirit! sent,
†Waving her golden hair, was seen.

And may thy PRESENT hours be bright,
As the fair angel smiling there;
Without a cloud to dim their light,
Without a thought that sets in care!

But, for the FUTURE—O! may they
Be crown'd with bliss, and wealth and fame,
And may this little, humble lay
Be lost 'midst songs that sound thy name.

ODE FOR THE NEW-YEAR, 1804.

BY H. J. PYE, ESQ. P. L.

When, at the despot's dread command,
Bridg'd Hellespont his myriads bore
From servile Asia's purpled strand,
To Græcia's and to freedom's shore—
While hostile fleets terrific sweep
With threat'ning oar th' Ionian deep,
Clear Dirce's bending reeds among
The Theban Swan no longer sung;
No more by Isthmus' wave-worn glade,
Or Nemea's rocks, or Delphi's shade,
Or Pisa's olive-rooted grove,
The temples of Olympian Jove,
The Muses twin'd the sacred bough
To crown th' athletic victor's brow,
Till on the rough Ægean main,
Till on Platea's trophied plain,
Was crush'd the Persian tyrant's boast,
O'erwhelm'd his fleet, o'erthrown his host,
Then the bold Theban seiz'd again the lyre,
And struck the chords with renovated fire:
'On human life's delusive state,
Tho' woes unseen, uncertain, wait,
Heal'd in the gen'rous breast is every pain,
With undiminish'd force if freedom's rights remain.†

Not so the British name—Though rude
Her voice to Græcia's tuneful choir,
By dread, by danger unsubdued,
Dauntless she wakes the lyric wire;
So when the awful thunder roars,
When round the livid lightnings play,
The imperial eagle proudly soars,
And wings aloft her daring way,
And hark! with animating note,
Aloft her strains exulting float,
While pointing to th' inveterate host,
Who threat destruction to this envied coast:
'Go forth, my sons—as nobler rights ye claim,
Than ever fann'd the Grecian patriots' flame,
So let your breasts a fiercer ardour feel,
Led by your Patriot King to guard your country's weal.'

Her voice is heard—from wood, from vale, from down,
The thatch roof'd village, and the busy town,
Eager the indignant country warms,
And pours a people clad in arms,
Numerous as those, whom Xerxes led,
To crush devoted Freedom's head;
Firm as the band for Freedom's cause who stood,
And stain'd Thermopylæ with Spartan blood;
Hear o'er their heads the exulting goddess sing:
'These are MY favourite Sons, and MINE their warrior King!'

Thro' Albion's plains, while wide and far
Swell the tumultuous din of war,
While from the loom, the forge, the flail,
From Labour's plough, from Commerce' sail,
All ranks to martial impulse yield,
And grasp the spear, and brave the field;
Do weeds our plains uncultur'd hide?
Does drooping Commerce quit the tide?
Do languid Art and Industry
Their useful cares no longer ply?
Never did Agriculture's toil
With richer harvest clothe the soil;
Ne'er were our barks more amply fraught,
Ne'er were with happier skill our ores, our fleeces wrought.

While the proud foe, to swell Invasion's host,
His bleeding country's countless millions drains,
And Gallia mourns, thro' her embattled coast,
Unpeopled cities, and unlabour'd plains!
To guard and to avenge this favour'd land,
Tho' gleams the sword in ev'ry Briton's hand,
Still o'er our fields waves Concord's silken wing,
Still the Arts flourish, and the Muses sing;
While moral Truth, and Faith's celestial ray,
Adorn, illumine, and bless a GEORGE's prosperous sway.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'Terrible Tractoration,' &c. a highly humorous poem, by T. G. Fessenden, Esq. will be noticed as soon as possible. We shall also add some particulars relating to the witty author, whom the Editor long since cherished as a companion, and admired as a man of letters.

'Jenny' writes with airy sprightliness, but lacks correctness, and has not read, or remembered the laws of composition. The Editor is sorry to reject the effusions of a pretty woman. Though as an Editor he is obliged to find fault with her pen, as a man, he can repeat with the swain of Caledonia,

'Bonny Jenny, blithe and free,
Won my heart right merrily.'

The remarks of 'G' are received. The author not only writes like a critic, but is punctual like a merchant. He contributes often to the solid and useful department of this paper. Youthful writers would do well to read his rules with undissipated attention.

The lady, who dates from —, is respectfully informed that her letter is gladly received, and its contents gratefully acknowledged. The Editor will shortly make atonement for epistolary silence. He will be happy, and his readers will be pleased, if the literary bureau should be unlocked, and the Port Folio be the future repository of her ready invention, and her elegant literature.

The hints of 'A cultivator of the Belles Lettres,' relative to certain new arrangements in the political and literary departments of the Port Folio, shall be attended to. We approve his plan, and shall meet his wishes.

We prefer borrowing from the European bank of poetry, to the free gift of such a wretched versifier as 'Sylvander.'

If the author of an indecent 'Fable' had taken the trouble to inspect the general contents of the Port Folio, he would have discovered that our pages are never polluted with obscenity.

The Editor announces farther improvements in the literary department of his paper. Analyses of American books, and critical remarks, will soon appear. He summons the Genius of his friends to his aid. His industry, when undisturbed by his feeble health, shall co-operate with their exertions.

He returns general thanks to a number of men of letters, who have recently enriched the Port Folio.

Well written essays on rural economy; concise notices of improvements in the useful or fine arts; topics of science, neatly and succinctly handled; sketches of tours through interesting parts of America; accurate translations from valuable foreign publications; dramatic dialogues, short and witty; articles of criticism, humour, and poetry; and political essays, or paragraphs, of point, sense, and spirit, will always be warmly welcomed, and conspicuously inserted.

The 'Verses from Violetta' are evincive both of the virtues of her heart, and the quickness of her fancy.

'Marcellus,' who writes with elegance, and who thinks judiciously, is a favourite correspondent of the American Lounger.

The proposal of 'Quip, Crank and Co.' to establish, in our paper, a literary auction room, must be rejected. We are willing to allow that their auctioneer might be Wit, but of that dangerous and unlucky race as would knock down Judgment to the best bidder.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. OLDSCHOOL,

In tumbling over some papers, I discovered the following splenetic effusion, written about four years ago, and was amused by a recollection of the sensations which produced it.

A.

A parting address to the inhabitants of the island of Elba.

A month I've been upon your shore,
And may I be condemn'd, no more
To know love's soft embraces,
If 'tis not my most ardent pray'r,
That I may ne'er have the despair
To view again your faces.

A dastard, swindling, lawless race
Are ye, of nature the disgrace—
At least such I have found ye;
Alike to honour lost and fame,
Devoid of virtue, dead to shame,
So fully vice has crowned ye.

Had justice here fix'd her abode,
From earth of crimes to drive a load,
By hundreds she'd have strung ye:
For me, the wretch whom most I hate,
I could not wish so curst a fate,
As damn'd to live among ye.

THE STYLE OF THE 16th CENTURY IMITATED.
Teneri sdegni, e placide e tranquille repulse.

If, shepherd, heavenlie beautye can thee move,
If gentle courtesie can charme thy mynde,
Let not thine eyes e'er stray to her I love,
O liste not to her wordes moste sweete and kynde!
Though sweete and kynde her wordes, and voide of arte,
Yet cold indifference dwelleth in her heart.

Dost thou admyre a looke both bryghte and meeke?
The starre of eve beams in her modeste eye:
Lovest thou the rose?—'tis on her blushyng cheek,
And lendes its honied fragrance to her sigh;
Alas! that she should sigh my payne to see,
Yet still escape from love's captivity!

O where can I, to shunne the archer's aime,
Flie from those charmes that have my peace undonene?
To wisdom's page?—No, wisdom fannes my flame,
And virtue sayes, thy faire and I are one:
Ah me! that hopelesse I am doomde to pyne,
To see those sweetes, yet may not call them myne!
O.

TO MY LOVE.

The humble bee hath homeward sped,
Long since, to rest from toil till morn;
The merry bat hath left his bed,
The shاربorn beetle blown his horn.

Bright Phæbe now, in solemn state,
Casts her mild radiance on the grove,
Where elfin bands expecting wait,
To hail the festal rites of love.

Blyth Puck hath chas'd the dews away,
Except some drops to gem the flowers,
Which scatter fragrance on the way
That windes among the fairy bowers.

Nor is a sacred place forgot,
Where no rude fairy dares intrude;
For thee, sweet love, I've deck'd a grot,
Embosom'd deep within the wood.

With myrtle leaves its floor is spread,
The emblems of my faithful vow;
The moss-rose blushes o'er our bed,
Yet where, Titania, where art thou?

OBERON.

Revenge, infuriate demon! at thy shrine,
By ruthless passions led, I bend my knee;
I woo thee, monster! meekness I resign,
And place each hope of happiness on thee.

What! shall the savage authors of my pain,
To whom my pangs gave undisguis'd delight,
Shall they exult still with malignant spite?
No! tho' my life should flow from every vein!

Enthron'd my soul in thy own stygian gloom!
Teach me to cry, 'evil be thou my good!'—
E'en tho' it pierce the heart of her, for whom
My own would once have pour'd its richest blood.

For thee all consequences I defy;
O give me but to triumph—and to die!
TROILUS.

"THUS WE LOVERS RAVE."

The maiden who shall love, and truth
Within this constant bosom find,
Tho' blest with beauty and with youth,
Yet has e'en sweeter charms of mind.

Although affection's warmest glow
Improve the roses of her cheek,
And sweet simplicity will show
The trembling love she cannot speak:

Although each grace around her flies
That can enkindle fond desire,
While the mild radiance of her eyes
Adds double fervor to the fire:

Yes, tho' in her all these I find,
Yet sweeter are her charms of mind. O.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[That passage in Swift's writings, in which a woman is compared to a cloud, must be familiar, not only to the literary tribe, but is perhaps frequently and cheerfully perused by the splenetic bachelor, who delights to depreciate property, in which, from inclination, or a better reason, he is not doomed to speculate. How far the Dean's simile may be deemed correct, I shall certainly not hazard an opinion, as I have not the presumption to stamp a character on those, who are said, by one writer, (who, to be sure, was himself an old bachelor), 'to have no character at all,' and who have been charged, by the learned and unlearned of all ages, with changes as frequent and as inconsistent as the shifting glass of the magic lantern. The Dean's simile, however, was suggested to a female, whose personal charms would fascinate those who should be ignorant of her mental attractions. She immediately returned the following lines, on the perusal of which, he, who should question her judgment, will cheerfully admit all her claims to a vivid fancy.]

Unfit to judge of womankind
Is he, whom prejudice doth blind,
And well 'tis known the rev'rend Dean
Was quite a victim to the spleen.
If woman like a cloud appears,
Whence come her gay and sprightly airs?
Whence all that cheerfulness of soul,
That doth the gloom of man controul?
Like the bright sun, her cheering smile
Dispels his care, rewards his toil,
While from her lips, love's tender theme,
Like Luna's soft enchanting beam,
Inspires his soul with rays divine,
That from her eyes resplendent shine,
And make those messengers of Love
Outvie the glittering stars above.
Thus in one being she combines
All radiance that celestial shines,
And proves, by thousands in her chains,
The conquest she o'er man maintains,
To whom, if not like light she be,
Dark—dark, indeed, his destiny.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SONNET.

Peace, ye sorrows of my soul,
While my much lov'd fair is nigh!
Cease thy trickling stream to roll,
Thou welling fountain of mine eye.

Hours enough to grief are paid,
Days, and months, and years of woe;
Oh then, while I view the maid,
Let me one short rapture know.

Ere my sun of love be set
Let it warm, once more, my heart;
Ere we part—no more to meet!
Let me dream we ne'er shall part.

I will hope, though hope be dead,
I will smile, though anguish tear;
Joy to day shall crown my head;
With the morning comes despair.

ITHACUS.

SELECTED POETRY.

THE HIGHLANDER,

A Pastoral....From Mrs. West.

My temper is ardent and warm,
I was bred on the mountain's rough side;
The labour, that strengthen'd my arm,
With courage my bosom supplied.

My virtues resemble a soil,
That boasts no improvement from art;
The offspring of nature and toil,
They glow with full force in my heart.

I have met the keen wind of the north,
When it brought the thick tempest of snow;
I have seen the fork'd lightning burst forth,
When the forest has shrunk from the blow.

To rescue my lambs and my sheep
The loud mountain torrent I've brav'd;
It was clamorous, stormy, and deep,
But the tremblers I happily sav'd.

I have climb'd to the top of the cliff,
Whose summit bends far o'er the main,
From thence I've look'd out for the skiff
Of the fisher, beneath me, in vain.

I have sail'd on the lake in my boat
When the west hath look'd dusky and red,
When the sea mew, with ominous note,
Seem'd to call to the feast of the dead.

From the hills the storm menacing howl'd,
The first thund'ring fell down the steep;
O'er the sky darkness awfully scowl'd,
And horribly roar'd the vex'd deep.

My vessel o'erwhelm'd in the shock,
I rose on the salt surge up-borne;
I swam to the caves in the rock,
And waited the coming of morn.

There, chill'd by the keen driving blast,
And drench'd by the pitiless rain,
The day has reliev'd me at last,
But the night never heard me complain.

I have pass'd o'er the mountain, which shrouds
Its summit in regions divine,
When the moon, sailing swift thro' the clouds,
Tipp'd with silver the arrowy pine.

Thus I meet the procession of death;
It pass'd me in shadowy glare;
Slow it mov'd to the valley beneath,
Then melted illusive in air.

POLITE LITERATURE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

But before we proceed to his answer, we ought to recite another morsel, in which, perhaps, there is more art than even in that we have just read, because it offers a very imposing foundation of moral and political truth, which is false only in the application.

"I ought to advertise, you, Athenians, that if you do not set bounds to this profusion of crowns and of recompenses, which you distribute so easily, far from inspiring with gratitude those whom you honour, far from rendering the republic better, you will only discourage the good citizens, and encourage the vicious. Shall I give you a clear proof of this? If any one should ask you, which is the most glorious epocha for Athens, this in which we live, or that which our ancestors saw? At what time were there the greatest number of great men, at this day, or heretofore? You could not but answer that we are inferior, in all things, to those who preceded us. Now, at which of these eras have been decreed the most crowns, proclamations, and public rewards? It must be acknowledged that such honours were formerly rare, and yet the name of virtue was much more truly revered. In these days you are prodigal of all things, and you decree crowns rather from habit than from choice. Do you believe that in the Panathenean Festivals, or in the Olympic Games, we crowned not the wrestler, who has the best contended, but him who has understood the best how to intrigue, there would be many wrestlers who would devote themselves to all the fatigues, and all the mortifications which this laborious profession requires. This is your history, Athenians. In proportion as you have accumulated, without choice and without discernment, you have had fewer citizens, who have been capable of meriting them. The more you have given, the worse you have been served. Compare this Demosthenes, who fled from the field of battle at Cheronea, to Themistocles, who conquered at Salamis, to Miltiades, who triumphed at Marathon, to those who saved and restored to the city our fellow-citizens, shut up in the walls of Pylos, to the just Aristides.—But I restrain myself.—May the Gods preserve me from establishing a parallel so shocking. Let Demosthenes point out one of these great men, who was ever honoured with a crown of gold. What then? Have the people of Athens been ungrateful? No! They have been magnanimous, and these illustrious citizens have been worthy of them. They thought that it was not by decrees that they should be honoured in the eyes of posterity, but by the history and remembrance of their great actions. They were not deceived, and their memory is immortal.

"Would you know what was obtained from your ancestors, by those who conquered the Medes on the banks of the Strymon? Three statues of stone, placed under a portico of Mercury. Go and look at the public monument, by which is represented the battle of Marathon: even the name of Miltiades is not there. It was permitted only that he should be painted in the front rank, exhorting his soldiers. Read the decree rendered in favour of the deliverers at Pylos: what was awarded them? A crown of olive. Read, in the next place, that of Ctesiphon, a crown of gold! Have a care, Athenians, one of these decrees annihilates the other. If one was honourable, the other is scandalous. If the first received a recompense in proportion to their merit, it is evident that this one receives a reward out of all proportion to his. And the man himself, what ought he to do? Appear before you, and say, it is not for me to refuse the crown which you offer me: but this is not a time for such a proclamation. It would ill become me to wear a crown on my head, when the republic is in mourning. This would be said by a man, who acknowledged the genuine virtue and legitimate glory. But Demosthenes knows neither."

It is melancholy that the art of oratory is here nothing but the art of calumny, which, by shewing only one side of objects, employs the name of virtue to combat virtuous men.

The two principal points treated by Eschynes, in the latter part of his discourse, expose to our view the terror inspired by the eloquence of Demosthenes. He absolutely insists upon prescribing the form of his defence, and that the judges should order him to follow the same order which he has pursued in his accusation. Afterwards he labours to prove, by all sorts of reasons, that Ctesiphon alone ought to defend himself, and that the moment he shall say, according to the usual formulary, 'Permit me to call Demosthenes, that he may speak for me,' the assembly ought to refuse to hear him. I own I cannot here recognize the art of Eschynes. His demand is disgusting, and cannot but hurt him. We should never demand what we are sure not to obtain. Was not Demosthenes attacked ten times more than Ctesiphon? On the other hand, was not Eschynes equally unskilful in betraying the fear which Demosthenes had excited in him, and in persuading himself that the Athenians would deprive themselves of the pleasure of hearing him in his own cause. Happily they had no regard to this awkward pretension. Demosthenes harangued, and it is time to hear him. Attend to his exordium.

"I begin, by a supplication to the immortal Gods, that they would inspire you, Athenians, with the same disposition towards me, which I have always felt for you and for the state; that they may incline you, according to your interest, your equity, and your glory, not to take the counsel of my adversary, to regulate the order of my defence. Nothing would be more unjust, or more inconsistent with the oath you have taken to hear impartially the two parties; which signifies not only that you ought not to bring here any prejudice or favour, but that you ought to permit the accused to establish, in his own way, the means of his justification. Eschynes has already in this cause advantages enough over me; yes, Athenians, and two especially of great importance. In the first place, our risks are not equal; if he gains not his cause, he loses nothing. But I, if I lose your good will!—But no—there shall not proceed from my mouth a portentous expression, at the moment when I begin to speak to you. The other advantage he has of me is, that it is but too natural to hear favourably accusation and censure, and to hear with pain and disgust those who are forced to speak well of themselves. Thus then Eschynes has for him all that flatters the most of mankind, and has left me all that displeases and hurts them. If, in the fear of this, I am silent concerning the actions of my public life, I shall appear to justify myself imperfectly; I shall no longer appear to be the person whom you have judged worthy of recompense. If I enlarge upon what I have done for the service of the state, I shall be under a necessity of speaking often of myself. This I shall do, with all the reserve of which I am capable: and all that I shall be obliged to say, O Athenians, I pray you to impute it to him, who has reduced me to the necessity of defending myself."

He takes care not to follow the plan of defence which had been prescribed to him by the artful Eschynes, who pretended to oblige him to answer first to the infraction of legal forms. Demosthenes was too able to fall into this snare. He was fully sensible that this juridical discussion, already very long in the discourse of Eschynes, would appear still more so in his, and that he should begin by fatiguing his auditory, and cooling his harangue. His essential object was to prove that he had merited the crown, and to conciliate his judges, in placing before their eyes all that he had done for the state. The painting of his administration, drawn with all the interest which he was capable of giving it, must necessarily aggrandize him in the eyes of the Athenians, by humbling his adversary, and place his cause in the most favourable light. By this he begins. But with what address does he conduct it! How perfectly does he know how to insinuate himself into the hearts of his audience! In rendering to himself the testimony which an honest man, under accusation, owes to himself, a public man, who gives an account of his conduct; how he avoids every thing which has the air of vain glory! He manages so well that he interests the Athenians, as much as himself, in his cause. He had to contend with self-love, of all judges the most difficult to convince or persuade. It is this which he gains in the first place. And if the rock which his cause had to avoid, was the danger of wounding this self-love, we must acknowledge that the perfection of his eloquence is in having known how to conciliate it to his party. It is always the Athenians who have done every thing:

his thoughts, his resolutions, have always been theirs; his advice has always been in harmony with their sentiments; he places his glory always under the protection of that of Athens. Judge then to what a degree he must please a people, naturally vain, and whether it is astonishing that he should have carried all the suffrages!

He has not accomplished one third of his discourse, when that of his adversary is annihilated: not the smallest trace of it remains; Demosthenes is in the skies, Eschynes in the dust; and if they had not desired to hear a man who spoke so well, they would have dispensed with his saying any more. This first part renders his apology so complete, places in so clear a light all the lies of Eschynes, and all the services of Demosthenes, that it seems as if the rest had been pronounced, not for the necessity of the cause, but for the vengeance of the accused. He tramples under his feet an enemy, who had been long since thrown to the ground.

BIOGRAPHY.

[We are convinced that the perusal of the very interesting biography, continued from our last, will excite the mind of every youth of genius.]

LIFE OF THOMAS CHATTERTON.

Mr. Thistlethwaite, in the letter already quoted, says that Chatterton informed him, that he was in possession of certain old MSS, which had been found deposited in a chest, in Redcliffe church, and that he had lent one to Philips, which he showed him, and which he is confident was Elenoure and Juga, afterwards published in the Town and Country Magazine for May 1796. 'I endeavoured,' says he, 'to assist Philips in investigating the meaning of the lines; but from an almost total ignorance of the characters, manners, language, and orthography, in which they were written, all our efforts were unprofitably exerted.' There appears good reason for suspecting some mistake in Mr. Thistlethwaite's narrative, either as to the date, or some other circumstance; both his mother and sister affirm that he knew nothing of the parchments brought from Redcliffe Church, till after he had left school.

Under all the disadvantages of education, the acquisitions of Chatterton were surprising. Besides the variety of reading which he had gone through, Mr. Croft remarks, he had some knowledge of music; had acquired a taste for drawing, which afterwards he greatly improved; and the usher of the school asserted, he had made a rapid progress in arithmetic.

An extraordinary effect of his discovering an employment adapted to his genius, is remarked in his sister's letter. He had been gloomy from the time he began to learn; but, it was observed, that he became more cheerful after he began to write poetry.

On the 1st of July 1767, he left the charity school, and was bound apprentice to Mr. John Lambert, attorney of Bristol, for seven years; the apprentice-fee was ten pounds; the master was to find him in meat, drink, clothes, and lodging; the mother in washing and mending. He slept in the same room with the foot-boy, and went every morning at eight o'clock to the office, which was at some distance; and, except the usual time for dinner, continued there till eight o'clock at night, after which he was at liberty till ten, when he was always expected to be at home.

Mr. Lambert affords the most honourable testimony in Chatterton's favour, with respect to the regularity of his attendance, as he never exceeded the limited hours but once, when he had leave to spend the evening with his mother and some friends. Once, and but once, he thought himself under the necessity of correcting him; and that was for sending a very abusive anonymous letter to his old schoolmaster, a short time after he was bound to him. He, however, accuses him of a sullen and gloomy temper, which particularly displayed itself among the servants. Chatterton's superior abilities, and superior information, with the pride which usually accompanies these qualities, doubtless rendered him an unfit inhabitant of the kitchen, where his ignorant associates would naturally be inclined to envy, and would affect to despise those accomplishments which he held in the highest estimation; and even the familiarity of vulgar and illiterate persons must, undoubtedly, be rather disgusting than agreeable to a mind like his.

Mr. Lambert's was a situation unfavourable to the cultivation of his genius. Though much confined, he had much leisure. His master's business consumed a very small portion of his time; frequently, his sister says, it did not engage him above two hours in a day.

While Mr. Lambert was from home, and no particular business interfered, his stated employment was to copy precedents, a book of which, containing three hundred and forty folio pages, closely written by Chatterton, is still in possession of Mr. Lambert, as well as another of about thirty pages. The office library contained nothing but law books, except an old edition of Camden's 'Britannia.'

He seems to have had a very early predilection for old words and black-letter lore. His sister relates, that soon after his apprenticeship, and some months before he was fifteen, he 'wrote a letter to an old school-mate, then at New-York, consisting of a collection of all the hard words in the English language,' and 'requested him to answer it.' He that could collect hard words for a letter, might collect old ones for a poem.

He had continued this course of life for upwards of a year; not, however, without some symptoms of an aversion to his profession, before he began to attract the notice of the literary world.

In the beginning of October 1768, the new bridge at Bristol was finished. At that time, there appeared in Felix Farley's Bristol Journal, an account of the ceremonies on opening the old bridge, introduced by a letter to the printer, intimating that 'the following description of the friars first passing over the old bridge, was taken from an ancient manuscript,' and signed Dunhelmus Bristolensis. The paper demonstrates strong powers of invention, and uncommon knowledge of ancient customs.

Mr. Ruddal informed Mr. Croft that he assisted Chatterton in disguising several pieces of parchment with the appearance of age, just before the Account of passing the Bridge appeared in Farley's Journal; that after they had made several experiments, Chatterton said, 'this will do, now I will black the parchment;' and that Chatterton told him, after the Account appeared in the paper, that the parchment which he had blacked and disguised after their experiments, was what he had sent to the printer, containing the Account.

So singular a memoir could not fail to excite curiosity, and many persons became anxious to see the original. After much inquiry, it was found that the manuscript was brought to the printer by Chatterton. 'To the threats of those,' says Mr. Croft, 'who treated him (agreeably to his appearance) as a child, he returned nothing but haughtiness, and a refusal to give any account.' He at first alleged that he was employed to transcribe the contents of certain manuscripts by a gentleman, who also had engaged him to furnish complimentary verses, inscribed to a lady, with whom that gentleman was in love.

On being farther pressed, he at last declared, that he had received the paper, together with many other manuscripts, from his father, who had found them in a large chest, in the upper room, over the chapel, on the north side of Redcliffe church.

When rents were received, and kept in specie, it was usual for corporate bodies to keep the writings and rents of estates, left for particular purposes, in chests appropriated to each particular benefactor, and called by the benefactor's name.

Over the north porch of Redcliffe church, which was founded or rebuilt, in the reign of Edward IV. by Mr. William Canynge, a merchant of Bristol, there is a kind of muniment room, in which were deposited six or seven chests, one of which in particular was called 'Mr. Canynge's cofre.' This chest, it is said, was secured by six keys, intrusted to the minister, procurator of the church, mayor, and church wardens, which, in process of time, were lost.

In 1727, a notion prevailed, that some title-deeds and other writings of value, were contained in Mr. Canynge's cofre: in consequence of which, an order of vestry was made that the chest should be opened under the inspection of an attorney, and that those writings which appeared of consequence should be removed to the south porch of the church. The locks were, therefore, forced, and not only the principal chest, but the others, which were also supposed to contain writings, were broken open. The deeds immediately relating to the church were kept, and the other manuscripts were left exposed, as of no value.

Chatterton's father, having free access to the church, by means of his uncle, the sexton, carried off, from time to time, parcels of the parchments for covering copy-books and Bibles.

At his death, his widow being under the necessity of removing, carried the remainder to her own habitation, where, according to her account, they continued neglected, or were converted into thread papers, till her son took notice of them, and carried them away, telling her 'that he had found a treasure.'

The account which he thought proper to give of them, and which he wished to be believed, was, that they were poetical and other compositions, by Mr. Canynge, and a particular friend of his, Thomas Rowley, whom he at first called a monk, and afterwards a secular priest of the fifteenth century.

Mr. Catcott, a pewterer in Bristol, having heard of Chatterton's pretended discovery, was introduced to him, and soon after obtained from him, very readily, and without any reward, the Bristow Tragedy, and Rowley's Epitaph upon Mr. Canynge's ancestor. In a few days he brought some more, among which was the Yellow Roll.

These pieces were immediately communicated to Mr. Barret, a respectable surgeon in Bristol, then engaged in writing the history of that city, whose friendship and patronage, by these means, Chatterton was fortunate enough to secure.

During the first conversations which Mr. Catcott had with him, he heard him mention the names of most the poems, since printed, as being in his possession.

He afterwards grew more suspicious and reserved, and it was but rarely and with difficulty that any more originals could be obtained from him.

He confessed to Mr. Catcott that he had destroyed several, and some of which he owned to have been in his possession, were never afterwards seen. One of these was the Tragedy of the Apostate, of which only a small part has been preserved by Mr. Barret. The subject of it was the apostacy of a person from the Christian to the Jewish faith.

Mr. Barret, however, obtained from him, at different times, several fragments in verse and prose, written upon vellum; and he asserted them to be a part of Rowley's manuscripts. A fac simile of one of these fragments, the Account of William Canynge's Feast, engraved by Mr. Strutt, is published in Mr. Tyrwhitt's and Doctor Mille's edition of Rowley's Poems. The hand-writing is not the record hand used in the fifteenth century. The Arabian numerals, 63, are perfectly modern, and exactly such as Chatterton himself was accustomed to make.

The friendship of Mr. Barret and Mr. Catcott was of considerable advantage to Chatterton. He spent many agreeable hours in their company. His sister says, that after he was introduced to their acquaintance, his ambition daily and perceptibly increased, and he would frequently speak in raptures of the undoubted success of his plan for future life. 'When in spirits, he would enjoy his rising fame, and, confident of advancement, he would promise his mother and I should be partakers of his success.'

Mr. Barret lent him several medical books, and, at his request, gave him some instructions in surgery.

His taste was versatile, and his studies various. In 1768 and 1769, Mr. Thistlethwaite frequently saw him, and describes, in a lively manner, the employment of his leisure hours. 'One day he might be found busily employed in the study of heraldry and English antiquities, both of which are numbered among the most favourite of his pursuits; the next discovered him deeply engaged, confounded, and perplexed, amidst the subtilties of metaphysical disquisitions, or lost and bewildered in the abstruse labyrinths of mathematical researches; and these again neglected and thrown aside, to make room for music and astronomy, of both of which sciences his knowledge was entirely confined to theory. Even physic was not without a charm to allure his imagination, and he would talk of Galen and Hippocrates with all the confidence and familiarity of a modern empiric.'

With a view of perfecting himself in the study of English antiquities, he borrowed Skinner's Etymologicon, and Benson's Saxon Vocabulary, of Mr. Barret, which he soon returned as useless, most of the interpretations being in Latin.

He was furnished by Mr. Green, a bookseller in Bristol, with Kersey's Dictionary, and Speght's Chaucer, the Glossary to which he carefully transcribed. These books, together with Bailey's Dictionary, which he studied very closely, supplied him with the language of Rowley's Poems. Whatever plan he adopted, he entered upon with an earnestness and fervour almost unexampled. Like Milton, he believed he was more capable of writing well at some particular times than at others; and the full of the moon was the season when he imagined his genius to be in perfection, at which time he generally devoted a part of the night to composition.

His Sundays were continually spent in walking alone into the country about Bristol; and from these excursions he never failed to bring home drawings of churches, or other objects which had impressed his romantic imagination.

His attention was not confined to the supposed Poems of Rowley: he wrote a variety of pieces, chiefly satirical, both in prose and verse, which he sent to the Town and Country Magazine.

One of the first of his pieces which appeared, was a letter on the tinctures of the Saxon heralds, dated Bristol, February 4, 1769, and signed Dunhelmus Bristolensis; and, in the same Magazine, a poem was inserted on Mr. Alcock of Bristol, signed Asaphides, attributed to him, which has been claimed by one Lockstone, a linen-draper in Bristol.

In the same Magazine for March are some pretended extracts from Rowley's manuscripts; and in different numbers for the succeeding months, some pieces called Saxon Poems, written in the style of Ossian.

In March 1769, he wrote to the Hon. Horace Walpole, afterwards Earl of Orford, offering to furnish him with some account of a series of great painters and engravers, who had flourished at Bristol, which, he said, had been lately discovered, with some old poems, in that city. His letter was left at Bathurst's, Mr. Walpole's bookseller, with an Ode or Sonnet, of two or three stanzas, in alternate rhyme, on the death of Richard I. (the era he had fixed upon for his forgeries) as a specimen of the poems which were found:

'Richard of Lyon's heart to fight is gone.'

Mr. Walpole had just before been made the instrument of introducing into the world Macpherson's 'Ossian.' A similar application, therefore, served at once to awaken his suspicion. He, however, answered Chatterton's letter, desiring further information; and in reply was informed, that 'he was the son of a poor widow, who supported him with great difficulty; that he was apprentice to an attorney, but had a taste for more elegant studies;' and hinted a wish that Mr. Walpole would assist him in emerging from so dull a profession, by procuring him some place, in which he might pursue the natural bias of his genius. He affirmed, that great treasures of ancient poetry had been discovered at Bristol, and were in the hands of a person, who had lent him the specimen already transmitted, as well as the pieces which accompanied this letter, among which was Elinour and Juga, 'an absolute modern pastoral,' as Mr. Walpole terms it, 'thinly sprinkled with old words.'

In the meantime the poems were communicated by Mr. Walpole to Gray and Mason, and these excellent and impartial judges, at first sight, pronounced them forgeries; 'the language and metre being totally unlike any thing ancient.'

THE LAY PREACHER.

"Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun."

The sensitive Gray, in a frank letter to his friend West, assures him, that, when the sun grows warm enough to tempt him from the fire side, he will, like all other things, be the better for his influence; for the sun is an old friend, and an excellent nurse, &c. This is an opinion which will be easily entertained by every one, who has been cramped by the icy hand of Winter, and who feels the gay and renovating influence of Spring. In those mournful months, when vegetables and animals are alike coerced by cold, man is tributary to the howling storm, and the sullen sky: and is, in the pathetic phrase of Johnson, a 'slave to gloom.' But when the earth is disencumbered of her load of snows, and warmth is felt, and twittering swallows are heard, he is again jocund and free. Nature renews her charter to her sons, and rejoicing mortals, in the striking language of the poet, 'revisit light, and feel its sovereign, vital lamp.' Hence is enjoyed, in the highest luxury,

'Day, and the sweet approach of ev'n and morn,
And sight of vernal bloom, and summer's rose,
And flocks, and herds, and human face divine.'

It is nearly impossible for me to convey to my readers an idea of the 'vernal delight,' felt, at this period, by the Lay Preacher, far declined in the vale of years. My spectral figure, pinched by the rude gripe of January, becomes as thin as that 'dagger of lath,' employed by the vaunting Falstaff; and my mind, affected by the universal desolation of Winter, is nearly as vacant of joy and bright ideas, as the forest is of leaves, and the grove is of song. Fortunately for my happiness, this is only periodical spleen. Though, in the bitter months, surveying my extenuated body, I exclaim, with the melancholy prophet, 'My leanness, my leanness, woe is me;' and though, adverting to the state of my mind, I behold it, 'all in a robe of darkest grain;' yet, when April and May reign in sweet vicissitude, I give, like HORACE, care to the winds: and perceive the whole system excited by the potent stimulus of sunshine.

An ancient bard, of the happiest descriptive powers, and who noted objects not only with the eye of a poet, but with the accuracy of a philosopher, says, in a short poem, devoted to the praises of mirth, that

'Young and old come forth to play
On a sunshine holiday.'

In merry Spring time, not only birds, but melancholic old fellows, like myself, sing. The sun is the poet's, the invalid's, and the hypochondriac's friend. Under clement skies, and genial sunshine, not only the body is corroborated, but the mind is vivified, and the heart becomes 'open as day.' I may be considered fanciful in the assertion, but I am positive that many, who, in November, December, January, February, and March, read nothing but Mandeville, Rochefoucault, and Hobbes, and cherish malignant thoughts at the expense of poor human nature, abjure their evil books and sour theories when a softer season succeeds. I have, myself, in Winter, felt hostile to those, whom I could smile upon in May, and clasp to my bosom in June. Our moral qualities, as well as natural objects are affected by physical laws; and I can easily conceive that benevolence, no less than the sun flower, flourishes and expands under the luminary of day.

With unaffected earnestness, I hope that none of my readers will look upon the agreeable visitation of the sun, at this beauteous season, as the impertinent call of a crabbed monitor, or an importunate dun. I hope that none will churlishly tell him 'how they hate his beams.' I am credibly informed that several of my city friends, many fine ladies, and the worshipful society of loungers, consider the early call of the above red faced personage, as downright intrusion. It must be confessed that he is fond of prying into chambers and closets, but not like a rude searcher, or libertine gallant, for injurious or licentious purposes. His designs are beneficent, and he is one of the warmest friends in the world. Notwithstanding his looks are sometimes a little suspicious, and he presents himself with the fiery eye and flushed cheek of a jolly toper, yet this is only a new proof of the fallacy of physiognomy, for he is the most regular being in the universe. He keeps admirable hours, and is steady, diligent, and punctual to a proverb. Conscious of his shining merit, and dazzled by his regal glory, I must rigidly inhibit all from attempting to exclude his person. I caution sluggards to abstain from the use of shutters, curtains, and all other villainous modes of insulting my ardent friend. My little garden, my only support, and myself, are equally the objects of his care, and were it not for the constant loan of his great lamp, I could not always see my way to a sermon.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM PARIS TO AMSTERDAM, IN THE YEAR 1796.

[Concluded.]

We agreed to wait at Rotterdam one week longer for a change of wind and weather, a Dutch skipper engaging, if he can procure two or three more passengers, to sail for Margate, and to send us an express as soon as the ice will admit of our getting to sea.

They have two curious ferries over what is called the Heads, that is, the entrances by which the Meuse supplies the water of the two great canals. The passenger is transported across in two minutes in a boat drawn forward by a small hawser, for which he pays a doight, equal to the fourth part of an English half-penny: Yet from the boats of such a passage the corporation derive considerable revenue. In no other country can you so cheaply rid yourself of street beggars. The poor Dutch supplicant expects only his doight, and that obtained he thanks and quits you. Is not the paltry value of this coin indicative of the frugality of the inhabitants, and a proof of what importance money is considered by them?

The numerous bridges of Amsterdam and of this town are of different constructions, in order to lessen the public obstruction as much as possible. The draw bridge admits square-rigged and other vessels. Those over the narrow canals have a single arch of stone, under which boats pass by striking their masts; and there are others, where by raising a hinged plank a vessel who has her rigging accommodated to this narrow opening, passes with the masts standing, and with very little impediment to persons crossing the bridge.

The houses are a little disfigured by a general adopted fashion of fixing mirrors 12 or 15 inches square, to the sides of the windows of the second story, in order that the persons within at some distance from the window, without being discovered, may observe what is passing in the street, which by this means is thrown into a pleasing perspective. It is not uncommon to see servants and inferior people on passing the houses where they are known, take off their hats, lest at the moment the master or mistress should happen to be contemplating the street glass.

16th December. Was I called upon to define this government, I would call it an Aristocratic Heptarchy, in which the people had no voice, and the hereditary magistrate no power—a motley machine of check, delay and imbecility. The act of union, ratified at Utrecht in 1579, was a compact of necessity, made when the Seven Provinces had just assumed independence and sovereignty, in the midst of a revolutionary war, and under the pressure of an embittered, sanguinary and haughty enemy. The then existing circumstances justified the measure, but it is now one of the worst among the bad constitutions of Europe. They have at length dismissed the pompous nothings formerly called their High Mightinesses, and may, from the enlightened systems which the present eventful century has given to the world, raise a political fabric suited to the genius and situation of their country. The uniformity of manners, the equality of condition, the love of money and attachment to commerce, so prevalent and so generally paramount to the passions, vivacity and vices of their ardent, heteroclitic French allies, all combine to point out a republican form of government as best adapted for Dutch habits and commercial policy; and could they catch some of that enthusiasm and persevering spirit which designated the first periods of their revolt, and establishment as a nation, it might continue for ages pure. They certainly appear better calculated to preserve a republican government, than the French, or even Americans. They appear to be but little actuated either by the vanity or envy which their ambitious neighbours discover: Content to be quiet if they are permitted to grow rich: And with as much sound sense as sangfroid, are perfectly willing to relinquish the triumphs of battles and blood to those countries which have the means and the madness to pursue them.

But let the social compact be formed as it may, it is of great consequence to them that Flanders should be restored to the emperor and king. Should a general peace confirm it a department of France, that republic will then bound on the dykes of Holland, and she will overawe the councils, and sometimes dictate public measures. At present her territories extend from the Alps to the Elbe, and from the Rhine to the Ocean. To the British nation, both in a political and commercial view, it is important that those Austrian provinces should revert to their former sovereign. Indeed the peace of Europe is in a certain degree implicated in the measure, at least as much as all maritime neutral nations are in the reduction of the enormous extension of the English navy.

21st December. We embarked at Maeslandsluice at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 17th, and sailed with 6 or 7 fishing smacks, who were bound to the Dogger Bank. Their voyages last about 6 weeks; the vessels have permits, but although they are easily obtained, and the English cruisers seldom molest them, few avail themselves of the benefit. We were gratified at seeing so many as 30 or 40 women assembled at the pier on so cold a night for the purpose of parting with their husbands, brothers or sons, to whom they were most cordially wishing success and safety. Affectionate simplicity, how forcible are thy appeals to the heart!

We had 13 passengers on board our inconvenient and dull-sailing bomb—Germans, English, Americans and Dutch. With a fair wind and moderate weather we averaged only 3 knots, nor could our phlegmatic skipper be prevailed upon to carry more sail. On the second afternoon we reached Margate, passed the lights at the Nore at 8 o'clock, and at 12 came to anchor off Gravesend. In the morning, after going through the usual scrutiny, we took a Gravesend boat for the purpose of viewing the river and its countless shipping, and landed close to London bridge at 6 o'clock, thus completing a tour which has yielded me great satisfaction. Late as I was in this ramble, it abundantly compensated for the fatigue. Manners do not change with seasons. It was the Dutchman on his native soil, and surrounded by his dykes I wished to contemplate. And although I should have preferred seeing him in his summer dress, I still found enough to smile, as well as much to approve, even in the winter garb of the country, and its cold inhabitants.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Lausanne, 28th October, 1800.

My Dear Sir,

When we quitted Neufchatel yesterday morning, the eldest of the two — (one of the most amiable youths I ever saw) insisted on accompanying us as far as St. Aubin, about four leagues along the lake; when he bid us adieu, I assure you I felt considerable regret at parting with him, as his engaging manners, and noble sentiments had endeared him to us even during our short-acquaintance.

As we approached Yverdun, we passed through the village of Granson, where there is an old chateau, celebrated for the resistance it made to Charles the Bold, who was defeated near it, and compelled to swim his horse across the lake. The whole road to this village lay along the foot of the mountains of Jura, but here we turned short round the end of the lake, and a few miles brought us to the pleasant little town of Yverdun, and a comfortable lodging in the excellent inn of the Maison Rouge.

We set off again early this morning for Lausanne, where we arrived about twelve. The first part of our ride offered nothing interesting, but as we approached the lake of Geneva we found the country well cultivated, and interspersed with hedges like the finest parts of England. We passed the castle of St. Bartholomew, which has lately been sold by the descendant of its ancient owners. Near the road is an obelisk which his father had erected, and inscribed on it the following sentence in four languages:

Praise ye the name of the Lord.

It having rained all this afternoon, we were prevented from seeing much of the town. It appears however to be very irregularly built. You will remember it was a favorite residence of foreigners, particularly the English. We saw en passant the house of Mr. Gibbon, who was partly educated, and spent the latter part of his life here. It is pleasantly situated, and commands a fine view of the lake, the mountains of Savoy, which rise from the water on the opposite shore, and the rich vineyards of the Pays de Vaud, of which Lausanne is, or rather was the capitol.

29th October.

We had several letters for this place, but we only delivered one, lest it should interfere with our arrangements in point of time—That was to professor Seenetan of the academy, who was very polite, and carried us everywhere. The terrace of the cathedral, the promenade of Mount Benon (which is a delightful one), and the high hill back of the town, on which stands the signal, afforded us some magnificent prospects—From the last place, we had a fine view of the rich scenery that borders the lake, gilded by the rays of a setting sun, and on examining each feature of this landscape we loitered about the signal till we lost, by the approach of night, the power of distinguishing objects.

The Pays de Vaud was formerly perhaps the happiest country in the world; there was scarcely a tree under which the peasants were not seen dancing to the sound of a rustic pipe. This was more particularly the case in the time of the vintage, when the vineyards were one continued scene of content and festivity. The town of Lausanne partook also of this gaiety, which rendered its society so desirable for a stranger. Its literary character was also great, and its trade in books is even now considerable—Some of the best editions of many French and English works have been printed here, particularly of the former, when the opinions contained in them rendered it imprudent to risk their publication in France. What a deplorable change now!—Strangers have little inducement to make a long stay, as they find the inhabitants sad and gloomy; rarely speaking on any subject but their own misfortunes, and eternally comparing their present with their former condition; those who formerly were the foremost in shewing attention, are now so much engaged in the preservation of their property that they find little time to devote to the entertainment of others; in short, we have found Lausanne, in the little time we have been here, what all the inhabitants say it is, an exceeding dull place.

The Pays de Vaud, of which you have often heard, is one of the best cultivated districts in Europe; I ought rather to say it was so, for every one tells me it is not like the same thing since the revolution. It then belonged to Berne, but since the change in Helvetic affairs, it has become independent, and is now the canton of the Lemman (or lake of Geneva). As I observed before, it is cultivated very much in the manner of the rich counties in England--At every mile you meet with a neat little village, and almost every field can boast its cottage. The wine produced from the district to the westward of Lausanne, is celebrated as one of the best in Switzerland, and is known by the name of La Côte. The district on the other side, as far as Vevey, produces the excellent wine of La Vaux.

In a gentleman's garden, we saw a Roman columna milliaria or mile-stone, and an altar, both of which have been dug up in the neighbourhood.

The town of Lausanne is built on several hills, about a mile from the shore of the lake; where are to be seen, I am informed, the ruins of the ancient Lausanne.

Bex, 31st October.

That we might see part of the country of the Vallais, and the salines of Bex, Mr. G. and I have undertaken a little excursion to this place; for which purpose, we left our carriage, baggage and servant at the Lion d'or in Lausanne, and set out in the carriage of a voiturier yesterday morning at day break.

Our road lay entirely along the shore of the lake to Vevey--the district of La Vaux we found very mountainous, and so rocky that scarcely any soil will lie on it; yet, such is the industry of a poor people that not a spot is left uncultivated, and the whole, to the summit of the hills, laid out in vineyards, which produce one of the pleasantest wines in Switzerland. You would be astonished to see the pains taken to secure the vines, by building walls every ten or fifteen feet the whole way up, to keep the soil from washing away, which however is not always successful, and I am assured that it is necessary to carry up fresh soil every year to cover the rocks on which the vine roots lay bare. Frequently did we see a small flat rock of scarcely twenty square feet area, walled in carefully, and covered with vines. Though these millions of walls rising one above another, present no picturesque beauty, yet they convey to the heart more delightful sensations than the finest landscape, by shewing the character of a people, industrious, hardy, and persevering, well rewarded by one of the richest productions of nature from her most sterile district.

We passed many little villages built on the borders of the lake, which, notwithstanding the evils of the revolution, presented the pleasing picture of happiness and industry. In one, we entered the church to see a Roman mile-stone, found there, which shewed that the place was thirty-seven thousand paces (or Roman miles) from Avanches, formerly the capital of the Roman province of which this formed a part.

While our voiturier gave bread to his horses, we had time enough to walk about the pretty, interesting little town of Vevey. Not far from thence we came to the village of Clarens, rendered of consequence by its having been made by Rousseau one of the principal theatres of the transactions in his Nouvelle Heloise. A little above the village is the noble chateau in which Julia is supposed to have lived, and opposite, on the other side of the lake, at the foot of the mountains of Saxony, are the rocks of Meillerie, from whence Rousseau makes St. Preux write in a state of mind bordering on despair, and hesitating whether he should not precipitate himself from them as from another Leucate. The scenery about Clarens is so accurately described that it is impossible to see it without feeling an interest in his story almost as great as if it was a real history, and not the romantic production of one of the warmest imaginations that ever existed. I could almost fancy the two lovers' rambles along the shore of the lake, and point out the path that conducted Julia from the chateau to the village.

A little further on we came to the castle of Chillon, built on a rock in the lake, near enough the shore to permit a drawbridge to connect them. This is also a place which, independent of its private history, has been rendered interesting by the magical pen of the Citizen of Geneva, who makes it the place of one of his principal scenes. As the road passed close by the drawbridge, we stopped our carriage, and asked permission of the soldiers who were lounging at the gate to see the castle, but they, being Germans, and not understanding French, we marched in without hindrance, and having crossed a court came to the apartments of the keeper, who was at dinner with some officers. At our request he accompanied us round this ancient building, which was one of most important fortresses belonging to the duke of Savoy, before the Bernois conquered the Pays de Vaud, and added the country on this side of the lake to the canton. It contains two courts, and has a number of apartments and galleries, with round towers at the corners, and a square watch tower in the centre. But the greatest curiosity is the extensive range of subterraneous vaults, partly excavated in the solid rock, which are used for prisons. In one of these vaults, below the surface of the lake (which washes the walls of the castle) the Bernois found Bonneville, the prison of St. Victor, when they took it from the duke of Savoy in 1536.

We soon after passed through Villeneuve, at the head of the lake, and entered a fine, well cultivated plain, shut in by high mountains. At Aigle we stopped to refresh our horses, and then pursued our journey to this place, which is situated in what is called the 'Government of Aigle.' The Rhone, which runs through this extensive valley, separates this government from the country called La Vallais. Since the French have conquered it from the duke of Savoy (or king of Sardinia) it forms part of the department of the Leucan.

MISCELLANY.

SKETCHES OF THE ENGLISH CHARACTER.

[By GOLDSMITH.]

IT is no unpleasing contemplation to consider the influence which soil and climate have upon the disposition of the inhabitants, the animals and vegetables of different countries. That among the brute creation is much more visible than in man, and that in vegetables more than either. In some places, those plants which are entirely poisonous at home, lose their deleterious quality by being carried abroad; there are serpents in Macedonia so harmless as to be used as playthings for children, and we are told, that in some parts of Fez, there are lions so very timorous as to be scared away, though coming in herds, by the cries of women.

I know of no country where the influence of climate and soil is more visible than in England; the same hidden cause which gives courage to their dogs and cocks, gives also fierceness to their men. But chiefly this ferocity appears among the vulgar. The polite of every country pretty nearly resemble each other. But as in simplifying, it is among the uncultivated productions of nature, we are to examine the characteristic differences of climate and soil, so, in an estimate of the genius of the people we must look among the sons of unpolished rusticity. The vulgar English, therefore, may be easily distinguished from all the rest of the world, by superior pride, impatience, and a peculiar hardness of soul.

Perhaps no qualities in the world are more susceptible of a fine polish than these; artificial complaisance and easy deference being superinduced over these, generally forms a great character; something at once elegant and majestic, affable, yet sincere. Such in general are the better sort; but they who are left in primitive rudeness, are the least disposed for society with others, or comfort internally, of any people under the sun.

The poor indeed of every country are but little prone to treat each other with tenderness; their own miseries are too apt to engross all their pity; and perhaps too they give but little commiseration, as they find but little from others. But, in England, the poor treat each other upon every occasion with more than savage animosity, and as if they were in a state of open war by nature. In China, if two porters should meet in a narrow street, they would lay down their burdens, make a thousand excuses to each other for the accidental interruption, and beg pardon on their knees; if two men of the same occupation should meet here, they would first begin to scold, and at last to beat each other. One would think they had miseries enough resulting from penury and labour, not to encrease them by ill nature among themselves, and subjection to new penalties, but such considerations never weigh with them.

But to recompence this strange absurdity, they are in the main, generous, brave and enterprising. They feel the slightest injuries with a degree of ungoverned impatience, but resist the greatest calamities with surprising fortitude. Those miseries under which any other people in the world would sink, they have often shewed they were capable of enduring; if accidentally cast upon some desolate coast, their perseverance is beyond what any other nation is capable of sustaining; if imprisoned for crimes, their efforts to escape are greater than among others. The peculiar strength of their prisons, when compared to those elsewhere, argues their hardness; even the strongest prisons I have ever seen in other countries would be very insufficient to confine the untameable spirit of an Englishman. In short, what man dares do in circumstances of danger, an Englishman will. His virtues seem to sleep in the calm, and are called out only to combat the kindred storm.

But the greatest eulogy of this people is the generosity of their miscreants: The tenderness in general of their robbers and highwaymen. Perhaps no people can produce instances of the same kind, where the desperate mix pity with injustice; still showing that they understand a distinction in crimes, and even in acts of violence have still some tincture of remaining virtue. In every other country robbery and murder go almost always together; here it seldom happens, except upon ill judged resistance or pursuit. The banditti of other countries are unmerciful to a supreme degree; the highwayman and robber here are generous at least to the public, and pretend even to virtues in their intercourse among each other. Taking, therefore, my opinion of the English from the virtues and vices practised amongst the vulgar, they at once present to a stranger all their faults, and keep their virtues up only for the inquiring eye of a philosopher.

Foreigners are generally shocked at their insolence upon first coming among them: they find themselves ridiculed and insulted in every street; they meet with none of those trifling civilities so frequent elsewhere, which are instances of mutual good will, without previous acquaintance; they travel through the country, either too ignorant or too obstinate to cultivate a closer acquaintance, meet every moment something to excite their disgust, and return home to characterise this as the region of spleen, insolence and ill nature. In short, England would be the last place in the world I would travel to by way of amusement, but the first for instruction. I would chuse to have others for my acquaintance, but Englishmen for my friends.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, February 2.

Potter v. Barnet.

The plaintiff in this case is a dashing belle, in the suite of the Paphian Goddess. Being pressed for cash, she applied to the defendant, an auctioneer, for the loan of 250l. which he advanced to supply her necessities; but as he was too much a man of business, and too little a man of pleasure, to confide in the honour and punctuality of our British Aspasia, he had a bond of the lady, with a warrant of attorney, to confess judgment, and also a bill of sale of the sofas, pier glasses, girandoles, &c. with which her splendid mansion was decorated. The auctioneer, it seems, had an eye to the profits of his trade, and lent this money in the hope that all these effects would pass under his own hammer. The lady, however, had no such design; she had answered her immediate purposes, and for her less pressing exigencies, she trusted to the politeness and liberality of Col. —, who was at Newmarket. To this gentleman she imparted her painful situation, which the confidence of friendship could alone permit her to disclose. The colonel flew to her relief on the wings of love, heard the painful story, wiped away the tear of affliction, and sent for the defendant, Thomas Barnet, to discharge the debt. A curious interview took place between the officer and the tradesman; the latter insisted on disposing of the property, or on receiving 50l. beyond the extent of the loan. The colonel was doubtful whether he should throw this son of Mercury behind the fire or out of the window. But love, which is drawn reposing on the paw of a lion, soothed his indignation, and he paid 300l. which was the sum demanded.

This action was brought to recover the difference between the amount of the loan, with the expences upon it, and the sum extorted by the defendant.

Messrs. Erskine and Espinasse adduced evidence to prove the material facts, and contended, that the bill of sale was merely a security, and was not to be considered as indicating any bona fide transaction, of which the defendant could avail himself, as a ground of retaining the sum he had received above the original demand.

Mr. Garrow, for the defendant, argued, that a sale of the effects appeared on the face of the instrument, and that the defendant had a right to make whatever bargain he pleased for the resignation of the effects comprised in such sale. The surplus received, was, therefore, to be deemed the consideration for the surrender of his contract; and he presumed, that a little less Champagne, and a little more chicken hazard, would soon redress the inconvenience the lady had sustained.

Lord Ellenborough stated to the jury, that their verdict would depend upon their construction of the bill of sale, whether any actual sale of the effects were intended and made, or whether it were merely a security to which common prudence, under the circumstances of which a loan would induce a tradesman to resort.—Verdict for the plaintiff, 33l. 6d.

COWPER'S LIFE.

A very handsome edition of this celebrated work, written by the poet Mr. Hayley, has just appeared, from the press of Messrs. Swords, of New-York, together with a narrative of the leading events of Cowper's life. It comprises a large collection of original letters and poetical composition, from the pen of this inimitable writer. To the admirers of the Task, this work will prove a literary feast. It presents the amiable though unfortunate bard, in a new, but truly interesting light. To behold a mind of such uncommon powers beclouded, and sinking under the pressure of religious melancholy—often cheered by the consolations of affectionate friendship, but as often the prey of hopeless despondency—a heart filled with the 'milk of human kindness,' rent with the acutest pains, and anxiously wishing for the moment when it should cease to beat—is a sight calculated to awaken all the tenderest sympathies of the feeling heart.

Mr. Maxwell has in a state of great forwardness a very elegant edition, to be published for Wm. Poyntell & Co. of the Life of Darwin, by Miss Seward. This volume contains many curious anecdotes of Literature, and a very copious Criticism upon the "Botanic Garden."

Moore's Anacreon is likewise in the press of Mr. Maxwell and will soon appear in a very superb style. On the merits of this exquisitely elegant translation it is superfluous to enlarge, as the work is familiar to every polite scholar.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. Gifford's translation of Juvenal is thus characterised in the critical department of 'The Political Register,' a publication of great merit and authority:

It has long been a matter of regret, that the English language possessed no translation of Juvenal, which could satisfy the reader of taste. The translation which goes under the name of Dryden is unequal as all the others. Dr. Johnson, in imitating two of the satires, has given cause for regret that he went no further. Mr. Gifford has at length given to the world his translation of Juvenal, and has left little to be wished for. He has executed his task with fidelity and spirit, and generally with elegance. The notes and illustrations are judicious. A narrative of his early life is prefixed by Mr. G. and it is of a most interesting nature.

In his History of the reign of George III. Dr. Bisset, with great sagacity, has fairly developed the factious views of the Jacobin Junius, and considers him merely as an eloquent partizan of the Whig Junto.

Of a new poem, entitled Wallace, or the Vale of Ellerslie, the British critics say, 'It implies no little modesty and self-denial in a poet of so respectable a kind as the author of this work to have sent it into the world anonymously. The style of the lighter pieces is flowing and elegant; and those in which historical and traditionary circumstances have been mingled, are replete with fire and fancy. What Pope said when Johnson published his 'London,' the production he was told of some obscure man, we may venture to predict of the writer of these poems, he will soon be deterre.

Kotzebue has just produced another novel entitled 'Hell upon Earth.' We congratulate this German Jacobin upon his new proficiency in Self-Knowledge. The title of his book is a very appropriate one; and it would be Hell upon Earth for any reader of principle or taste to peruse a single page of this Teutonic stupidity.

In 'the British Critic' we find the following respectful mention of a medical performance by Dr. J. R. Coxe, of this city:

Practical Observations on Vaccination or Inoculation for the Cow Pox, by John Redman Coxe, M. D. embellished with a coloured engraving, 8vo. pp. 6s. Philadelphia 1802.

The author begins with giving the history of the discovery of the method of propagating the cow pox, as delivered by Dr. Jenner, to which he has added observations from a variety of other publications in England, and indeed in most parts of Europe, which he thought necessary, in order to give his countrymen (many of whom might not have an opportunity of procuring the works) complete information on the subject. We are then presented with the result of his own practice in vaccination, which appears to have been considerable, and his success equal to that of the most fortunate practitioners here, or on any part of the globe. It is remarkable that the disease is not known to effect the cows in any part of America. The same exemption from the disease is enjoyed by the cows in most parts of Europe, and even in many of the counties in this island. Though we consider the work before us as very valuable, and highly deserving of notice, yet, as we have examined so many publications on the subject, we do not think it is necessary to extend this article further.

Dr. Aikin has produced an ingenious little Sylva, entitled 'The Woodland Companion,' which gives a concise description of the appearance and properties of the trees and shrubs that most frequently occur in the woods and pleasure grounds of Great Britain. The trees described are thirty-three in number; its style is, as it ought to be, popular and of easy comprehension, and the whole is enriched with such entertaining remarks and poetical extracts, as the compiler's extensive reading has readily suggested to him.

Upon the truly important topic of Education, we are deeply indebted to Dr. Barrow, a late practitioner and veteran in the profession. This treatise pretends to no novelty of system and little novelty of remark; of the former we have had a great deal too much already, and of the latter a portion sufficient, if we would enforce the observations offered, but it gives us all that a treatise can bestow—a sound and discriminate judgment in which we may always confide—maxims drawn from the life, and true as the magnet to the pole—a chaste perspicuous style that conveys the real meaning of the author—and a manly, impressive ratiocination that alone delights and convinces us.

Pope has made the utmost advantage of alliteration, regulating it by the pause with the utmost success:

Die, and endow a college or a cat.

An advertisement in an Eastern paper, announces a Duke for sale. We were curious to learn how the Americans procured such an article and what was the price: But it seems that Mr. Samuel Chamberlain, the advertiser, who lives at the sign of the Blue Bottle, is only a Vintner, and not a Vender of nobility. For he gravely tells us his Duke is so prepared that half a pint or less makes a quart of good flavoured punch, without any other mixture. We conclude, therefore, it must be a Rum Duke.

Learning is like Scanderberg's sword, either good or bad, according to him that hath it: an excellent weapon, if well used; otherwise, like a sharp razor in the hand of a child.

In Great Britain, a man of letters is not considered ineligible to an office of honour or profit, and a remunerating and wise government are willing to reward scholars as well as statesmen. The following paragraph, from a London paper, records the promotion of an agreeable writer. How it would amaze our simple republicans, if a man of talents should, by a kind of miracle, be thought worthy of public favour.

James Cobb, Esq. author of several popular dramatic pieces, was yesterday appointed assistant secretary by the Court of Directors of the East-India Company.

Daniel Isaac Eaton, formerly a bookseller in Newgate street, convicted, about three years since, of publishing a seditious libel, and who was outlawed in consequence of not appearing to receive judgment, was apprehended on the fourth of November last, by Rivett, one of the Bow street officers, and lodged in the custody of the Sheriff of London.

[Europ. Mag.]

If we engage in large acquaintance, and various familiarities, we set open our gates to the invaders of most of our time: we expose our life to a quotidian ague of frigid impertinences, which would make a wise man tremble to think of. Now, as for being known much by sight, and pointed at, I cannot comprehend the honour that lies in that; whatsoever it may be, every mountebank has it more than the best doctor, and the hangman more than my lord chief justice.

PROGRESS OF LITERATURE.

The "Philadelphia Company of Booksellers," thinking that the growing interests of literature in this country have for some time required a vehicle to communicate literary information, as well of books already published, as of those contemplated to be put to the press, have commenced a paper, intitled "The Library, or Philadelphia Literary Reporter," wherein it is their intention to give notice of the volumes they publish, and of those, for which they solicit subscriptions. This paper will be delivered gratis to the patrons of literature, applying therefor, and paying the postage. Perhaps it is to be wished, that other Companies of Booksellers in the United States would follow this example; literary men would then be informed where they might obtain those volumes which they want. It may be proper to add, that it would be an useful extension of this plan to publish a catalogue of the new foreign publications of merit, which are imported into the country.

EPIGRAM.

From the Dartmouth Gazette.

Vermont, less wise than sister France,
And more than fifty times as odd,
In spite of Federalists and chance,
Has voted that she'll have a God;
And gravely fix'd her choice upon
'The mild, the modest Jefferson'!!

Mr. Elliot, representative in congress from Vermont, has given many proofs of his honesty and independence. Though professedly of the democratic sect, he has risen above the paltry spirit of party, and has, with meritorious zeal, defended the rights and interests of the small state to which he belongs. He opposed, by his eloquence and his vote, the destruction (under the name of an amendment) of the constitution.

[Bulance.]

Mr. D'Israeli remarks, that a person of true genius is soon placed beneath the level of equality among the frivolous, because talents give no real superiority among such associates; they are applauded rapidly from an old custom, but having been applauded without feeling, are as rapidly forgotten. The permanent interests of such a society consist in every thing that is the reverse of genius; so that a certain mark of mediocrity of talent is the pleasure which such a society affords.

In a letter written a short time before his death to Mr. Elliott, now a member of the House of Commons of England, BURKE, in a strain of indignant invective, extorted from him by the pusillanimous conduct of the crowned heads of Europe, in relation to France and the revolution, utters the following truths, which we think so beautiful that our readers, who now see the effects of the conduct of those princes, will join us in admiring them.

"Does any one think, that any servile apologies of mine, or any strutting and bullying insolence of their own, can save them from the ruin that must fall on all institutions of dignity or of authority that are perverted from their purpose to the oppression of human nature in others, and to its disgrace in themselves. As the wisdom of men makes such institutions, the folly of men destroys them. Whatever we may pretend, there is always more in the soundness of the materials, than in the fashion of the work. The order of a good building is something. But if it be wholly declined from its perpendicular; if the cement is loose and incoherent; if the stones are scaling with every change of the weather, and the whole toppling on our heads, what matter is it whether we are crushed by a Corinthian or a Doric ruin? The fine form of a vessel is a matter of use and of delight. It is pleasant to see her decorated with cost and art. But what signifies even the mathematical truth of her form? What signifies all the art and cost with which she can be carved, and painted, and gilded, and covered with decorations from stem to stern; what signify all her rigging and sails, her flags, her pendants and her streamers; what signify even her cannon, her stores and her provisions, if all her planks and timbers be unsound and rotten?"

Quamvis Pontica pinus

Jactas et genus et nomen inutile.

A poet hurts himself by writing prose, as a race horse hurts his motions by condescending to draw in a team.

Necessity may be the mother of lucrative invention, but it is the death of poetical.

One sometimes meets with instances of genteel abruption in writers, but I wonder it is not used more frequently, as it has a prodigious effect upon the reader. For instance, after Falstaff's disappointment of serving Shallow at court;
'Master Shallow, I owe you a thousand pounds.'

When Pandulph commanded Philip of France to proceed no farther against England, but to sheath the sword he had drawn at the Pope's own instigation:

'Now it had already cost Philip eighty thousand pounds in preparations.'

After the detail of King John's abject submission to the Pope's legate:

'Now John was hated and despised before.'

But, perhaps, the strongest of all may be taken from the scripture:

'Now Barabbas was a robber.'

[Shenst. Essays.]

Of Tom Paine, the republican, and renegado, the indignant Editor of the British Critic thus justly remarks—The name as well as the doctrines of this profligate impostor, are passing from general contempt into perpetual oblivion.

The English artist, who judged of Bonaparte by a look in the mouth, proves to be a horse jockey.
[London paper.]

Last night, at six o'clock, a large cargo of convicts were sent off from Newgate, in order to be conveyed on board the hulks at Woolwich. They amounted to about fifty, and filled two large tilted waggons. The confinement these wretched men have already suffered, and the punishment they have yet to endure, seemed to have made no impression on them whatever. One fellow, on ascending the ladder leading to the waggon, turned round, and, with the greatest coolness, said "Lord send I may see you again, Master Kirby, when I return!" [Id.]

OVID'S TOMB.

In digging the foundations of a fortress on the borders of the Liman, at the mouth of the Danube, some Russian peasants lately discovered a tomb, which the antiquarians of that country believe to be Ovid's. The reasons they give for this opinion, are, 1st. the city of Timé, the exile of that unfortunate poet, was situated in this spot: 2d, that it had been known for a long time under the name of Laculi Ovideti (lakes of Ovid): 3d, that they succeeded in finding a bust in the above-mentioned tomb, which, compared at Petersburg with the head of the beautiful Julia, daughter of Augustus, was found to possess a very great resemblance. Now, since Ovid passed for one of the lovers of Julia, it is very probable that some indiscretion of his drew upon him the anger of the emperor, a much more likely cause for the indignation of this prince against him, than the publication of his own poem on the Art of Love. Be this as it may, the Russians have bestowed on their new fortress the name of Ovidopol.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ADDRESS TO *****

On the Anniversary of my Birth-day, 1804.

Lo! the fair dawn emits its wonted beam,
 And o'er yon arch-cerulean lustre's gleam,
 Alternate seasons pass in swift career,
 And time, with silent speed, rolls on the year;
 But not to me returns the blissful ray,
 Whose soft effulgence wak'd my natal day;
 But not to me returns the peerless light,
 Whose hallow'd orbit shone serenely bright.
 Ah! who shall cheer affliction's clouded morn,
 And from my stricken bosom draw the thorn?
 Who shall restrain the gushing tides of woe,
 When tempests beat, and raging billows flow?
 What hand, unseen, shall mitigate my grief,
 Bind up my wounds, and minister relief?
 Celestial mercy pours the lenient balm,
 Controuls the winds, and bids the sea be calm;
 On this bright dawn maternal fondness smil'd,
 My pleasures chasten'd, and my cares beguil'd,
 Sweet counsel from my mother's lips I drew,
 And felt her precepts soft as morning dew;
 Her faith, her hope, her charity, her love,
 No heights could alter, and no depths remove.
 From spring's gay bloom she cull'd the fairest
 flowers,
 And ting'd with rain-bow hues the fleeting hours,
 Her's was the radiance that exhal'd my tears,
 The tender solace of my infant years;—
 Yet all are fled!—at thy supreme decree,
 My sainted mother breath'd her soul to thee;
 Her time, her talents, and her life were given
 To him who wing'd an angel form to heaven.
 Ye, who have trac'd the shaded path she trod,
 And mark'd her meek submission to her God;
 Ye, who have seen her ardent spirit soar,
 Where seraph's worship, and where saints adore,
 With you I lowly bend at sorrow's shrine,
 And ask your filial tears to mix with mine.
 Guide of my youth! to thee my pray'rs ascend,
 And in thy glorious presence, lo! I bend;
 When my lov'd parent gains access to thee,
 A portion of her spirit grant to me!
 With thee my solemn covenants are made,
 And all my troubled soul on thee is stay'd,
 Thou said'st 'affliction springs not from the dust,'
 Thy 'word is truth,' and on that word I trust;
 My SISTER's life was in thy holy hand,
 And all its issues were at thy command;
 Thy powerful arm sustain'd her drooping head,
 And round her pillow was thy glory shed;
 At thy decree 'the sun and moon stood still,'
 Thine arrows mov'd obedient to thy will;
 When thou ordain'st thy 'glittering spear to shine,'
 Ah, teach my heart its treasures to resign!
 Teach me to gain the path thy saints have trod,
 And centre all my soul in thee, my God! E.

THE CRICKET.

Thro' the curtains while the moon
 Faintly pours her feeble ray,
 And the cuckoo-clock chimes its midnight tune,
 And the distant watch-dogs bay,
 Then I hear the cricket cry,
 Chirping shrill and merrily,
 Cric, cricket, cric, cric.
 Thus, who would not waking lie
 To listen to the cricket's cry?

He whom pain forbids to sleep,
 Fever's fire, or tooth-ache's twang,
 Ague chills that shivering creep,
 Gout, or fierce rheumatic pang:
 Often while he wakes shall hear,
 From some hole or crevice near,
 Cric, cricket, cric, cric.
 And, perhaps, will soothe his pain
 To listen to the simple strain.

Me, when softer cares molest,
 Musing on my former loves,
 Or friendships of the youthful breast,
 Or thro' hope's bowers while fancy roves:

I love to hear the merry sound,
 Echoing from each corner round,
 Cric, cricket, cric, cric.
 Always, when I waking lie,
 May I hear the cricket's cry.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

When in thy brightest beauty clad,
 With smiles such as thou once did'st wear,
 Dim sleep has brought thee to my eyes,
 And love, exulting hails his prize;
 Too soon, alas! the vision flies;
 How soon 'tis fled away!

But when I view thee pale and sad,
 And on thy eye-lid hangs the tear,
 That mourns thy injur'd beauty's slight,
 That dream departs not with the night,
 It mingles with the morning light,
 And darkens all the day.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The charming apostrophe of Horace to his cup-bearer, has been rendered in the jocose and serious style by many an ingenious translator. Of the last class of versions the following, by Mr. Boscawen, is a favourable specimen.]

HOR. BOOK I. ODE 38.

PERSICOS ODI.

Away, my boy, with eastern state!
 The soft luxurious crown I hate,
 With tender fibres wove;
 Seek not the spot where blushing grows,
 With lingering sweets, the autumnal rose,
 Nor rob the fragrant grove!

No: let the myrtle's simple wreath,
 Whose leaves unmingled fragrance breathe,
 In artless beauty twine!
 Thy care the myrtle best may shew,
 Me best adorn, whose goblets flow
 Beneath the embow'ring vine.

This little ode was probably spoken extempore by the poet to one of his servants, and perhaps published to prove his readiness at versification on the most trifling occasions. It also affords a proof of his moderate and unaffected style of living, and his aversion to inordinate luxury.

The Canzonet, La Partenza, was written, says a current story, on the following occasion: A young nobleman, of very high rank, was so deeply enamoured of a beautiful young opera dancer, as to make his friends fear he would elope with her. It was Metastasio's office to prevent this evil, and, at their request, he wrote the following Canzonet.

THE SEPARATION.

Ecco quel fiero isante, &c.

Nisa, the dreadful time
 Is come to bid adieu!
 Nor to a distant clime
 Must I thy steps pursue.
 No hope will fate allow
 To soothe the harsh decree,
 Yet who can tell if thou
 Wilt ever think of me!

Let me, in volant thought,
 Ideal bliss renew;
 By reminiscence taught,
 I'll still thy steps pursue.
 Full in my sight, as now,
 Thy image e'er will be;
 Yet who can tell if thou
 Wilt ever think of me!

In solitary ways,
 While sorrowing I go,
 To rocks I'll sing thy praise,
 To echo tell my woe.
 The woods shall hear my vow,
 And zephyr bring it thee;
 Yet who can tell if thou
 Wilt ever think of me!

To scenes my restless mind
 Will ever have the clue,
 When time and fate were kind,
 And Nisa was in view.
 And these regretting, how
 From pain can I be free;—
 Yet who can tell if thou
 Wilt ever think of me!

Sometimes the fountain viewing,
 Where Nisa once look'd grave,
 Then, kindness sweet renewing,
 Her beauteous hand she gave.
 Here hope sat on thy brow,
 There fear no hope could see:
 Yet who can tell if thou
 Wilt ever think of me!

What votaries soon will crowd
 Thy shrine both day and night,
 Declare their suit aloud
 When I am out of sight!
 O heav'n! while there all bow,
 And bend the supple knee,
 Who, Nisa, knows if thou
 Wilt e'er remember me!

Think of the fatal dart,
 I evermore shall guard
 Deep rankling in my heart,
 Remote from all reward!
 Think, from my misery now,
 How wretched I shall be—
 But dare I hope that thou
 Wilt ever think of me!

THE SOLDIER'S DREAM.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ.

Author of the "Pleasures of Hope."

Our bugles had sung, for the night-cloud had lower'd,
 And the sentinel stars set their watch in the sky,
 And thousands had sunk on the ground overpower'd,
 The weary to sleep, and the wounded to die!

When reposing that night on my pallet of straw,
 By the wolf-scaring faggot that guarded the slain,
 At the dead of the night a sweet vision I saw,
 And twice, ere the cock crew, dreamt it again.

Methought from the battle field's dreadful array,
 Far, far, I had roam'd on a desolate track,
 Till nature and sunshine disclos'd the sweet way
 To the house of my father, that welcom'd me back.

I flew to the pleasant fields travell'd so oft
 In life's morning march, when my bosom was young,
 I heard my own mountain goats bleating aloft,
 And well knew the strain that the corn-reapers sung.

Then pledg'd we the wine cup, and fondly we swore,
 From my home and my weeping friends never to part;
 My little ones kiss'd me a thousand times o'er,
 And my wife sobb'd aloud in the fulness of heart.

Stay! stay with us! rest! thou art weary and worn,
 And fain was the war-broken soldier to stay;
 But sorrow return'd with the dawning of morn,
 And the voice in my dreaming ear melted away.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 89.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

As you have not scrupled to inform the ladies, your fair readers, of Florian's opinions, and as you profess yourself their friend and humble servant, you will be so obligingly impartial as to publish the enclosed.

TO FLORIAN.

SIR,

Your 'erudite' essays have long attracted the attention of Mr. Saunter's female readers—a number of whom, under the appellation of the Belles Lettres Club, have appointed me to tender you the homage of their highest consideration.

The infinite pains you are at to recommend yourself to the notice of the ladies, is evident in your laboured style—but we are not so temerarious as to determine always whether you mean to praise or to blame. This however may be less your fault than ours—readers who alone are enabled to estimate point lace, or judge of the trimmings of a cap, cannot be presumed to understand an author entrench'd in 'muniments' of learning so profound as yours.

But as we have a 'fervourous zeal' to profit by the efforts of your sublime genius—and as you appear to us rather to have been a pupil of Johnson, than of Addison or of Junius, our secretary has directions to place his Folio Dictionary on the table, when the Port Folio is to be our evening's entertainment. These remarks are, however, sir, not to be understood as altogether applicable to your last effusion, some sentences of which are suited to the meanest capacity. And although we must first wade painfully through a long circumlocutory preface, we develope at last that your design is to complain of the scantiness of our 'stock of ideas' and to propose to us the example of Mad. de Sevigne, 'who could philosophise in the morning,' 'and in the evening infuse life and animation into brilliant society'—Alas, Florian, our lovers and husbands are no Voltaires!—they have no particular value for a woman who reads 'Geometrical systems.' The former attach themselves to the fair and the fashionable—while the latter find their life and animation best promoted at the coffee-house or the club!

But there is another circumstance to be known, and which it is wonderful should have escaped an observation so accurate as yours—yet it is nevertheless true, that the state of society here does not admit of our forming an acquaintance with your familiar friends, Tacitus and Ariosto.

An American lady who aspires to be 'distinguished for indefatigable assiduity towards her husband and her children,' (and there are but few who have not such ambition) must philosophise with her servants in the morning' and in the evening—even in that short hour, while her right hand is engaged in refuting your visionary assertions, it is ten to one that her left is extended to quiet the prattle of three or four noisy inquisitive children. Our servants, sir, are the worst in the world—our husbands are more tenacious of neatness and good management in their families, than those of perhaps any other nation, and if you will add to this detail of causes, that they are men of business, confined to the office or the counting-house, while the whole charge of the house, table, servants and children, all, all devolve upon the careful wife—you, who are an able logician, and deeply skilled in 'infinitesimal calculations,' will not fail to conclude that it is not to us that 'science and the arts have enlarged their empire and indefinitely multiplied their ramifications,' and that 'the range of our ratiocinative faculties must be 'incalculably' limited. It is the misfortune of our moralists to be ever applying to us the trite remarks of European censors, without the discernment to know that they are not at all appropriate—Excuse me, sir, you have fallen into this very common error.

Yet although we confess we have not leisure to acquire a knowledge of Latin or Greek, that we have not taste sufficient to relish the harmony of Florian's numerous periods—or indeed the ability always to understand them—to the cosmopolite in spirit, it will be a consolatory reflection that we do make pretensions to 'accomplishments of a more solid or exalted nature,' nor are we absolutely destitute of literary excellence. We study eloquence in our native language. Every member of our club can at least read and write plain English, and perhaps our debates might afford some specimens of talents not very far inferior to those of certain modern legislators. We can order a dinner, or preside at a tea-party, as classically as ever it was done by a Carter or a Dacier. But, above all we delight to laugh at the affectation and folly of those pedants who presume to sneer at us in a jargon which neither they nor their readers can possibly understand.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXPLICATION OF THE DIFFERENT MEANS OF
THE ART OF ORATORY, CONSIDERED PARTICULARLY IN DEMOSTHENES.

When he deigns at length to come to the juridical details, he pulverises in a few lines, the sophisms accumulated by Eschynes, on the pretended violations of the laws in the form of the coronation, ordained by the decree of Ctesiphon.

It was only a pretext of chicanery, to have the right of instituting an accusation, which could never be done, but by relying upon the terms of some law, well or ill-interpreted. It was for the judges to decide upon the application. There were among the Athenians, as every where else, ordinances, which, if only some particular points were considered, would appear to be contradicted by other ordinances. Eschynes had seized, like an expert chicaner, all that could appear to be favourable to him. We have seen before how Demosthenes extricated himself from that circumstance, so dryly contentious, of his accountability, and how he understood to elevate and animate, his oratorical argument.

Refutation is always the more easy, as the objections are more frivolous; but although one has evidence of his side, he does not always give it that pressing turn, and that irresistible force, which is the eloquence of discussion. It cost Demosthenes no more to refute the second head of accusation.

"As to what regards the proclamation, upon the theatre, I will not remind you of the number of citizens whom we have seen crowned there: I will not recall to your memories, that I have been more than once proclaimed there: but are you so destitute of sense, Eschynes, as not to comprehend, that, every where, when a citizen is crowned, the glory is the same, and it is for those who crown, that the proclamation is made upon the theatre? It is for all who hear it, an exhortation to deserve well of their country, and a subject of praise for those who distribute these recompences; rather than for those who receive them. Such is the spirit of the law which has been made upon this article. Read the law. If any one of our municipal cities crowns a citizen of Athens, the proclamation of it: shall be made in the city, which shall have decreed the crown: If it is the people of Athens or the senate, who decree it, the proclamation may be made on the theatre at the festivals of Bacchus." Here is a formal text in favour of Demosthenes. I have quoted it that we may judge of the good faith of his enemy.

Demosthenes was not ignorant of the advantage he had over Eschynes, in the opinion of his fellow-citizens, and he avails himself of it, like a superior man, from the commencement of his discourse, when having refuted the different points of accusation alledged against him, he exposes the state of Greece, at the time when he began his administration affairs, the ambition and intrigues of Philip, and the venality of orators such as Eschynes, who served that prince at the expence of his country. "The contagion was general in the cities of Greece; those who governed suffered themselves to be corrupted by presents, and the multitude abandoned themselves to them, either from blindness to the future, or by that weakness which is the consequence of indolence. Each one believed that the evil would reach him, or contrived to raise himself on the ruins of others; it was thus that the imprudent security of the people, occasioned the loss of their liberty, and that the magistrates who thought they delivered every thing to Philip, except themselves, perceived too late that they had betrayed themselves also. They are no longer friends and hosts, as they were called at the time when it was necessary to seduce them: things at present have their true names, and they are vile flatterers detested by Gods and men. We ought not to deceive ourselves. They never give money to enrich a traitor: When they have obtained of him what they wish, he is no longer consulted. Without this traitors would be too happy. But no, it is not thus. And how can it be so? When he would reign is become the master, he is so of those who have sold others to him. He knows their perfidy: he hates and despises them. Recollect what you have seen, and what you see at this day. Lasthenes was the friend of Philip, till the moment when he sold him the city of Olynthus; Timolaus until he had ruined the Thebans; Euridicus and Simon of Larissa, until they had subjected to him Thessaly. The whole world is full of similar examples. What are at present Aristrates at Sicyon, Perilaus at Megara? All are in abject contempt. And do you know what results from all this, Eschynes? It is that your parallels and yourself, all you who in Athens make a trade of treason, even you have all the greatest obligation to those who like me, defend with all their forces the republic and her liberties. It is this which supports you. It is this which enriches you. Without us, they would long since have ceased to pay you: Without us you would have long since done all that was necessary to destroy yourselves. This blunderer, has he not said somewhere, that I reproached him with the friendship of Alexander? No, I understand myself better. I never said that you was the host or the friend of Philip or Alexander. You? How? By what colour? The slaves and the mercenaries, are they called the hosts and the friends of their masters? I have said that you had been at first the mercenary of Philip, and that you are at this day that of Alexander. I have said it and all the Athenians say it. Would you know what they think? Dare to interrogate them. You dare not! Very well, I will interrogate them myself. Athenians what say you? Eschynes is he the friend of Alexander or his mercenary? Do you hear their answer? It is obvious, that it was necessary to be sure, in order to make a similar demand."

But with what dignity does he express himself, concerning this war against Philip, which they reproach him with having counselled? What a sublime flight of patriotic enthusiasm! And at this moment how small does Eschynes appear before him? He recalls that dreadful day when the news was spread in Athens of the capture of Elatea, a city of Phocis, which opened a passage to Philip, into Attica. There was no room for deliberation—The Athenians must remain exposed to an invasion, or unite with the Thebans, their ancient enemies. We should recollect here, that the Greeks regarded the Macedonians as Barbarians, and that the different states of Greece, although frequently divided among themselves, considered themselves as connected by a species of national confraternity, whenever there was occasion to combat any nation that was not Greek. It was not till after the reign of Philip, whose influence was so powerful, and under Alexander, who procured himself to be nominated generalissimo of the Greeks against the Persians, that the Macedonians were really confounded, with the other Greek nations, in the general league against their common enemies.

"You remember the tumult which filled the city, when a courier arrived in the night to the Prytanes, with the news that Philip was in Elatea. At the break of day, the senate was assembled; you had run together to the public square: the senate adjourned there, produced the courier before you, gave you the details of the fatal intelligence. The herald demanded, who would speak? No man presented himself. All your generals, all your orators were present—No man answered the voice of his country, requiring a citizen who would point out the means of her safety; for is not the herald pronouncing the words which the law has put into his mouth, the organ of the country? If nothing had been necessary at that time to induce a man to rise, but love to his country, Athenians, you would all have arisen, and ascended the tribunal. If it had been necessary to be rich the council of three hundred would have risen; those who combining the love of their country with the means of serving it, have since been lavish of their fortunes in your service, would have come forward also. But such a day, such a moment, demanded not only a good citizen, a wise man, an opulent person, but one who thoroughly knew the character, the policy and the views of Philip. I was that man, I appeared, I spoke: I laid open the designs of Philip, and what was necessary to be done to oppose him—no man contradicted me—all applauded me—a decree was necessary—I reduced it to writing. The decree ordained an embassy to the Thebans: I accepted of it. The object of the embassy was to persuade them that they ought to forget all their divisions, and unite themselves with you: I persuaded them to this.—Very well, Eschynes, what was the part which you acted on that day? And what was mine? You did nothing. I did every thing. If you had been a good citizen, then was the moment to speak; you ought to have offered some advice, better than mine, and not to have waited till this day, to attack it and allege it against me as a crime. But such is the difference between him who gives council, and him who calumniates. The one shews himself before the event, and exposes himself to contradictions, to misfortunes, to resentment. He takes all upon himself. The other is silent when he ought to speak, and waits for the moment of a disaster to excite a clamour of censure and hatred. But finally, since you was dumb on that day, tell me then at least, at this day, what other discourse I ought to have held, what was the service which I could have performed and yet neglected; what other alliance I ought to have proposed, what other conduct I ought to have recommended. It is by these marks that my administration ought to be judged, and not by the event. The event is in the will of the Gods: the intention is in the heart of the citizen. Whether Philip should be conqueror or not, depended not upon me; but what depended on me, was, to take all the measures that human prudence should dictate, to put in exercise all possible diligence, to supply by my zeal what was wanting in forces; finally, to do nothing that was not glorious, necessary, and worthy of the republic. Prove that such was not my conduct, and that it will be an accusation and not an invective. If the same thunder with which all Greece has been overthrown, has also fallen upon Athens, what could I do to ward it off? A citizen engages to equip a vessel for the state, he furnishes it with every thing necessary for her defence, a tempest oversets her, does any one think of accusing him? It was not I, he will say, who held the helm; and it was not I who commanded the army. If you alone, Eschynes, foresaw the future, why did you not reveal it? If you did not foresee it, you are not, any more than I, guilty of any thing but ignorance, and why do you accuse me when I accuse not you? But since he presses me on this point, Athenians, I will advance something yet stronger, and I conjure you to see no presumption in my words, but only the soul of an Athenian. I will say then, if we had foreseen all that has occurred, if you yourself, Eschynes, who at that time dared not to open your mouth, become all at once a prophet, had predicted to us the future, it would have been still inevitable to do what we did, if we had before our eyes the smallest glimpse of the glory of our ancestors, and of the judgment of posterity. In fact, what does the world say of us, at this day? That our efforts have been disappointed by fortune, who decides all things; but before whom should we dare to lift up our eyes, if we had abandoned to others the care of defending the liberties of Greece against Philip? Who is there among the Greeks or Barbarians, who is ignorant that never, in the past ages, has Athens preferred a shameful security to glorious dangers? That she has never consented to coalesce with an unjust power, but in all times has fought for pre-eminence and for glory. If I should boast of having inspired into you this elevation of sentiment, it would be on my part an insupportable pride; but in making it appear that such have ever been your principles, both without me, and before me, I esteem it an honor to be able to affirm, that in this part of the public functions which has been committed to me, I also have been counted for something in that part of your conduct which has been honorable and glorious. My accuser, on the contrary, in wishing to take from me the recompence which you have decreed me, does not perceive that he would also deprive you of the just tribute of applause which posterity owes you. For if you condemn me for the council I gave you, you will yourselves appear to have been blameable in receiving it. But no, Athenians, no you have not been in fault, in braving every danger for the safety and the liberty of all the Greeks. You have not been in the wrong. I swear it, by the ghosts of your ancestors, who perished in the plains of Marathon, and by those who fought at Platea, at Salamis, at Artemisium, by all those great citizens whose ashes Greece has collected in public monuments. She has granted them all the same sepulchres and the same honors—yes, Eschynes, to all; for all had the same virtue, although the eternal destiny had not granted them all same success."

This is the great oath, so celebrated in antiquity, and so frequently recollected in our days. When we hear it, it seems as if all the departed spirits so lately invoked by Eschynes, had appeared and arranged themselves round the tribunal of Demosthenes, and taken him under their protection. Nor is this enough: See how he turns against Eschynes that air of triumph which he assumed in speaking of the defeat at Cheronea.

"Have you remarked, Athenians, when he spoke of our misfortunes? He spoke of them without any feeling, without manifesting any of that grief which would have been so becoming in an honest and sensible citizen. His countenance glowed with exultation, his voice was sonorous and musical. The wretch! He thought he was accusing me, and he accused himself, by shewing himself in our common calamity so different from what you all are."

Eschynes had not ceased to admonish the Athenians to distrust the pernicious eloquence of Demosthenes: he had given to his talent all those perfidious and murderous eulogies to which hatred sometimes condemns itself; sincere upon one point, to render itself more credible in another, and employing the truth, to give more weight to calumny: it is thus that the passions defile every thing they touch, and convert panegyric into poison. Demosthenes, who leaves no article without an answer, does not fail to take him up on this: He demonstrates that the talent of speaking had never been in him, but a means of serving the republic. But he begins by expressing himself concerning this same talent, with a reserve and a modesty which must have flattered the self-love of the Athenians. There is nothing, even to his genius itself, that he does not make depend upon them.

"For all that concerns my eloquence, (since Eschynes has introduced that word) I have always observed, that the powers of speech depend in a great measure on those who hear, and that the orator appears able, in proportion to the benevolence which you express for him. At least this eloquence which he attributes to me has been useful to all, at all times, and never injurious to any. But your eloquence, Eschynes, in what has it ever served your country? You come at this day to speak to us of what is passed. What would be said of a physician, who, when called to a patient, was unable to prescribe a remedy for the disease, or preserve the man from death, and yet should come to disturb his friends at his funeral, by crying aloud at his tomb, that he would have been still alive if he had taken other advice?"

He grounds the interest of his peroration upon the honor which had been done him, in confiding to him the funeral eulogium of the citizens slain at Cheronea. Eschynes had strenuously laboured to make this a subject of reproach against him, and so much the more maliciously as he had himself solicited that function in vain. Demosthenes extracts from this a new triumph for himself, and a fresh humiliation for his accuser.

"The republic, Eschynes, has projected and executed great things by ministry, but she has not been ungrateful. When it became necessary at the time of our disgrace, to choose an orator to perform the last honors to the victims of their country, it was not you, Eschynes, who was chosen, notwithstanding your harmonious voice, your solicitations, your secret intrigues, and open cabals; it was not Demades, who had obtained for us peace, nor Hegemon, nor finally any one of your party. It was I. You were then seen, Pyticles and you, vomiting against me, with equal fury and impudence, the same invectives which you have now repeated, and it was one reason the more for the Athenians to persist in their choice. You know the reason as well as I; I will nevertheless relate it to you: it was because they knew equally well both my love to my country, and all the crimes which you had committed against it. They knew that you owed your impunity only to their disasters; that if your sentiments of enmity against them have only broke out in the time of their disgrace, it was still an acknowledgement that in all times you have been their secret enemies. It was fit that he who was to celebrate the virtues of his fellow-citizens, should not have been the fellow commoner of their enemies, should not have made with them the same sacrifices and the same libations. It was impossible to confer a function so honorable upon those who had been seen intermingled with the conquerors, participating in the insolent joy of their festivals, and triumphing in our calamities. Finally, it was not fit to deplore with a lying tongue, the destiny of those illustrious deceased. The just regret could not exist but in the mouth of him who had the correspondent sorrow in his soul; and this grief was well known to be in my heart and not in yours. Behold the causes which determined the suffrages of the people; and when the relations of the deceased, charged with the melancholy care of their sepulture, gave the funeral festival, it was at my house that they gave it, at my house, as considering me more tenderly affected than any one at the catastrophe of those whose loss we deplored. They indeed were more nearly connected by blood, but no man was more afflicted from the sentiments of a citizen—no man in the common loss had more cause to weep than myself."

Rollin observes, with reason, that the only thing which can offend us, in this immortal oration, as well as in that of Eschynes, is the profusion of personal reflections, in which the two rivals indulge themselves in several places. But it is just to observe also, that they were authorised by the republican manners, less delicate upon these points than ours, and that consequently neither the one nor the other has violated the precept of the art, which forbids to shock the customary decency. Two citizens, enemies, two rival orators attacked each other, upon all points; upon their birth, their education, their fortune, their manners, and this research drew them into details which are not always very noble in our eyes, considering the difference of times and of language, but which then had their effects. We find them also in Cicero, when he speaks against Anthony, Piso, Vatinius, who, on their part, spare him as little. If these reproaches were false, they only compromised him who pronounced them; when they were well founded it was thought that a freeman had a right to speak out. We ought to pardon the citizens of Rome and Athens for having thought that an honest man might hear, without shame or disgrace, the invectives of a calumniator. Moreover, it was not altogether without danger, that any one was permitted to accuse and inveigh: in Athens the accuser must have at least a fifth part of the suffrages. Without this he was condemned to banishment. This happened to Eschynes. He retired into the island of Rhodes, where he opened a school of rhetoric. His first lesson was the reading of the two harangues, which had caused his condemnation. I cannot conceive, I confess, how he could have the courage to read to his pupils that of Demosthenes. One may, without a crime, be less eloquent than another; but how to avow, without blushing, that one has been so evidently convicted of being a calumniator and a bad citizen?

For Demosthenes, an historian whose authority in this respect has been justly contested, from the silence of all the others, pretends that this firmness, so long a time immovable, this disinterestedness so long supported, at last, for once, failed him; that after having resisted Alexander with the same force which he had displayed against Philip, he at last suffered himself to be corrupted, and counterfeited sickness to avoid ascending the tribunal—that this unworthy weakness obliged him to retire from Athens. But we may well doubt of the fact, and it is certain that his death was honorable and courageous. Having returned to Athens after the death of Alexander, he never ceased to harangue against the tyranny of the Macedonians, until Antipater, their king, had obtained, sword in hand, the order to deliver him all the orators who had declared themselves his enemies. Demosthenes attempted to escape, but seeing himself ready to be arrested by those who pursued him, he had recourse to poison, which he always carried about him. It has been remarked that Cicero and Demosthenes had an end equally tragical, and perished victims to their country after having lived its defenders.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

I am, Mr. Editor, a little studious man, the well wisher of my species, a philanthropist, who confident of meaning well, would speak and write as occasion demanded, without dissimulation. I do not like authors who seem to disguise their thoughts, and who will not tell the whole truth for fear of speaking of themselves; this, I think, is carrying modesty almost too far—no such side glances for me. In the name of common sense, if a man or woman be blest with any of the cardinal virtues, why should he or she be too diffident to avow them, or be censurable for so doing? Such being my sentiments, and with this short sketch of my character, you will not, perhaps, Mr. Editor, charge me with the sin of egotism, if I add, that I am one among a number in our metropolis, who seldom like to enjoy 'a morsel alone,' but who, in the course of their literary perambulations, are willing, and in fact sometimes desirous, that others should be benefited as well as themselves. Having thus frankly introduced myself, permit me to proceed, and state, in a few words, the object of this intrusion.

You must know then, Mr. Oldschool, that I have lately experienced much satisfaction in the perusal of a small work, intitled 'Cornaro on Health and Long Life!' composed, at an advanced age, by an Italian nobleman, and translated into very good English, by I don't know whom. Now, as we are all willing to enjoy health, and most of us anxious to live long, and as this little book contains rules and directions for the procurement and preservation of both, I am induced, through the medium of your useful paper, to recommend it to the public as a production sensibly composed upon a subject of general importance. The work, as before observed, is short, and in a style which I am inclined to think will not prove tiresome even to those who are not much accustomed to literature. Prefixed will be found a recommendatory preface from the ingenious pen of the virtuous and justly celebrated Addison; in this preface, after many excellent remarks on the structure of the human frame, and the necessity of temperance for its healthful preservation, the author observes, "But the most remarkable instance of temperance towards procuring life, is what we meet with in a little book published by Lewis Cornaro, the Venetian, which I the rather mention because it is of undoubted credit, as the late Venetian ambassador, who was of the same family, attested more than once in conversation, when he resided in England. Cornaro, the author of this little treatise I am mentioning, was of an infirm constitution 'till about forty, when obstinately persisting in an exact course of temperance, he recovered a perfect state of health, insomuch that at fourscore he published his book." Pause then, ye modern epicures, and ere again you gratify your sensual appetites, consider the long healthy life of Cornaro, and reflect whether voluptuousness can even flatter with hope of like enjoyment; view him, undisturbed by pain or sickness, happy and serene, enjoying every blessing, and all the rational delights of life, until an advanced age, then leaving the world almost without a struggle. Valetudinarians as ye are, surrounded by various ills, real and imaginary, can ye unmoved contemplate a picture like this? No, such a life and a death must be desirable even to you; is it not then worth your while to profit by the experience of a respectable old man? who wrote with no mercenary view, but who, from a wish that all might enjoy pleasures and benefits, which he resolutely struggled for and obtained, published, as we are told, at the age of eighty years, his little book. Purchase it then, and read it with attention; you will there find (what, perhaps, you have not much considered, and what may be of importance to know) that most diseases proceed from irregularity and intemperance. "Let us beware, says Socrates, of such food as tempts us to eat when we are not hungry, and of such liquors as entice us to drink when we are not thirsty." This philosopher was well convinced of the evils which result from uncontrolled indulgence. Dispense, therefore, with dainties highly seasoned; likewise forego the too captivating pleasures of the bottle. During the inclemency of boisterous winter, exceed not one or two glasses of wine per diem, and use spirit only as medicine; but when sultry summer makes the labourer sweat, then banish wine, and use small beer or wholesome hydrant water. Live frugally upon viands plainly dressed, when vegetables are procurable eat them daily, being always careful to avoid gluttony, and then if the constitution is not too far gone, it will undergo a change, which, renovating the system, may perhaps add years to your enfeebled lives.

Health, it must be allowed, is of the first importance to us all; it is a blessing without which life is but half enjoyed; a good which we all deserve, and which it is our duty as well as our interest to preserve. Every treatise, therefore, upon such a subject, must be interesting; every expedient by which it may be attained should be rendered universal, and properly estimated by the public at large. Let then the inhabitants of Columbia, if they would become hearty and strong, if they would animate the mind and invigorate the understanding, if they would dispel spleen and possess cheerfulness, in fact if they would become useful and happy members of the community, let them encourage temperance. Let the rich despise the short lived gratifications of appetite, banishing luxury and profusion, as dangerous to the prosperity of a young and thriving nation. Let the poor be industrious, and practice frugality, scorning pursuits which have a tendency to lead from domestic endearments, then nor pains nor fevers shall disturb the former, nor pale faced poverty the latter; the learned doctor and conceited quack would each pack up their drugs to seek in foreign climes a surer fortune, and America, favoured land of liberty, would become still more the seat of plenty and of happiness.

H

From the second volume of the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, consisting of historical and romantic Ballads, edited by Walter Scott, the following beautiful Ballad, which appears to be built on a basis of truth, and which cannot fail to delight the lover of the Scottish Muse, is selected, with the note appended by a master hand.

ANNAN WATER.

NEVER BEFORE PUBLISHED.

"The following verses are the original words of the tune of 'Allan Water,' by which name the song is mentioned in Ramsay's 'Tea Table Miscellany.' The ballad is given from tradition, and it is said that a bridge over the Annan was built in consequence of the melancholy catastrophe which it narrates. By the Gatehope slack, is, perhaps, meant the Gate-slack, a pass in Annan dale. The Annan, and the Frith of Solway, into which it falls, are the frequent scenes of tragical accidents. The editor trusts he will be pardoned for inserting the following awfully impressive account of such an event, contained in a letter from Dr. Currie of Liverpool, by whose correspondence, in the course of preparing his volumes for the press, he has been alike honoured and instructed. After stating that he had some recollection of the ballad which follows, the biographer of Burns proceeds thus: 'I once in my early days heard (for it was night, and I could not see) a traveller drowning: not in the Annan itself, but in the Firth of Solway, close by the mouth of that river. The influx of the tide had unhorsed him in the night, as he was passing the sands from Cumberland. The west wind blew a tempest, and, according to the common expression, brought in the water three foot abreast. The traveller got upon a standing net a little way from the shore. There he lashed himself to the post, shouting for half an hour for assistance—till the tide rose over his head! In the darkness of night, and amid the pauses of the hurricane his voice, heard at intervals, was exquisitely mournful. No one could go to his assistance—no one knew where he was—the sound seemed to proceed from the spirit of the waters. But morning rose—the tide had ebbed—and the poor traveller was found lashed to the pole of the net, and bleaching in the wind!

.....Annan Water's wading deep,
And my love Annie's wond'rous bonnie;
And I am laith she shuld weel her feet,
Because I love her best of ony.

'Gar saddle me the bonny black;
'Gar saddle sune and make him ready;
For I will down the Gatehope-Slack,
And all to see my bonny ladye.

He has loup'en on the bonny black,
He spurr'd him wi' the spur right sairly,
But, or he wan the Gatehope-Slack,
I think the steed was wae and weary.

He has loup'en on the bonnie gray,
He rade the right gate and the ready:
I trow he would neither stint nor stay,
For he was seeking his bonnie ladye.

The gray was a mare, and a right good mare,
But when she wan the Annan Water,
She could nae hae ridden a furlong mair,
Had a thousand merks been wadded* at her.

The side was stey, and the bottom deep,
Frae bank to brae the water pouring;
And the bonnie gray mare did sweat for fear,
For she heard the water Kelpy roaring.

O he has pou'd aff his dapperpy† coat,
The silver buttons glanced bonny;
The waistcoat burst'd off his breast,
He was sae full of melancholy.

He has ta'en the ford at that stream tail;
I wot he swam both strong and steady,
But the stream was broad and his strength did fail,
And he never saw his bonnie ladye.

.....O wae betide the frush‡ saugh wand!
And wae betide the bush of briar,
It brake into my true love's hand,
When his strength did fail and his limbs did tire.

And wae betide ye, Annan Water!
This night that ye are a drumlie river,
For over thee I'll build a bridge,
That ye never more true love may sever.

MARKET FOR THE FAIR CIRCASSIANS.

The following account of the sale of the fair Circassians, the most beautiful women of the eastern, probably of the whole world, is extracted from a tour, performed in the years 1795-6, through the Crimea, and the countries bordering on the empire, by Mrs. Maria Guthrie.

Caffa, or as it is now called by its original name, Theodocia, is the market for Circassian slaves, who have been "destined for ages to be brought to the market of Caffa, like any other kind of merchandise, and what is most remarkable in this revolting business is, that these beauties, so famous in eastern story, are brought in vast numbers every year by their own parents, and sold at from 2 to 4000 Turkish piastres (about 4s. sterling) in proportion to their charms.

As I am sure that a mistress market must be a curious subject to the polished nations of Europe, I shall give a specimen of the manner in which it is carried on, in the very words of Mr. Keelman, a German merchant.

* Wadded—Wagered.
† Quere—Cap-a-fee?
‡ Frush—Fresh.

The fair Circassians, says Mr. Keelman, to whom three were offered me for sale in 1768, were brought from their own chamber into mine, (as we all lodged in the same inn), one after another by the Armenian merchant, who had to dispose of them. The first was very well dressed, and had her face covered in the oriental style. She kissed my hand by order of the master, and then walked backward and forward in the room to show her fine shape, her pretty small foot, and her elegant carriage. She then lifted up her veil, and absolutely surprised me by her extreme beauty. Her hair was fair, with fine large blue eyes, her nose a little aquiline, with pouting red lips. Her features were regular, her complexion fair and delicate, and her cheeks covered with a fine natural vermillion, of which she took care to convince me by rubbing them hard with a cloth. Her neck I thought a little too long; but, to make amends, the finest bosom and teeth in the world set off the other charms of this beautiful slave, for whom the Armenian asked 4000 Turkish piastres, but permitted me to feel her pulse, to convince me that she was in perfect health; after which she was ordered away, when the merchant assured me that she was a pure virgin of eighteen years of age.

I was more surprised, probably, than I ought to have been (as common usage renders every thing familiar) at the perfect indifference with which the inhabitants of Caffa behold this traffic in beauty, that had shocked me so much, and at their assuring me, when I seemed affected at the practice, that it was the only method which parents had of bettering the state of their handsome daughters, destined at all events to the haram; for that the rich Asiatic gentleman, who pays 4000 piastres for a beautiful mistress, treats and prizes her as an earthly houri, in perfect conviction that his success with the hoursies of paradise entirely depends on his behaviour to the sisterhood on earth, who will bear testimony against him in case of ill treatment; in short, that, by being disposed of to rich mussulmen, they were sure to live in affluence and ease the rest of their days, and in a state by no means degrading in Mahometan countries, where their prophet has permitted the seraglio: but that, on the contrary, if they fall into the hands of their own feudal lords, the barbarous inhabitants of their own native mountains, which it is very difficult for beauty to escape, their lot was comparatively wretched, as those rude chieftains have very little respect or generosity toward the fair sex.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE LAY PREACHER.

"And Ittai answered the king, and said, as the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be."

The book of Samuel is crowded with interesting narratives. The story of the artifice and defection of Absalom is full of incident, and exhibits a forcible moral. The clergy have ever found, in his revolt and its consequences, a copious theme for grave remark and pious meditation. Sterne, whose pen was a pencil, has grouped king David and his attendants in consternation and sorrow, flying over the brook of Cedron toward the way of the wilderness. The Lay Preacher, humbly gleaning after such labourers, has picked up one incident picturesque, pathetic, honourable to humanity. A portrait, that has such features, merits an exhibition. From the Cabinet of the Bible then let it be produced; and if placed in a good light, the rude man as well as the connoisseur, will style it enchanting.

As a cover for fraud or violence, religious, perhaps, more frequently than political pretences, have been employed by the hypocrites of every age. Absalom was too cunning an impostor not to know that a shew of piety would be highly operative with his father David. Anxious to set up the standard of rebellion in Hebron, a city of malcontents, the royal revolter prays that he might be permitted to go thither to pay his vows. The credulous king consents. Absalom is attended with the usual crowd, studious of change and confusion. Some of those counsellors, in whose loyalty the king probably reposed entire confidence, abandon their duty and their sovereign, and follow the fortunes of the usurper. The dark plot thickens. The conspirators increase. The mournful tidings of a son's criminality reach at length the afflicted sire. The baleful cry of treason rung in the palace. The perturbed king urges the necessity of flight. He and his household accordingly secede from the city. Interesting fugitives! You were not the victims of common fear, you were not a disordered rout on the retreat from a chasing conqueror, you were kind companions, and fellow mourners, and, as you ascended together the steep of Mount Olivet, let fall 'kindly drops, which pity had engendered.'

Though it might be expected that those, immediately about the person of David, whose affections he could easily engage, or whose obedience he could sternly require, would be the partners of his flight, yet in such a dubious hour, the strangers at Jerusalem, the wealthy, the politic, the timid would keep aloof, till more tranquil times should come round again.

But Ittai, the Gittite, had such a warm heart, that he never balanced in his cautious head the pros and cons of this selfish philosophy.

This man did not linger a moment on the bank of the brook to consider the hazard he ran, or the probability that he should lose his head. If Absalom's banners proved victorious. The time serving Shimei made many a syllogism, in this prudent logic; Ittai's process of reasoning was more summary; for 'he passed over, and all his men, and all the little ones that were with him.'

Though a kingdom and a child's affections were fast fading away before the sight of David, and we might easily suppose him absorbed in his calamities, he was not so sunken in the trance of woe, not to remark the prompt fidelity of Ittai. But such zeal, at such a season, and from such a quarter, appeared enigmatical—"Wherefore goest thou also with us? For thou art a stranger, and also an exile. Whereas thou camest but yesterday. Should I this day make thee go up and down with us? Seeing I go whither I may. Return thou and take back thy brethren: Mercy and truth be with thee."

Dr. Campbell censures the paraphrastic style, and the Lay Preacher is averse to verbosity. The above address of the king is so tersely expressed that a little expansion, though diminishing the force, may add to the perspicuity of the passage.

Is it possible, Ittai, that you are one of my unfortunate associates? How can you leave the delights of a city for the way of the wilderness, and prefer danger with me to future honours from Absalom? You are a stranger, how carest thou then for Jerusalem? You have been an exile, whence then thy nationality? Return, good, but deluded man; why shouldst thou wander with David and tempt perdition? I am here desolate and despised; soon, perhaps, to perish by the steel, or, still sharper, the ingratitude of a child. I desperately fly, I know not where. But let not thy rash loyalty trace my perplexed paths. For thy zeal receive my—heart. But leave me, and make thy peace with the usurper. May mercy plead with him thy forgiveness. May truth attest thy virtue.

To so noble a friend and faithful follower such a remonstrance would add constancy. Tell Ittai of danger and he half unsheathes his sword. He prefers hazardous allegiance, to criminal submission, and would rather, with bare and bleeding feet, go up the ascent of Olivet, than be captain of the host at seditious Hebron.

Survey, my readers, this grand historical picture, designed by a great master—a prophet. It is more glowing than the canvas of Rubens, more sublime than the cartoons of Raphael—it is the portrait of a friend in adversity.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

We quit with regret, and with proportionable delight return to such a work as Dr. Paley's Natural Theology, a book in which the best powers of reason are employed to the highest purposes. If the perversion of the will could be conquered by an appeal to the head, atheism would be here subdued. The confirmation of well disposed minds in their sound and rational belief will be the effect most commonly produced. Dr. Paley certainly gives new life and energy to the moral proofs of a Deity, in this very able publication. We have no original work within the period of many years, which can be arranged with the foregoing in magnitude as well as value.

The History of England, is written by Mr. Dolphus with a spirit and propriety, which will lead many readers to wish, with us, for its continuance to the present time.

Mr. Henry Brougham's work on Colonial Policy, is a publication displaying genius, sagacity and vigour, on a subject of interest and importance.

In 'Letters from France,' written in the middle of 1803, the observing author thus mentions that coxcomb patriot and Jacobin, the frivolous La Fayette—"He resides at Paris and appears a quiet citizen: whether his demeanor is from motives of discretion, or he is sick of the struggles of civil dissensions and their uncertain result, it is not easy to divine. By the apparent seriousness and gravity of his demeanor, it would seem he had forgotten the Quixotic challenge to Lord Carlisle, and the vaultings on his graceful milk-white steed, and that he sought no more the dangerous sport of fomenting civil broils, and overturning kingdoms. When he was tampering with the mob, and exciting riot, he did not imagine he was raising a tempest he could not allay. The vain man fancied that the same power that put the populace in motion, could, when it pleased, restrain and stop it: unskilled in the nature of public commotion, its peril and consequences, he did not see to what end his mad manœuvring led. He was astonished at last to see the embers he had lighted spread into such a flame, and was startled at the outrages of which he was the unwary instigator. This weathercock, whose versatility puzzled every politician, has veered alternately to democracy, to monarchy, and to aristocracy. He is now reconciled to the nameless government of the day, and even seeks a subaltern place in it."

Mrs. H. Adams has proved that the American ladies are neither debarred the use of the pen, nor incapable of wielding it with dexterity, in her "View of Religion, in two parts:" the former containing an alphabetic compendium of the various religious denominations which have appeared in the world, from the beginning of the Christian era to the present day; and the latter a brief account of the different schemes of religion now embraced among mankind. The fair author seems to have fully justified her assertion that the whole is collected from the best authors, ancient and modern, though having confined herself to translations, in some instances, she has unknowingly been betrayed into a few unimportant errors. It is sufficient to state, in proof of the merit of Mrs. Adams's "View," that it has already passed three editions, each of which has been augmented, by a considerable introduction of new matter. [N. SHAKESPEARE.

When first was rear'd the British stage,
Rude was the scene and weak the lay:
The bard explor'd the sacred page,
And holy mystery form'd his Play.

The affections of the mortal breast
In simple moral next he sung,
Each vice in human shape he drest,
And to each virtue gave a tongue.

Then 'gan the Comic Muse unfold
In coarser jests her homely art:
Of Gammar Guntion's loss she told,
And laugh'd at Hodge's awkward smart.

Come from thy wildly winding stream,
First born of Genius, SHAKESPEARE, come!
The listening world attends thy theme,
And bids each elder bard be dumb.

For thou within the human mind
Fix'd, as on thy peculiar throne
Sit'st as a Deity inshrin'd;
And either muse is all thine own.

The following is a faithful description of the imported Jacobins of this luckless country:

Fellows who have combin'd to level
With their friend democrat, the Devil,
Tear up the pillars of society,
Pull down the fabric of propriety,
Give meek-ey'd Piety a flogging,
And send morality a jogging.
Fellows, who sped away betimes,
To seek a refuge from their crimes;
Who, if transported back to Europe,
Each hangman there would lack a new rope.

The qualifications of a republican representative.

No demagogue of ancient story,
Can be by Fame prefer'd before ye;
Rome never knew so great a hero
In Tarquin, Cataline, or Nero;
Nor Ireland with her modern Gracchi,
Her Paddies rampant, each a black eye;
Nor Algiers all her corsair's mustering,
Can find a fellow, bold and blustering,
So qualified to take a station,
With patriots met for legislation.

Had nature wish'd to speak her mind,
And give some lesson to mankind,
She'd nae look'd to bards refin'd
For pointed turns;
But pleas'd wad hae her pen resign'd
To Robert Burns.

Fidelia, you wonder we men love to kiss,
And its usefulness ask me to prove;
I answer, sweet girl! 'tis the foretaste of bliss
Which Hymen decrees to true love.

Written in an Almanac for the year 1800, on the 1st of January 1801, when our worthy president was in the 'full tide of successful experiment,' putting down integrity, ability, and virtue, and raising.....every thing which debases man.

My old and faithful time observant,
The year has chang'd, you're not respected,
But, like a faithful public servant,
When parties change, you're now neglected.

BACCHANALIAN SONG.

You know that our ancient philosophers hold
There is nothing in equipage, honours or gold;
That bliss in externals we seldom can find,
And, in truth, my good friends, I am quite of their mind.

What makes a man happy, I never can doubt;
'Tis something within him, 'tis nothing without.
This something, they said, was the source of content,
But, whatever they call'd it, 'twas WINE that they meant.

Upon their own principles I could have shewn 'em,
That the juice of the grape is the true summum bonum.

Without us, I grant ye, 'tis not worth a pin,
But, ye Gods, how divine, when we get it within.

The wealthy are poor, and the haughty repine
If, with gold and with grandeur, you give them no wine.

But plenty of wine to the beggar afford;
Only make him as drunk—he's as great as a Lord.

While the bottle is wanting the soul is depress'd,
And beauty can kindle no flame in the breast;
But the toper for every encounter is ready,
And Joan, when you're drunk, is as good as my lady.

He surely can boast little brains of his own,
Who attempted to find the Philosopher's Stone:
To turn lead into gold, is an idle design,
So I'll be content to turn gold into wine.

SONG.

From an ancient collection, published 1671.
Come, Chloris, hie we to the bower
To sport us 'ere the day be done!
Such is thy power, that every flower
Will ope to thee as to the sun.

And if a flower but chance to die,
With my sighs' blast, or my eyes' rain,
Thou canst revive it with thine eye,
And with thy breath make sweet again.

The wanton suckling and the vine
Will strive for the honour, who first may
With their green arms encircle thine,
To keep the burning sun away.

To the history of Italian poetry, Mr. MATIAS has smoothed the way for the readers of that language by his judicious selections from Crescimbeni and Tiraboschi; and he writes Italian with a purity and spirit which almost entitle him to a place in the histories he has thus republished.

Bishop White's sermon, delivered before the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, evinces a mind untainted with bigotry, and glowing with the true spirit of Christian charity.

Bishop Moore in his pastoral letter, has treated subjects of high importance, and the animation with which they are discussed, evinces clearly that the heart of the worthy prelate is engaged in the great work to which he is called.

ST. GEORGE'S SOCIETY.

On Monday the 23d April the Society of the Sons of St. George, established in this city for the advice and assistance of Englishmen in distress, held their anniversary dinner at Hardy's Inn. The society were honored with the company of the officers of the several benevolent institutions harmonizing with them, and of many other respectable visitors.

The following selected toasts were drank, accompanied with appropriate music, and the day spent with that solid satisfaction which must result where festivity is combined with philanthropy.

The Day and those who respect it—Duke of York's march.

The King of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland—restoration to his health, and may he live to witness the discomfiture of his enemies.—God save the King.

The Wooden Walls of Old England—may they continue to be the protectors of the liberties of the world.—Rule Britannia.

The Army and Navy of the United Kingdoms—may they always prove invincible.—Hearts of Oak.

The memory of the late general Washington—may his virtues and moderation be emulated by every citizen of the United States to the latest posterity.—Roslin Castle.

The Sons of St. David, St. Andrew, St. Patrick and Herman.—Britons strike home.

Mr. Merry, minister plenipotentiary from the court of Great Britain to the United States.—You're welcome from Paxton.

Perpetual friendship between Great Britain and America.—The topsail shivers in the wind.

The Judiciary of the United States—may its independence be as invulnerable, and its existence as durable as a column of adamant.—Washington's March.

The Fair Sex.—All in the Downs.

Agriculture and Commerce.—When the rosy morn appearing.

The Arts and Sciences.—Once the Gods of the Greeks.

Captain Bainbridge, his officers and crew—may they speedily be restored to their country.—Galley Slave.

May the Sun of Prosperity shine constantly on the Sons of Industry and good order.—Come now all ye social powers.

In the New Annual Register, it is said "the Algerine Captive" is so essentially true to nature, that it may have been historically true in fact.

The following fustian paragraph from a Boston paper is a curious example of the Indiano Americano style, which by many a republican critic is considered as the true sublime, and not inferior to any passage in Longinus:

THE THEATRE.

On Monday evening, crowded its walls with taste, fashion and beauty, to welcome the entree of Mr. BERNARD on our boards. His reception, we trust, will be found among the most splendid ever given to any performer on this continent; but the dazzling presentment of his talent far outshone the high-wrought anticipation of public opinion. The report of his eminence was indeed no fore-staller's trick to raise value. He is at once the excellent comedian we have ever seen in spirit of execution, and the most commendable in chastity of conception. The town has never witnessed a BERNARD before. The repetition of the play on this evening, is one of the effects of his unexampled merit. His style has a peculiar characteristic. The life of the scene never falters in his personation. The character he represents is entire in every part; the actor is never once thought of. It is the perfection of art to conceal art; and it is the test of good acting to embody the fictitious personage, of which it is meant to be the resemblance.

A Roman Catholic curate, to free himself from the great labour of confessions in Lent, gave notice to his parishioners, that on Monday he should confess the liars; on Tuesday, the misers; on Wednesday, the slanderers; on Thursday, the thieves; on Friday, the libertines; and on Saturday, the bad women. His scheme succeeded—none attended.

Health is so necessary to all the duties, as well as pleasures of life, that the crime of squandering it is equal to the folly; and he that for a short gratification brings weakness and disease upon himself, and for the pleasure of a few years passed in the tumults of diversion and clamours of merriment, condemns the maturer and more experienced part of his life to the chamber and the couch, may be justly reproached, not only as a spendthrift of his own happiness, but as a robber of the public; as a wretch, that has voluntarily disqualified himself for the business of his station, and refused that part which Providence assigns him, in the general task of human nature.

There are, perhaps, very few conditions more to be pitied than that of an active and elevated mind, labouring under the weight of a distempered body; the time of such a man is always spent in forming schemes, which a change of wind hinders from executing; his powers fume away in projects and in hopes, and the day of action never arrives. He lies down, delighted with the thoughts of to-morrow, pleases his ambition with the fame he shall acquire, on his benevolence with the good he shall bestow. But, in the night, the skies are overcast, the temper of the air is changed, he wakes in languor, impatience and distraction, and has no longer any wish, but for ease, nor any attention, but to misery. It may be said that disease generally begins that equality, which death completes; the distinctions, which set one man so much above another are very little perceived in the gloom of a sick chamber, where it will be vain to expect entertainment from the gay, or instruction from the wise, where all human glory is obliterated, the wit is clouded, the reasoner perplexed, and the hero subdued; when the highest and brightest of mortal beings finds nothing left him, but the consciousness of innocence.

Bishop HORSLEY thus dedicates to his sovereign the new translation of Hosea:

Your majesty's love and affection for letters in general, not the least conspicuous of the many royal virtues, which have endeared you to mankind, the particular favour and protection your majesty, upon all occasions has extended to Biblical learning, have encouraged me to approach you with an attempt to elucidate one of the most ancient, generally deemed the most difficult, and for that reason, of late years, the most neglected but certainly not the least interesting of the Hebrew poets. If the execution of the work might be supposed to be at all answerable, to the dignity and moment of the sacred argument, and as far as may be attainable in a translation, to the force and sublimity of the style in the original, the present might seem not too mean to be brought before a monarch, who has lived a bright example of piety, in times when piety has been generally laughed to scorn; and will be recorded in the truth-telling page of history, as the patron of the arts and sciences, and, under God, the powerful protector of the rights of civil government and of the Christian Church, (institutions in their origin equally divine) in any age, when a general spirit of Anarchy and Atheism threatened to barbarize the life of fallen man, by the subversion of all social order, by obliterating the natural distinctions of right and wrong, by the studied misuse and perversion of all learning and philosophy, and by the total extinction of all religion.

EPIGRAM.

Thomas is sure a most courageous man,
"A word and blow," for ever is his plan;
And thus his friends explain the curious matter,
He gives the first, and then receives the latter.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The incredulity of some critics has doubted whether the play of Titus Andronicus be from the pen of Shakspeare. Two verses in it, however, appear to have pleased him so much, that he has twice closely copied them.

She is a woman, therefore may be woo'd,
She is a woman, therefore may be won.
Titus Andronicus.

She's beautiful, and therefore may be woo'd,
She is a woman, therefore may be won.
Henry VI. Part I.

Was ever woman in this humour woo'd,
Was ever woman in this humour won!
Richard III.

When two French Duchesses went to compliment Hartny, who was a very handsome man, on his election to the archbishopric of Paris, he turned to Madame Bouillons, and said, Formosior pecoris custos (the keeper of a handsome flock). The Duchess finished the verse by answering formosior ipse (he himself handsomer.)

To be full of compliment is ridiculous; to be altogether without it, is rusticity.

We wish some of our poetical readers would favour us with a version of the following epigram, from Amalthæus, on two beautiful children, each deprived of one eye.

Lumine Acon dextro, capta est Leonillo sinistro,
Et potuit forma vincere uterque Deos;
Parve puer, lumen quod habes concede sorori.
Sic tu cæcus amor, sic erit illa Venus.

THE DOUBLE MISTAKE.

From the French.

Little Love, the other day,
More than moderately gay,
To his mother archly said
'Welcome, Iris! lovely maid!
'Venus, turning sharply round,
Work'd a miracle and frown'd.
'O matron, for mercy's sake,
Pardon me this one mistake;
I intend no ill, believe me,
'Tis my eyes alone deceive me,
When fair Iris I misname,
She will not poor Cupid blame;
And I must confess it true
Often I take her for you.'

Hume observes, and I think very profoundly, that the Presbyterian religion is republican, and perfectly suited to the genius of the populace. In factious times the devotees of Presbyterianism are, of course, zealous partizans of democracy.

Mr. Pinkerton's compilation, intitled Modern Geography, is a work, which, if it does not meet all the wishes of the learned in that science, has yet, in many points, a manifest superiority over those which have preceded it.

A caustic vein of wit pervades Mr. W. Gifford's late examination of certain critical strictures; but it exhibits also good sense and sound taste, and will, therefore, live beyond the natural date of controversial tracts.

A DOUBLE ENTENDRE.

A city fop, with haughty walk,
Would often o'er the common stalk.
One day, in boots that would surpass
The reflexivity of glass,
When stepping o'er the broadway street,
A pup came barking at his feet;
A stander-by observ'd the play,
And wonder'd why the pup should bay.
A boy replied, with wit acute,
'He sees a funny in the boot.'

[The author of the following pieces, Mr. Oldschool, was a young gentleman of great respectability and handsome talents. His name was Hoyland; he was born in Yorkshire, in England, of parents who supported a reputable standing in society. Either from intense application to books, for which he discovered an early and ardent attachment, or from some unknown cause, he gradually lost his reason, and finally became entirely insane.]

It is a remark of some philosopher, that poetry and lunacy are so nearly allied, that a passion for the first almost invariably precedes the latter. This observation, upon first view, may appear absurd and ridiculous; but, beside the authority of experience, it is obvious to observe what a similarity exists between the wild vagaries of a disordered mind, and the eccentricities of a flighty muse. The heart softened, and the natural vivacity of temper destroyed by many gloomy reflections, and the mind, delighting in regularity and order, appear peculiarly adapted to the tender themes, the harmonious cadence and measured equality of poetic lines. Poetry, indeed, appears to have been a concomitant of inspiration, as well as of other kinds of mental disorder. The Pythea of Apollo, whose ravings resembled more the frantic distractions of convulsive agonies, than the effects of divine influence, screamed out her ambiguous oracles in unmeasured and mutilated verses; and Æneas' Sibyl wrote on the leaves in her cave poetic responses, adapted to the circumstances of every inquirer. I myself heard some verses recited which were written by a lunatic of the Philadelphia hospital, that would not have disgraced a more conspicuous pen. His productions, though not remarkable for that ardour and regular connection, which is very naturally expected in elegant poetry, contained, nevertheless, many beautiful thoughts, original figures, and much energy of expression. His subjects were grave, and adapted to the state of his mind.

Whether our author composed these odes before or during his insanity, I am unable to discover; one thing, however, is remarkable, that though his themes are uniformly serious, and many of his expressions strongly indicative of melancholy, his compositions bear no marks of a disordered understanding. From the general tenor of his pieces, and the acute despondency which is breathed in many of them, it is not unreasonable to suppose that they were written at the commencement of his disorder. In his ode to sleep he says,

But when, like me, some pensive wretch withdrawn
Far from the world, within some darkling grove,
From dewy fingered eve to purple dawn,
Bemoans his sufferings like a wounded dove.

But, whatever state of intellect might have produced these odes, the lovers of elegant poetry ought, perhaps, to regret that it was but of short duration. The force of his malady overcame the strength of his constitution, and he became its victim at the age of twenty-one years. If we consider the early period of life, at which these little essays were written, and the circumstance of their having never been corrected for the press, we shall find much to admire, and but little to disapprove. The early brilliancy of POPE, CHATTERTON, and HUNT, united with great harmony of versification, and considerable strength of genius, are discoverable in many of the stanzas. They never have hitherto, I believe, appeared in print except one, 'To a friend, with a borrowed guinea returned,' which was some time ago sent to the Port Folio, and which, for that reason, I shall not transmit on this occasion. If you think their merits intitle them to a place in your Miscellany, they are very much at your service.

PHILAXIAN.]

ODE I.

TO HIS GUARDIAN ANGEL.

Sweet Angel of my natal hour,
Thou, to whose tutelary power

My infant days were given;
My bosom friend! companion dear!
Forever kind, forever near,
While such the will of heaven!

By thee inspir'd, the live-long day
Roll'd lightly on in peace and play,
Calm slumbers crown'd the night;
By thee and simple nature drawn,
Ere reason spread her glimm'ring dawn,
I sought and found delight.

'Twas thou when'er I rang'd the mead,
That drew me from the poisonous weed
Of tempting purple dye;
That drew me from the fatal brake,
Where coil'd in speckled pride, the snake
Allured my longing eye.

Ah! why so soon to reason's hand
Did'st thou resign the imperial wand?
Why yield the ruling rein,
With thee are all my comforts fled,
And woes to endless woes succeed
A dire and gloomy train!

Can zephyr hush the singing seas,
Or whisper silence in a breeze,
When Boreas sweeps the flood?
Can the soft virgin's voice restrain
The midnight howling of the plain,
When Lions roar for food?

So weak is reason to controul,
Or soothe the tempests of the soul,
When torn by passions wild;
Tho' soft the sound as zephyr's wing,
That whispers tidings of the spring,
As voice of virgin mild.

Come then, resume thy guardian power,
Sweet angel of my natal hour,
To whom the choice was given;
Once more receive me to thy care,
Forever kind, forever near,
If such the will of heaven.

ODE II.

TO A NIGHTINGALE.

Say bird of eve, whose solitary note
I catch imperfect from a spray remote,
(While numerous echoes down the vale Convey the melancholy tale)
Still nearer to my lonely cell
Bring all thy woes, sweet Philomel.

Around that cell no verdant bowers
With careless elegance inwove,
Nor shrubs adorn'd with early flowers,
Exhaling fragrance, court thy love.

Yet think not to an heedless ear
Thy throat will vainly warble here;
Thy liquid lays enchant my soul,
Wakeful as yonder starry pole.
Then nearer to my lonely cell,
Bring all thy woes, sweet Philomel.

If I deny the hospitable bough,
(Far to the pensive genius of the shades)
May yonder beechen glades
Their salutary gloom no more display
To intercept the dog-star's fiery ray
From my devoted brow!

May never music soothe my breast,
But the funereal bird unblest'd,
Harrow with shrieks that fright the dawning day.
Witness ye neighbouring vallies green

Do I not rove where woodbines twine
And call each branching oak divine?
Enraptured with the sylvan scene!
Then nearer to my lonely cell
Bring all thy woes, sweet Philomel.

Were once my ardent wishes crown'd,
A new Elysium waving round,
Would empty every forest nigh
Of all their native melody:
But fate, inexorable fate,
Not even thy sounds can mitigate.
Then pardon, gentle bird, the wrong,
And at my window perching light
Prattle thy sweet notes—and attentive night
Will o'er these bounds her solemn reign prolong.

ODE III.

ON RURAL HAPPINESS.

How deeply blue the ethereal space
With burning stars enamell'd o'er!
The snow-clad hills on night's grim face
A pale and dreadful lustre pour.

Welcome sad season of the year
And midnight stern and howling wind;
Horrors that fright the wolf and bear,
Serve but to soothe my wilder mind.

On this rude cliff's tremendous brow,
Ne'er touch'd by rosy fingered spring,
Where swain was never heard to blow
The warbling reed, or bird to sing—

I stand: around in ample view
The subject meads and forests lie,
And silent streams, whose surface blue
Reflects the moon and starry sky.

And mingled cottages appear,
Where sleep his genuine dew bestows,
And young content, a cherub fair,
Still smooths the pillow of repose.

There peace and heaven-born virtue reign
Unrivalled on the margin green
Of wrinkled rill, in grove or plain
The smiling pair is ever seen.

Before the lustre of their eyes,
As shades before the morning ray,
Each soul distempering passion flies,
To crowded halls and cities gay.

Av'rice with fancied wants forlorn,
Meagre his look, his mantle rude,
And stern-ey'd envy inly torn,
By the fell worm that drinks his blood.

Mistaken jealousy that weeps
O'er the pale corpse himself has gor'd,
And dire revenge, that never sleeps,
Still calls for blood, still shakes the sword.

Restless ambition roaming o'er
The affrighted globe, where'er he treads
The fields are drench'd in human gore,
And cities bow their tow'ry heads.

Loud discontent and dumb despair,
Suspicion glancing oft behind,
And slighted love, with frantic air,
Blaspheming heaven and stars unkind.

Thrice happy swains! your silent hours
These midnight furies ne'er molest;
Furies that climb the loftiest towers,
And tear the splendid tyrant's breast.

Sleep on, bless'd innocents, secure,
Soon will the wintry storms be flown
Soon comes the spring-tide breathing pure,
And summer suns are all your own.

ODE IV.

TO SLEEP.

Offspring of night, whose languid visage wears
Death's milder lineaments! thy friendly art
With lenient balm the drooping soul repairs,
And in a sweet oblivion laps the heart.
Come, gentle queen, thy noiseless wings diffuse,
And o'er my humble cell ah! shake thy opiate dews.

The vent'rous seaman, 'midst the rocking shrouds,
Touch'd by thy potent wand, his toil foregoes,
And, while loud billows mingle with the clouds,
Hangs on the mast in terrible repose.
Stretch'd on his shield beneath tempestuous skies,
Thou bidst the warrior close his formidable eyes.

Then why, capricious power, to me delay'd
Thy blessings? peace protects my rural hill;
These tranquil haunts no ruder sounds invade
Than drowsy murmurs from a falling rill;
Than the warm whisper'd sigh, when lovers
true,
Beneath their favourite oak, their tender vows renew.

I know, and I applaud thy virtuous pride;
Thou wilt not lull the traitor's perjurd head;
Let mute attendants guard their patron's side,
And tapers burn around the nightly dead:
Yet still he wakes; yon faulchion gleaming nigh,
Betray his guilty fears, that groan his misery.

I know that from th' impure recess of lust,
The ghastly ruffian's floor with slaughter red,
Thou flyest; and bid'st stern conscience, ever just,
With all her furies haunt the accursed bed:
While horrid shrieks and livid light appal
The traveller wandering near the unhospitable wall.

I know that all the treasures of the west,
Or precious gems that eastern quarries hold,
Would ne'er from thee obtain one hour of rest,
For the pale slave whose bosom pants for gold;
Not all that nature's azure round contains Would bribe thee to the roof where hell-born malice reigns.

But am I these? my soul indignant spurns
The lying imputation: yet betray'd
To various ills, in dust and ashes mourns
Her ardour quench'd, her vivid powers decay'd;
Misfortune opes her quiver; lingering pain
And sickness dip the darts in more than Judean bane.

Some lofty minds, that boast a firmer frame,
Adversity's rough storms undaunted bear,
Their faculties expanding, brighter flame
Like Boreas blazing in a rougher air;
But in my feeble heart the spark divine
Fades as a dying lamp, and all its hopes decline.

Ah! when shall I, soft Sleep, thy influence find?
What happy clime the gentle charm will yield;
Waft me ye sails where blows the tepid wind
O'er orange groves, where citrons strew the field!

Ah! no, 'mid these my hapless youth has stray'd
Nor met thy soothing smiles beneath the fragrant shade.

Is there a sage, whose philosophic mind,
Lur'd by the moon's wan lustre, upward springs,
Swift as the darted beam, and, unconfin'd,
Its flight through planetary wonders wings?

Then may'st thou well thy useless power restrain,
Nor with lethargic clouds the bright conception stain.

Is there a bard, who, in seraphic lays
Sublime, and fill'd with spirit-piercing fire,
Pours to yon listening orbs his maker's praise?
'Twere sacrilege to hush the holy lyre,
A voice forbids, and angels listening round Strike their symphonious harps, while earth and heaven resound.

But when, like me, some pensive wretch withdrawn,
Far from the world within some darkling grove,
From dewy fingered eve to purple dawn,
Bemoans his sufferings like a wounded dove.
'Tis thine to give that boon, which now I crave,
Repose, profound as death, and silent as the grave.

I plead in vain—regardless of my woe,
No strain can win thee to this fluttering breast,
Yet soon that grave shall lay my sorrows low,
Where mingled sleep the oppressor and oppress'd,
'Till heaven to one eternal morn restore
My ravish'd eyes, and thou and death shall be no more.

INVOCATION TO HEALTH.

Written during a severe illness in the year 1798.

O nymph divine, of magic power,
Whose smiles can sooth each passing hour,
O hasten to the bed of pain,
And bid a sufferer rise again!

Thy presence banishes each grief,
And gives the wearied soul relief;
Makes the destroying fever fly,
With all its train of misery.

And bring the clear delights along,
To cheer my heart and glad my song;
Again with strength my sinews brace,
And call the colour to my face.

But haste thee nymph, nor long delay;
'Tis death to loiter on the way;
Disease preys deeply all the while;
Then haste and bless me with thy smile.

Unus vetusto genere, sed rebus novis. Phœd.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

DON THOMAS YRIARTE, a Spanish fabulist, in a volume of poetical apologues, propounds one as a version from Esop, and imagines the reader, under this impression, to descant largely on its merit and ingenuity; but when informed that it is an original of his vernacular tongue, to be as severe in his reprehension of the Spaniard, as he had been lavish in his eulogy on the Phrygian. Every person, conversant with the biography of literature, must perceive how forcibly the moral deducible from this fiction, applies to letters in general, and particularly to the fate of works of imagination. Among the smaller productions of our language, now dignified by universal and enthusiastic admiration, there are many, I can venture to assert, which would have been consigned to oblivion, had they not come forth under the auspices of a reputation antecedently established, or propitiated public favour by some auxiliary, equally extrinsic and fortuitous. To the works of a writer already raised to literary eminence, the reader advances with anticipated reverence and expectant gratification; attention is roused to avoid the imputation of a narrow discernment, or a defective taste; the plastic power of imagination, if substantial do not abound, can easily create a multitude of ideal excellencies: every grace is invested with tenfold attraction, every remote allusion industriously pursued, and every latent beauty diligently scrutinized. When, on the contrary, the ground is not thus pre-occupied, when a man offers to the world his effusions, unsupported by adventitious aid, we are too apt to contemn as arrogant the claims of a new competitor for fame, to degrade his very excellencies to the level of imperfection, and look with indifference on a page which may teem with the most exalted felicities of fancy, which may breathe the native fire of genius, and sparkle with the radiance of the most polished wit. It is almost superfluous to mention, that Milton's Paradise Lost remained a long time neglected on the shelf, or that Cervantes, to procure readers for Don Quixote, was necessitated to publish an anonymous pamphlet, called 'Busca pié,' in which he pretended to prove his great performance to be only a covert satire on the chief grandees of Spain. Before men could be made to appreciate a work, one of the most perfect in its kind, and the most inimitable in its humour of any which can constitute the boast of a nation, it was requisite to lure them to the task, by holding out incentives to the avidity of malice, and the bitterness of spleen.

The consolations of the unfortunate Savage, in attributing the tardy sale of his poems either to their appearance at an unseasonable juncture, or to the inactivity of the printer in their circulation, were not, perhaps, so illusory as his learned biographer imagines: poverty may sometimes obscure the splendor of talent; the elevation of rank and the glitter of opulence not unfrequently annex to merit a lustre unattainable by its intrinsic force.

But let a Lord once own the happy lines,
How the wit brightens, how the style refines;
Before his sacred name flies every fault,
And each exalted stanza teems with thought.
POPE.

The foregoing remarks were principally suggested by the recent perusal of a legendary tale, intitled 'Edwin and Eltruda,' published several years ago in England, and written by Helen Maria Williams, a lady of some note in the poetical world. A narrative interwoven with superior skill, the most exquisite delicacy both of thought and expression, and a versification uncommonly harmonious, excited emotions of regret that the ingenious author does not appear to enjoy, with us at least, a degree of celebrity proportioned to her merit. If the reader be an admirer of the Hermit of Goldsmith, he will, perhaps, be grateful for an attempt to recommend to his attention, in the course of a few essays, the most striking beauties of a ballad, more complex and engaging in the narrative, no less mellifluous in the diction, equally tender and more diversified in the sentiment. Without wishing to detract from the just reputation of Goldsmith's poem, I am much inclined to believe that had it not been preceded by the Citizen of the World, or were it not associated with the Traveller and the Deserted Village, it would now only be found in some obscure collection of fugitive pieces. It is true, indeed, that productions of this subordinate nature seem to be mortal, if I may be allowed the expression, in their texture, and contain within themselves an inherent principle of corruption. 'The lucky trifles of genius,' says Johnson in his life of Waller, 'are flowers fragrant and fair, but of short duration, or blossoms only to be valued as they foretel fruit.' From them the poet reaps but a deciduous laurel, and gathers a wreath destined to wither with the brow which it incircles. They may be assimilated to the light edifices that are susceptible of all the graces of neatness, of all the decorations of fancy, and the refinements of taste, but are constructed more for the purposes of temporary pleasure than lasting utility. The epic or the drama, to those lofty piles of gothic architecture, which, in the design, require the most comprehensive amplitude of thought, and the ultimate extent of vigorous invention: in their execution, the toilsome assiduities of labour, and the gradual improvements of time; which exact materials such as may qualify them to swell the mind with mingled emotions of the sublime and the beautiful, to awe by their grandeur, and astonish by their magnificence, to brave the fury of tempests and the dilapidation of ages.

Quod non imber edax, non aquilo impotens
Possit diruere, aut innumerabilis
Annorum series, et fuga temporum.

Before we enter upon our particular object, it may be proper to make some preliminary remarks on the nature and present state of the ballad or legendary tale. Addison has intimated in one of his critical papers, and I have seen the same idea frequently inculcated, that our ancient ballads, under the veil of an uncouth phraseology, conceal passages eminently poetical, and warm with the genuine glow of passion. The student must have found himself egregiously deceived, who, upon the strength of such authority, has searched our legendary lore, animated by a hope of extracting the diamond from its incrustation. Instead of an enamelled path, you explore a barren waste, and tread an ungrateful soil, with nothing either to interest curiosity, to gratify the taste, to recreate the imagination; the solitary flower that may sometimes be culled is chiefly valuable, because it is rare.

Pro molli viola, pro purpureo narcisso,
Carduus et spinis surgat paliurus acutis;
Infelix lolium et steriles dominantur avena.

I could wish no more satisfactory exemplification of the correctness of this opinion, than 'Chevy Chase,' selected by Addison as most worthy of commendatory criticism. Those 'wonderfully beautiful strokes, that eloquent language of nature,' and the 'majestic simplicity' on which he dwells with such encomiastic fervour, and lavishes so much classical erudition, if they do exist, must be reserved for souls particularly congenial, or uncommonly perspicacious.

A similar penury of merit seems to obtain among the modern imitations of the historical ballad, few of which deserve a specific enumeration. The first, in general estimation, is the Hermit of Goldsmith, cursorily mentioned above. Were it not almost heterodox in taste to animadvert on any thing from his pen, I might be induced to remark that it is rather too barren of occurrence, and seems to want that systematic tenor of plan, which serves to awaken curiosity, and enchain attention. But to counterbalance this deficiency, he has exercised those inimitable powers that blunt the acumen of criticism, and preclude the interposition of intellect by exciting, and in a manner monopolizing, the most delightful feelings of our nature; his language is irresistibly operative, his images are those 'which find a mirror in every mind,' his sentiments those 'to which every bosom returns an echo.' Langhorne's 'Owen of Carron,' more intricate in the fable, and enriched by a greater combination of incident, labours under an analogous desideratum, that of a plan regularly concatenated, and a catastrophe linked with an consequent to the main design. The integrity of action, prescribed by Aristotle for the epic and the drama, is almost universally applicable; the action of every poem should be continuous, and a writer carefully avoid any abruption in the chain that ought to unite the exordium with the consummation. The 'Owen of Carron,' however, is recommended by the same superior melody of numbers, the same nervous and captivating simplicity, the 'curiosa felicitas,' which characterise the 'Fables of Flora;' Langhorne touches a chord that momentarily vibrates in unison with the heart, and if he resembles Goldsmith in his defects, he has drawn his beauties from the same source, from the liberal infusions of nature, not the factitious accumulation of study or art. Dr. Percy's Hermit of Warkworth and other legendary tales, are elaborate indeed, but tedious and jejune. Where our end is to kindle sensibility, on no subject can it be effectuated by the mere 'studium sine divite venâ,' by a mere imitation of passion, or the substitution of artificial embellishment for native warmth.

The quatrain, or alternate verse of six and eight syllables, is eminently calculated to convey that delicate simplicity, which forms a leading and essential feature in this branch of poetry, and distinguishes the ballads of Bruce, Logan, Cawthorn, and others, who have cultivated it with success. In the Lyceum of La Harpé, a late French critic, it is accurately observed, that simplicity of diction is incompatible with refinement of thought 'La simplicité du tons n'exclut point la finesse du sens.' There is a simplicity, both of phrase and conception, that should enter into the constitution of minor poems, a simplicity alike remote from the elevation of the sublime, and the grossness of vulgarity, from which the poet cannot deviate without a simultaneous deviation from the spirit and perfection of his subject. The 'mens diviniore' and the 'verbū ardens' belong not to him, but are attributes of the epic, the dramatic, or the lyric poet. It is their province to tread 'with the long majestic march,' to exalt 'with the full resounding line,' and display all the pomp of poetical grandiloquence: to make Jupiter shake his ambrosial curls, and agitate Olympus with his nod; to depict the Messiah, irradiated by the effulgence of the godhead, hurling destruction on the rebel host of spirits: they alone may yield to that sacred transport, which is supposed to pervade and animate the breast of the bard,

Impetus ille sacer qui vatum pectora nutrit.

or indulge in the ardent enthusiasm, the abrupt and impetuous transition, the 'raptur'd thought and vision wild' of the Norse ode,

Tam furor humanus nostroe pectore sensus expulit.

those bold anomalies of the Runic Muse, that disdain the trammels of rule, and the sober duties of methodical deduction.

[To be Continued.]

MISCELLANY.

The ensuing remarks on British Ladies, in 'high life,' are from the pen of the Younger Lyttleton. There is a grossièreté in some of the ideas, which serves to mark the libertinism of their author. On the whole, however, the picture is valuable. Michael Angelo stabbed a man that he might transplant his agony and distortion into the face of his Christ on the cross. Lyttleton could paint with equal exactness, without the trouble of a special experiment.

"I plead guilty to a very trifling part of the charge which you bring against me; but I peremptorily deny that the accusing lady is a woman of virtue. Do you believe that every wife, who does not advance into the guilt of adultery, is a virtuous character? Is it your opinion, that every unmarried lady, who does not keep a handsome footman, or make an occasional retreat into the country, to drink asses milk for a dropsy, has a right to boast of chastity? Alas! sir, I know many of these, and hear daily of more, who, though they have not been guilty of what is pre-eminently called a criminal deviation from the nuptial vow or virgin honour, possess more unchaste minds, than many of those forlorn wretches, who gain their daily bread by the miserable trade of nocturnal prostitution.

Your artful, angry, or disappointed relation... for I have not yet decided which of these epithets is most applicable to her present situation, makes out a strange and horrid story from the ordinary occurrence of an accidental half hour's tete a tete. I found her, par hazard, alone, and in those spirits which seemed to ask for that kind of libertine badinage, which, in her more sober humour, would not have been exerted. The idle raillery was parried by her with much skill and coquetry: she neither retired into another room, nor rung for a servant to shew me the door, or even discovered a gleam of disapprobation by a moment's gravity. On the contrary, she pressed my longer stay, and, at my departure, reproached me for the infrequency of my visits. But, stung with the mortification that her upbraidings were thrown away, (excuse, I beseech you, the necessary vanity of my justification), she ~~has~~ thought proper to cry aloud against me, to revenge what she might consider as a neglect, or, perhaps, to make the world believe that she was still capable of inspiring such a violence of passion, which, in her history, so irresistibly impelled me to make an adventurous attack upon her virtue. It really concerns me, that you should be at once the engine of her malicious rage, and the dupe of your own amiable credulity. Her threats, though they were to take her own shape, would not alarm me; but she knows too much of the wicked world to put them in execution:....believe me, my friend, she will not give her many enemies such advantage over her.

I shall plead guilty, in a more general manner, to another charge which our accusing spirit has brought against me, that I have an ill opinion of our cotemporary women in high life. The corruption of these present times is in no degree so strongly marked as by the modern profligacy of female manners. Examine the catalogue of those ladies, whose rank, beauty, accomplishments or fortune, give them an influence in the great world, and then tell me what you think of the present state of superior female character. Is their rank employed to give an example to the inferior orders? Is their beauty exerted in the various services of virtue? Are their accomplishments exercised in confirming and prolonging the duration of virtuous affection? And is their fortune taxed with relief to poverty, encouragement to arts, or protection to science, otherwise than in subservience to the caprices of fashion? Is a simplicity of character visible in female youth after fourteen years of age? And does not the reign of coquetry commence before, and oftentimes long before, that period? Trace the course of fashionable education from the cradle to the altar; examine, with attention, the efforts and views of maternal tenderness in the circle of your own society; and tell me where is that perfection of female character,...for it might every where exist,...which can awe the most dissolute into respect and admiration. You must very well know, that the passion of the most impassioned is very rarely indeed so irresistible as to inflame with the design of carrying the fortress of chastity by a coup de main; and when such attempts are made, it is some visible breach in the outworks which encourages to that fierce mode of conquest. A chaste, virtuous woman is an awful character; something supernatural seems to surround and shroud her from the profane approaches of Seduction. Innocence may be seduced, and Ignorance may be deceived; but Chastity, founded on the basis of PURE VIRTUE, holds forth to the eye of the most artful, as well as the most rampant Lust, the repulsive evidence of impregnable security.

You must well remember where we dined together not many weeks ago; nor can it have been possible for you to forget the friendly apprehensions which our hostess expressed, lest the House of Commons should detain Mr....., as she was sure Lady..... would not be in tolerable humour, if she was not of the party. At length, however, they both came, were carefully placed together at table, and seemed in perfect contentment. Now, all this pretty business was managed in chaste society, and in a virtuous house; nevertheless, it appeared to me, that the mistress of it, even in the presence of her daughters, did little less than promote the progress of adultery. This, you see, is so common an arrangement, that Mrs....., who holds herself forth as a woman of renowned discretion, considered it as a matter of course. I wonder much that you will suffer such rare virtue, as dwells in that most amiable woman, whom you possess, to risk the taint of such societies.

I would forgive the artifice of dress, and the little hypocrisies of personal decoration; they originate from a desire to please, and can never produce any fatality of deception: but wearing a mask upon the mind, and the giving a fallacious appearance to character, is a forgery that becomes oftentimes more fatal to happiness and honour, than a crime of the same title which never finds mercy. How many women are there now flaunting about our world, who have made use of the falsest pretences to obtain a settlement and a husband; and, when they have succeeded, not only throw aside the painted veil, which covered them, but laugh at the poor, hapless dupe, who reproaches their duplicity!

They daub their tempers o'er with washes
As artificial as their faces:

and while some of them condescend to appear charming, both in mind and person, to all the world, poor Benedick, who possesses the envied privilege of going behind the curtain, alone sees the decomposition of that beauty and virtue, which leaves not a look or a wish to please behind them.

That excellent woman, whom you have the supreme happiness to call your own, is, as I have been told, the only one of her sex who deigns to say a word in my favour. The reason, my dear sir, is evident; she is the only one, I know, who possesses a sufficient share of real, intrinsic virtue to keep me, in her presence, in the most patient and satisfactory decorum. Those charms, which, while they allure, correct, and, while they delight, improve, are of rare growth; and it becomes the interest of a corrupt world to employ its contagion to their destruction. This is a language which you might not expect from such an incorrigible sinner as I am; but, believe me, is that of all the tribe, when reason resumes her lucid interval: and if the women of coquetry, vanity and intrigue, knew how much their most devoted, admired and familiar favourites, at times, despise and speak of them, they would have recourse to the sincerity of virtue, to obtain honest praise, real admiration, and solid pleasure.

It will afford me no small satisfaction to hear that I have laid your spirit of censure, and that, on this subject at least, it will haunt me no more: for though public severity hardens me more and more against public opinion, I should ever wish to justify myself to you, when I possess any means of justification.....You will do me the favour to present my very sincere respects to Mrs....., and receive the affectionate regard of

Your faithful, &c."

FROM A LATE LONDON PAPER.

ALDERMAN BOYDELL.

The following letter from this venerable, enlightened and liberal patron of the Arts, to Sir John Anderson, is so honourable to the feelings of the writer, and exhibits such a just and modest statement of the advantages which this nation has derived from his exertions in commerce, as well as taste, that it is well intitled to the notice of the public, who will, of course, take a strong interest in the success of a plan necessary to enable him to close his meritorious life in ease and tranquillity.

[COPY.]

Cheapside, Feb. 4, 1804.

DEAR SIR,

The kindness with which you have undertaken to represent my case, calls upon me to lay open to you, with the utmost candor, the circumstances attending it, which I will now endeavour to do as briefly as possible.

It is above sixty years since I began to study the art of Engraving; in the course of which time, besides employing that long period of life in my profession, with an industry and assiduity that would be improper in me to describe, I have laid out with my brethren, in promoting the commerce of the fine arts in this country, above three hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

When I first began business, the whole commerce of prints, in this country, consisted in importing foreign prints, principally from France, to supply the cabinets of the curious in this kingdom. Impressed with the idea, that the genius of our own countrymen, if properly encouraged, was equal to that of foreigners, I set about establishing a School of Engraving, in England, with what success the public are well acquainted. It is, perhaps, sufficient at present to say, that the whole course of that commerce is changed, very few prints being now imported into this country, while the foreign market is principally supplied with prints from England.

In effecting this favourite plan, I have not only spent a long life, but have employed near forty years of the labours of my nephew, Josiah Boydell, who has been bred to the business, and whose assistance, during that period, has been greatly instrumental in promoting a school of Engraving in this country. By the blessing of Providence these exertions have been very successful, not only in that respect, but in a commercial point of view, for the large sums I regularly received from the continent, previous to the French revolution, for impressions taken from the numerous plates engraved in England, encouraged me to attempt also an English school of Historical Painting.

I had observed, with indignation, that the want of such a school had been long made a favourite topic of opprobrium against this country, among foreign writers, on the subject of national taste.

No subject could, therefore, be more appropriate for such a national attempt, than England's inspired poet and great painter of nature, SHAK-

SPEARE; and I flatter myself the most prejudiced foreigner must allow, that the Shakspeare Gallery will convince the world, that Englishmen want nothing but the fostering hand of encouragement to bring forth their genius in this line of art. I might go further, and defy any of the Italian, Flemish, or French Schools, to shew such an exertion as the Shakspeare Gallery, every artist, partaking of the freedom of his country, and endowed with that originality of thinking, so peculiar to its natives, has chosen his own road to what he conceived to be excellence, unshackled by the slavish imitation and uniformity that pervade all the foreign schools.

This Gallery I once flattered myself with being able to have left to that generous public, who have, for so long a period, encouraged my undertakings; but unfortunately for those connected with the Fine Arts, a Vandalick revolution has arisen, which, in convulsing all Europe, has entirely extinguished, except in this happy Island, all those who had the taste, or the power to promote these Arts; while the tyrant, who at present governs France, tells that believing and besotted nation, that, in the midst of all his robbery and rapine, he is a great patron and promoter of the Fine Arts, just as if those arts, that polish and humanize mankind, could be promoted by such means, and by such a man!

You will excuse, my dear sir, I am sure, some warmth in an old man, on this subject, when I inform you that this unhappy revolution has cut up by the roots that revenue from the continent which enabled me to undertake such considerable works in this country. At the same time, as I am laying my case fairly before you, it should not be disguised, that my natural enthusiasm for promoting the Fine Arts, (perhaps buoyed up with success), made me improvident. For had I laid by but 10l. out of every 100l. my plates produced, I should not now have had occasion to trouble my friends, or appeal to the public. But, on the contrary, I flew with impatience to employ some new artist with the whole gains of my former undertakings. I see too late my error, for I have thereby decreased my ready money, and increased my stock of copperplates to such a size that all the print-sellers in Europe could not purchase it, especially at these times, so unfavourable to the Fine Arts.

Having thus candidly owned my error, I have but one word to say in extenuation. My receipts from abroad had been so large, and continued so regular, that I, at all times, found them fully adequate to support my undertakings at home. I could not calculate on the present crisis, which has totally annihilated them. I certainly calculated on some defalcation of these receipts by a French or Spanish war, or both. But with France or Spain I carried on but little commerce. Flanders, Holland, and Germany, who no doubt supplied the rest of Europe, were the great marts. But, alas! they are now no more. The convulsion that has disjoined and ruined the whole continent I did not foresee. I know no man that did. On that head, therefore, though it has nearly ruined me and mine, I can take but little blame to myself.

In this state of things I throw myself with confidence upon that public, who have always been but too partial to my endeavours, for the disposal of that which, in happier days, I flattered myself to have presented to them. I know of no means by which that can be effected just now, but by a Lottery, and if the Legislature will have the goodness to grant a permission for that purpose, they will at least have the assurance of the even tenor of a long life, that it will be fairly and honourably conducted.

The objects of it are my Pictures, Galleries, Drawings, &c. which, unconnected with my copper-plates and trade, are much more than sufficient to pay, if properly disposed of, all I owe in the world.

I hope you, my dear sir, and every honest man, at any age, will feel for my anxiety to discharge my debts, but, at my advanced age of eighty-five, I feel it become doubly desirable.

I am, dear sir, with great regard,

Your obedient and obliged servant,

(Signed) JOHN BOYDELL.

SIR J. W. ANDERSON, Bart.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH-DAY OF

ROBERT BURNS.

On Saturday the 28th ult. a select party of the friends and admirers of our native bard met at the cottage in which he was born to celebrate his birth-day. Immediately after dinner, an ode, composed for the occasion, was read to the company.

The memory of the bard, the patroness of the feast, the laureat of the day, and similar toasts, afforded to the Preses an opportunity of communicating to the meeting a manuscript, which he stated from respectable authority, to be the production of one of the sons of our lamented poet. The Preses sung it to an appropriate air, and we give it to our readers for their perusal.

Hae ye seen in the fresh dewy morning
The wild warbling red-breast sae cear?
Or the low dwelling snaw-breasted gowan,
Surcharg'd wi' mild e'ening's soft tear?

O then ye hae seen my ain lassie,
The lassie I lo'e best of a';
But, O! frue the hame of my lassie,
I'm mony a lang mile awa.

Her hair is the wings of the black-bird,
Her eye is the eye of the dove,
Her lips are the mild-blushing rose-bud,
Her bosom's the palace of love.

Alas! when I sit down to study,
I now can do naething at a';
My book, I indeed keep my eyes on,
My thoughts are wi' her that's awa.

O Love! thou'rt a dear fleeting pleasure,
The sweetest we mortals here know;
Ah! soon is thy heaven bright gleaming
O'ercast with the dark cloud of wo'.

Thus the moon, on the oft changing ocean,
Delights the worn sailor's glad eye,
When red rush the storms of the desert,
And the wild waves dark tumble on lugh.

Mr. Alderman Shaw of London, an Ayrshire gentleman, some time after the death of our admired poet, patronised a subscription for the behoof of his widow and children. The sum so raised was vested in the three per cent. reduced annuities, and amounted to 500l. of that stock. As the parish of Ayr had given birth to the bard, the alderman wished that the provost and bailies of Ayr should take the management of this fund for their behoof, which they cheerfully accepted. One day last week, the alderman, while in company with Sir Francis Baring, the conversation turned on Mr. Burns, and the circumstances of his family, and being told that he had promoted a subscription for their relief, the worthy Baronet, who is a warm admirer of our poet, begged that he also might have the honour of being a contributor, and immediately put into his hands 100l. sterling, which was also brought into the same stock, and the receipt sent to the magistrates, and with the 100l. makes 676l. 19s. 10d. 3 per cents, standing in the name of the provost and bailies of the town of Ayr, for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Burns, the Ayrshire poet. We have additional pleasure in stating that Mr. Addington had assumed the patronage of Mr. Burns's eldest son Robert, and will soon place him in one of the public offices under government, where the road to honour and celebrity will lie fair before him.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Continued.

Our object at Bex was, as I before informed you, to see the only salt-works in Switzerland, and which we had been advised to visit as an object worthy our attention. Early this morning, therefore, we set off in a char-a-banc, furnished by our landlord, and after a ride of about a league, arrived at the foot of the mountains where the salines are. When we had ascended as far as the house of the man who superintends the mines, he made us tie a handkerchief round our heads, and put on a coarse dark wrapper with a hood, which completely covered us. Thus equipped, like two capuchin friars, with each a lamp in his hand, we sallied forth to enter the subterraneous passages, which were cut horizontally in the rock, with great regularity, but were so narrow, that we could only walk one after the other. In this manner we traversed an extent of galleries of near a quarter of a league, which brought us to the great wheel, distant three thousand French feet from the place where we entered at, and we were told the miners had got 1600 feet farther.

These excavations have been carried on with a view to discover, if possible, the mass of rock salt which is supposed by some to exist, and which gives the saline impregnation to the waters which issue from the mountains; but from some late geological discoveries, it is highly probable no such mass will ever be found, and the formation of the salt springs are very ingeniously and naturally accounted for by the nature of the earths through which the waters filtrate, and which, under certain circumstances, may, by chemical combinations, be adequate to their production. An opinion, similar to this, was also entertained by the celebrated Haller, who was manager here for some time. The works carried on under the error, were, however, very great, and we passed several lateral galleries, which led into the mountain, but without producing the desired discovery; one of these, we were told, descends at least eight hundred feet, and we found it so beautifully and regularly formed, that we followed the flight of steps, cut out of the solid rock, for some distance, and were recompensed by some very pretty spars, which we detached from the rocks.

Our guide told us that the galleries were so numerous, that it would require a whole day to visit them all; he, therefore, only shewed us the principal ones. He made us descend one of them about fifty steps, to observe a very large reservoir, intended to receive the water when the wheels, which raise it to the surface, were out of order. It was in the shape of a triangle, whose greatest length was one hundred feet, and breadth eighty. The depth was nine feet.

Our guide took us by surprise, and almost stunned us by shutting with violence the door which opened to this place. The noise was like the loudest thunder, and was re-echoed by the walls of the reservoir and galleries, thro' which it rolled majestically for many seconds.

At the distance of three thousand feet from the entrance, we came to a large apartment in which is the greatest curiosity of the place. This is an immense wheel, thirty-seven feet in diameter, put in motion by the smallest power of water I ever saw, and which performs all operations of pumping up the salt water into the reservoir. Immediately over the wheel is a shaft, which, at the height of four hundred feet, opens on the top of the mountain; and we were delighted with the appearance of day-light through the aperture, which from these dark recesses had double beauty.

On issuing from the mine, we descended the mountain to the building, where the brine conveyed there, under ground, by upwards of two thousand pipes, was evaporated by heat, and the salt, collected in the large shallow iron pans, was put into a ware-house for use. The quantity of salt obtained in this manner is about three per cent. of the weight of water.

Near this is another building, called the Graduating House, which is pointed out to strangers as an object of attention. It is simply an open frame building, but with a roof, it is full of thorn bushes piled one upon another, through which the waters which are but weakly impregnated are made to filtrate; thereby exposing nearly every particle to the action of the air; by which means it undergoes a considerable evaporation after it has passed several times through these bushes, and yields, on being boiled, twenty-four per cent. The pumps which elevate the water to the height required in this building, which is about sixty feet, are worked by a large wheel of thirty-three feet diameter, which is preserved from the weather in a covered building of its own form.

The quantity of salt supplied by these works is however not sufficient for one-third of the consumption of the Swiss cantons, and since they are no longer under the management of Berne, less care and attention have been bestowed to make them productive. Formerly one hundred men were constantly employed in blowing the rock in search of salt, as well as more springs; at present there are only six at work, who relieve each other night and day. The salt sells at the works at as high as six and eight sols per pound, which is almost four dollars per bushel.

We returned to our inn about noon, and on the road were gratified by the sight of some very high mountains, which the clouds and fogs of the morning had hitherto concealed from our view. Amongst these was the Dent du Midi, which presents a very singular shape, having for its summit a rock in the form of a tooth, which gives name to the mountain. There are several others in this neighbourhood present similar appearances, and are called also Dents.

When we left Lausanne, it was partly with an intention, if the weather favored us, of attempting to penetrate into the valley of Chamouni, so celebrated by travellers for the sublime beauties it contains. Much to our mortification and dissatisfaction, clouds and fogs continually obscured the day, and so discouraged us that we resolved to give up all idea of it. As there was however the most celebrated cascade in Switzerland a few leagues distant, in the Vallais, we determined to devote the afternoon to see it, and have accordingly ordered an early dinner to allow us time for that purpose.

Martigny, at night.

About two o'clock we left Bex. A few miles brought us to the famous bridge of St. Maurice, which formerly divided Savoy from Switzerland, but which now separates the Helvetian from the French republic. It is a noble bridge, whose single arch bestrides the Rhone, and is admired by connoisseurs for its boldness and simplicity; it is supposed to have been built by the Romans, as the place was a Roman station. A gateway connects the bridge with the rock on the side of the Rhone, and the village of St. Maurice fills up the space between the mountains and the other side, rendering this a pass of great strength, and easy to be defended.

The moment we entered the Vallais, we perceived a manifest difference between the Vallaisans and the people we had just left, whose neatness formed a striking contrast with the dirt of the former. Their personal difference is also extremely remarkable, for never in my life did I behold an uglier race of beings. The Vallaisans are small and deformed, rarely having both eyes alike, and almost universally goitres or cretins. You know, I believe, that a goitre is the name of a tumour which rises on the throat sometimes to a great size, and that a cretin is a natural idiot. I saw one of these goitres nearly as large as my head, and so weighty that it was supported by a handkerchief which passed under it, and was tied at the back of the neck. The ordinary size is that of a large apple. Some are born with them; others never have them.

But the greatest misfortune of these poor people is, that numbers are born or become cretins... who have not a single idea, can neither speak, nor can be made to comprehend the least thing. They are unfortunately very common, and are mostly goitres. They are short and have a big head. I saw one who was very merry, and laughed incessantly; he was employed by his mother to rock the cradle of an infant, and could articulate one or two words as well as comprehend signs; he seemed fond of money, and eagerly took what we offered him.

The cause which produces goitres and cretins is hitherto undiscovered, though many conjectures have been made respecting it. It is presumed they are both produced by the same, as they are almost invariably connected in some way or other. I have however seen goitres in many parts of Switzerland, but never had the misfortune to find a cretin till I entered the Vallais.

Not far from St. Maurice we came to the cascade, which bursts from a cleft in a lofty precipice, and shoots out into the valley in a grand style. It possesses all the beautiful accidents of a waterfall, and forms many small ones as it strikes the projections of the rock. This elegant cascade is universally admired as one of the finest in Switzerland.

As the day declined, the sky cleared up, and the Vallais presented some charming wild scenery. The faint prospect of a few fine days soon upon me, that I proposed to my companion to undertake the tour to Chamouni, which was not many leagues distant. He however declined it, alledging the uncertainty of the pleasure expected from it, and the lateness of the season. My mind was however so bent upon it, that rather than lose so favourable an opportunity of seeing the greatest wonder of the Alps, I resolved to visit them alone, and appointed Geneva for our place of rendezvous... He returned in the carriage to Bex, and I, poor solitary I, with only the cloaths I had on my back, and a few louis in my pocket, set out on foot for this place, which was about a league and a half from where we separated. At any other time and with less temptations I should have revolted at the idea of travelling alone, and with the same linen on my back for a week together, but the grand ideas of Mont Blanc, and the glaciers of Savoy, were sufficient to induce me to submit to any hardships.

I was not long walking to this village, which is a place of little consequence, except as a thorough fare to the Great Saint Bernard and the Upper Vallais. Near it a Roman camp is supposed to have been stationed, but no traces of it now remain. The weekly market is the great resort of the neighbouring peasants, who bring their small manufactures, their cheese and honey.

With this delicious honey, and some other little trifles, I have just made an exquisite supper, and must now bid you good night.

DUELLING.

.....Atque ita porro,
Pugnabant armis.

HOR. LIB. I. SAT. 3. v. 104.

This fashionable and equally dreadful mode of adjusting differences by summoning to the tribunal of death, the unfortunate victims to the ungoverned fury of licentious bravos, has of late received such sanction from the boasted heroism of the younger part of the community, that unless some step is adopted whereby its accelerating progress may be effectually arrested, either by universal protestation against the practice, or by the interposition of legislative and executive authority—it is to be apprehended that the consequences alone will be admitted as an argument to prove the barbarity of such appeals. I am well aware that those insolent braggadocios who derive such exquisite pleasure in converting to cowardice every argument which a moralist might use to shew the absurdity of such doctrine, may ascribe these remarks to the effects of fear disguised under the mask of conscience: And on that account I am prepared to receive with patience and due submission to syllogistical or logical reasoning, every construction which they in their enthusiastic notions of honor, may deem proper to pass on this short essay. That this method of redress is not indicative of bravery or honor, is exemplified in the persons and general characters of those who make a profession of it. A man conscious of the injustice of an aspersion, is ready as well as able to vindicate his character, not by appealing to the pistol, as if Providence would intercede, to direct the contents to the heart of the transgressor, but by the more consolatory mode of proving him to be a malicious calumniator. There are indeed some cases wherein invitations of this nature are indispensable and unavoidable; for every man claims as a natural and unalienable right the protection of his character and honor. But would not a suitable apology be thought more compatible with the true principles of honor, than to place your life in jeopardy on account of your own misfeasance? Does honor consist in dogmatically supporting a bad cause, and asserting, at the risk of life, rights where you have no just claim? Let every one answer that question himself. The true criterion, and only prominent feature of this attribute of a gentleman, is to fear nothing but the commission of an unworthy act. An apology in the nature of a representation, would satisfy the most abject heart, if made at a proper moment.

"Ira furor brevis est,"

And undoubtedly a mind of the nicest delicacy could not feel repugnant in so doing—as a confession of error or mistake is not incongruous with the dignity of a man, but tends to perpetuate that friendship and reciprocity of esteem which would have been dissolved by an implicit obedience to an obstinate temper.

Having thus shewn how a mortal appeal may be evaded where the cause of a dissension was such as would justify a severe retort, I will now suggest my ideas on cases where offence is only conceived from ambiguous words, misconstruction of the intention, and then take a superficial view of the satisfaction gained thereby. Experience affords more instances where offence is taken, than where it is intended to be given—as where expressions inoffensive and innocent, "in se," though involved in abstruse phrases or complicated puns, undergo a fermentation in the mind of a captious or contentious person, and are transmuted into the most opprobrious insults. Whenever this happens to be the case, an explanation is demanded in a tone so peremptory, that even the mildest disposition must conceive a replication equally angry, the only alternative in such a predicament. Thus their animosity increases, and thus their answers betray the most evident tokens of accumulated spleen; each, tenacious of his honour, re-acts upon his opponent with redoubled energy, until a reciprocal attempt on the other's life, can alone effect a mutual acquiescence. Is every spark of reason and philanthropy quenched in the general deluge of your senses? Must the voice of nature vainly resound in your ears and plead for the suspension of your rash design? Does the precognition of the future disconsolate state of your relations, should you be hurried to an immature grave, make no impression on you? Has life no endearments, are there no connubial, parental, filial or social duties, to be yet discharged? Or, have you already imbibed the infernal atheistical doctrine of "Post mortem nihil," that the helpless situation of your soul, when arraigned to appear before its Creator, should merit no consideration? These are points of great moment, but alas! when the mind is thus actuated by inordinate passion, and blinded by the alluring dictates of false honor, nature may vainly plead the cause of prostrate humanity. For the better elucidation of this scene, let it be granted that your adversary has been wholly in fault, and as such has merited and received the reward of his indiscretion—Is there no compunction of conscience to haunt your mind, and render your life miserable, or does the recollection of being the instrument of another's dissolution prove a source of gratification? Perhaps you wish to diffuse terror, by acquiring the reputation of a duellist, and secure respect by exacting it. But be assured, that with whatever hopes, parasites and poltroons may glut you, the respect of an honest man is only obtained by deserving it. And in order to shew how weak and chimerical is the expectation of intimidating a man of upright conduct, I remember no exemplification so pertinent and comprehensive as that inimitable ode in which he is represented as an unconcerned spectator amidst "the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds."

Integer vitæ, scelerisque purus
Non eget Mauri jaculis neque arcu,
Nec venenatis gravida sagittis,
Fusce, pharetra; &c.

HORACE.

The event of these references is likewise always precarious and often fatal. Still, in the paroxysm of rage, there is invariably an innate and occult goad perpetually stimulating the parties, which precludes the necessity of considering the justice of their respective causes. There is an equal chance that the person demanding amends may meet the fate he intended for his antagonist. And is it an enviable or satisfactory reparation to have your brains blown out, or your bones dislocated and broken, because your peace of mind has been disturbed? If the offence is too heinous to be overlooked, why not seek redress at a court of justice? Or in case that should be esteemed a mean appeal, let the aggressor feel the effect of the injury, communicated by the united strength of a few friends in case of personal disability, through the medium of a horse whip, proportionally thereto applied to his back. This would work a reformation in him more effectually, and afford far more satisfaction, than participating in the consequences of his impetuosity.

The character of a duellist is a recommendation to no one. I never observed any additional respect paid to this exhibition of courage; but on the contrary, if more than usual politeness has been observed towards a practitioner in the art, it was merely to pacify and preserve unruffled his temper, with the same view that a madman or lunatic is flattered and caressed, to prevent mischief. If the taste is so vitiated that the sight of human blood can alone promote satisfaction or satiate the cravings of a depraved and sensual appetite, let the valour, which would prostitute the intent of nature by such acts of rashness, be displayed with credit, in repelling from our coasts the subverters of our laws and the enemies of our country.

CLITOPHON.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE LAY PREACHER.

[The subsequent sermon was originally written in the "country, at a season, when the author had resolved to forsake his retirement, and mingle with men. A republication now is necessary to the integrity of the series. It is, moreover, the herald of future essays.]

"Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly diving?"

I believe I have never informed my readers that I am of Scottish descent, and that I am not a little vain of Caledonian ancestry. Unluckily, however, from the slenderness of my figure, the weakness of my brain, and infrequency of my application, I fear I resemble the North Briton, only by birth. Degenerate as I am, my ancestors have either usefully cultivated

"The green sedge banks of the sweet winding Tay," or have valiantly repelled the incursions of the bloody borderer. I sigh, when I reflect how languidly ~~their blood rolls~~ in my veins. Happy could I rival their deeds, as easily as trace my pedigree, and prove myself a genuine Scot, by being valiant, like Douglas, and learned like Buchanan.

Of one species of Highland lore I fairly inherit a small portion. I allude to the gift of second sight. I am sometimes favoured with a partial glimpse of futurity, and through the mists and fog of present time can see a little beyond. One of my forefathers was a seer, and from the Pisgah of the Hebrides, discerned through clear optics many a fair acre of the land of promise, and many a distant event, half hidden by the veil of obscurity. Of these aerial prospects, many sketches remain among the old family-lumber, and I am in possession of sufficient to furnish out a moderate gallery. Not only the pictures have been preserved, but the power of delineating them is not lost, and though I never gazed through the transparent air of Sky, or was elevated on the rocks of Raasay, I have, in a moderate degree, the prescience of my progenitors.

* "In deep solitude," the excursive mind will often wander to "tower'd cities," and the language of restless man is sometimes that of Shakespeare's Duke to the Friar:

My holy Sir, none better knows than you
How I have ever lov'd the life remov'd,
And held in idle price to haunt assemblies,
Where YOUTH, and COST, and witless BRAVERY keeps.

Yet, perhaps, it is oftener like that of vagrant Valentine:

Cease to persuade, my loving Proteus:
Home keeping youth have ever homely wits.

To this hereditary skill, must be added my proficiency in the occult sciences. Though no conjuror, and wretchedly inexpert in the casting of figures; though, ever since I left college, I have desisted from raising the Devil, and have not the honour of an acquaintance with the old lady of Endor; yet I know all the innocent processes of astrology, possess a wand to excite good spirits, have a curious talisman, the gift of Fancy, and

"Know many an amulet and charm,
That will do neither good, nor harm."

My readers would do me the greatest injustice, if they ranked me with

"Sir Agrippa, for profound
And solid lying much renown'd;"

or supposed that, like Matilda, or the Wandering Jew, in the "Monk," I am conversant with sable imps, or the sable art. This would ill become the gravity and duties of my character. I utterly disclaim all pretensions to sorcery, and exercise my gift of second sight, and my knowledge of natural causes and events, solely for the benefit of mankind. Neither do I turn over the volumes of my art, or employ my powers of vision for trivial purposes. I should disdain to act like Hudibras, and

"Examine Venus or the moon,
Who stole a thimble, or a spoon,
Or question Mars, and, by his look,
Detect who 'twas that nimm'd a cloak."

My objects are higher, and of a character more useful; to warn the thoughtless, to rouse the lazy, to discover Merit, and detect Danger.

Although many specimens of my conjectural sagacity have been given, in the course of these sermons, and that certain of my ruder readers have imagined I must have intrigued with the Devil to please my countrymen so long, yet many will be surprised that I have not openly manifested my gifts till now, and that I did not earlier associate the prophet to the priest. As I wish to conduct with the utmost frankness towards my courteous readers, and avoid the very "appearance of evil," and mystery, I will assign the reasons for my conduct, and why I have not given a single parishioner the opportunity of enquiring "Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is?"

From the style and subjects of every sermon, which I have published, it may easily be seen that my study was in the country. My rural situation has been often hinted to my readers; and if I had not told them this truth, my diction would have inevitably betrayed the provincial, and every topic would appear to have been started among groves and mountains. For four years, I have, as it were, surveyed life from a wood. My speculations have been those of a Hermit, who remembers what man was, rather than those of a man of business, or courtier, who holds an actual intercourse with society. In such a situation, where all my adventures, like those of the Vicar of Wakefield, were by the fire side, and all my migrations were from the blue bed to the brown; in a village retirement, among a frank and honest people, of primitive principles and uniform conduct, what necessity was there for inquiries concerning the morrow, when to-morrow would appear only the twin brother of to-day? The sameness and simplicity of sylvan life continue "yesterday, to-day, and forever." In the forest and farmer's cottage, an astrologer and a prophet, are almost as unnecessary as a man milliner, or a master of ceremonies.

As I contemplate a speedy exchange of country for city life, I deemed it expedient to advertise my talent for divination, and even to give some previous specimens of my art, in order to convince those vain men of the world, whom I expect to meet "in every creek and corner" of the capital, that I am not so simple, as my rustic habits and appearance would indicate. During my proposed residence amid the throng of nations, my sharpest second sight, and all my astrological arts, must be "in requisition." There, research into the future will be useful to relieve from the obscurity, perplexity, and entanglement of the present. In the city, if I did not play the magician, I should anticipate sinking into the dupe. The dissimulation, the artifice, the inconsistency, the mystery of man, in a crowd, are such, that my prescience will prove not only salutary to myself, but be a plentiful source of useful information to my readers. To this end I am making mighty preparations. I am daily cleaning the glasses of my telescopes,

"The spectacles, with which the stars
I read in smallest characters."

I am in treaty for the purchase of a Jacob's staff. I have made a contract for a crocodile and two alligators, to adorn my study, and heighten the world's opinion of my art. I have strained my second sight upon one of our highest mountains, and find no diminution of my Scottish perspicacity; and, next week, after an invocation to the benign powers, and drawing a circle or two, by way of flourish, I will publish my first prediction.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. LITERARY INTELLIGENCE. HUNT'S POEMS.

After a lingering delay, the natural effect of the base, ignominious, and republican mode of printing books by "subscription in this curious country, the ingenious Poems of Mr. J. H. L. HUNT have made their appearance. They are very neatly

*To the mortification of every generous and lofty spirit in America, this is a constant topic of sarcasm among the literati abroad. An eminent bookseller in London, when assured that even a national work was to be printed in this manner, could hardly be persuaded that it was possible. But, however foreign credulity may be staggered by the assertion, it is a fact, that even the smallest volume cannot peep from the Press, unless a subscription be both midwife and dry nurse on the occasion. The manner in which this subscription tax, or benevolence is collected, deserves a particular description for the edification and amusement of all anti-republicans. A sturdy fellow, with a competent quantity of proposals in his pocket, sets out, in company with Plausibility and Impudence, on this noble and desperate adventure. At every gate he knocks long, and clamours loud. If the ill-fated wight, whom he attacks, be occupied, or ill humored, or sick, or sorry, let meaner souls shrink from the encounter, our knight of the subscription figure undauntedly returns to the charge. No smiling excuse or probable suggestion, no artful evasion, or well devised delay, can save from these lists. The most reluctant miser, as well as the generous patron, is worried into a compliance with this shameful practice,

"Not by the force of carnal reason,
But indefatigable teasing."

By this precious process, continued through every city, town and hamlet, a sufficient number of names or dollars being gathered together, the bold bookseller forthwith engages in the stupendous, hazardous, and unparalleled adventure of printing and publishing a small edition. This is the uncouth state of literature in America, and to such miserable shifts the genius of republican polity, and the narrowness of republican notions, compel the debased citizens of a debased country to submit, as is in course and in character.

[Note, by the Editor.

printed, for the author, by Mr. Maxwell; and a second perusal of them corroborates that favourable opinion, which we have more than once expressed. 'The Palace of Pleasure,' the longest poem in the collection, nearly rivals Thomson's 'Castle of Indolence,' in the happiest imitation of Spenser, in distinctness and boldness of poetic painting, and in the rainbow brightness of the tints of Fancy. We cannot resist the desire to cull from this charming parterre a flowret, which will never fade.

Certes it is, and Saints have whilom said,
That worldly Pleasure is but worldly Woe,
In the hot bosom of the Passions bred,
Cradled by Tempests that ay rage and blow,
And taught ne Virtue, ne Advice to know:
Then comes a sickly Sunshine, deadly warm,
Shedding a gilded Pestilence below;
Within its beam fast fades the wasting form,
Till Night and Cloud succeed, and Turbulence and Storm.

There is, ywashed by the murm'ring main,
A fairy land, yclept Temptation's Isle,
So fair, it seem'd as Eden there had lain,
Such sweet Enchantment o'er the coast doth smile!
And ah! poor mortal wight it doth beguile
With waving trees that deck the shores around,
Which to the sight ne things unclean defile,
And velvet fields that glitter o'er the ground,
And purling streams, with groves and tufted verdure crown'd.

And on the air are dulcet chantings heard,
That trip to sound of soul-delighting lyre;
Yet ne in all their song one mournful word,
Ne plaintive strain that musing mote inspire,
But lively notes which Gaiety yfire,
Such as that noble harper, Orpheus hight,
Did sing to brutes, who wondered at the wire,
And with uncouth rejoicing would delight
To dance along the woods, in rugged liv'ry dight.

And right aloud the joyous birds did sing,
With melody confus'd that fill'd the sky:
The soaring Lark, with tawny-dappled wings,
And humbler Linnet with his gentle eye,
And gorgeous Finch, with breast of golden dye;
Ne fear'd the bright Canary there to dwell,
Ne chatt'ring Thrush that peeps with glancing sly;
But ne sad Nightingale mourn'd o'er the dell,
Ne Owl with flapping wings shrieking the notes of Hell.

Eke the bright Sun, as though he had stood still,
Shen'd o'er the beauteous land each rolling day;
And ting'd with gold the top of every hill,
And in each vale with burnish'd splendor lay;
So that Dame Nature did for aye look gay:
For though dark Night ycame with visage stern,
Yet then would Art his copied flame display,
And on each tree a hundred lamps yburn,
Which did new day relume, and gloom to radiance turn.

The Editor, fatigued with much expensive importunity of this kind, distinctly repeats, that every Bookseller, who transmits a request to notice any book, pamphlet, or literary project of any description, must send the amount of the subscription for this paper. As every article of this nature is essentially an ADVERTISEMENT, it is but equitable that our labour be requited, and our EXPENSE reimbursed. It is notoriously a source of EMOLUMENT to publishers to have books announced in the Port Folio, and it is a source of expense and inconvenience to the Editor, which he is resolved to rescind, unless something like Justice and Generosity succeed to selfishness and illiberality.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE CHARLESTON COURIER.

We again solicit the public attention to this valuable paper, which its ingenious, spirited, well principled and persevering editor conducts with the approbation of every honest man in the country, and with the hatred of all the Jacobins and Atheists. The editor is a gentleman and a scholar. Hence, he can arrange with the precision of a Linnæus, the catalogue of his friends and foes. The first are the men of genius, talents, principle and property. The last are the democrats, the fanatics, the knaves and fools. We ardently hope that he will stedfastly continue to utter honest truth with a voice potential, that he will be contemptuously careless of the "distant din" of democracy; and that he will treat the French republican party as natural brute beasts, as an impious, impudent, and savage gang, whom every man of genius and virtue is bound to meet with defiance on his brow, and the horse-whip in his hand.

THE NEW-ENGLAND REPERTORY.

This elegant paper is, we believe, without a rival, in the beauty of its paper and type. It is very fairly printed, and contains much matter for a very moderate price. It is conducted, we understand, by a gentleman of science; and we have constant evidence of his sense, spirit, and general acquaintance with polite literature. It is the vehicle of numerous political essays, in which we not only recognize the head of ability, but the HEART OF SOUNDNESS.

THE FREDERICK-TOWN HERALD.

This too is a staunch and animated friend to all that is praiseworthy in politics. This Herald announces nothing but the good and the true, with a voice not feeble, not suppliant; not faltering with ignominious terror, nor languid with contemptible lukewarmness.

THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

This firmly established and widely circulating Gazette, continues, under the able direction of its indefatigable editor, to be highly honorable to himself and salutary to the public. It is agreeably diversified with literary articles, and both from its ample size and smallness of type, presents a very copious fund of political information. It is almost superfluous to inform our readers that the political essays, which are the chief glory of this paper, are written in a spirit of wisdom, good sense and sagacity, eternally justified by Experience, and which we hope will eventually triumph over the pernicious delusions of false theory, and the daring deeds of unprincipled power.

From the Public Advertiser, printed in London, September 8, 1801.

The following extraordinary relation has just fallen into our hands:—The Rev. Mr. Hagamore of Cathoge, Leicestershire, died the first of January, 1776, possessed of the following effects, viz. 700l. per annum, and 1000l. in money, which (he dying intestate) fell to a ticket

* See St. Peter, in whose energetic epistle the reader will find a complete description of the new sect. Bishop Horsey, whom we read with the highest admiration, says with equal poignancy and truth, that the Devil was the first democratic rascal on record, who attempted to vex the world, by crudeness of theory, and infamy of practice, with the Rights of Hell, and the Universal Suffrage of apostateimps.

porter in London. He kept one servant of each sex, whom he locked up every night. His last employment of an evening was to go round his premises, let loose his dogs and fire his gun. He lost his life as follows: going one morning to let out his servants, the dogs fawned upon him suddenly and threw him into a pond, where he was found breast high...the servants heard him call for assistance, but being locked up; could not lend him any. He had 30 gowns and cassocks, 58 dogs, 100 pair of breeches, 100 pair of boots, 400 pair of shoes, 80 wigs, yet always wore his own hair, 80 waggons and carts, 80 ploughs and used none, 50 saddles and furniture for the menage, 30 wheel-barrows; so many walking sticks that a toyman in Leicester fields bid his executors 8 pounds for them, 60 horses and mares, 200 pick axes, 200 spades and shovels, 75 ladders, and 249 razors.

RETIREMENT.....BY DR. BEATTIE.

When in the crimson cloud of Even
The lingering light decays,
And Hesper on the front of heaven
His glittering gem displays;
Deep in the silent vale, unseen,
Beside a lulling stream,
A pensive youth, of placid mien,
Indulg'd his tender theme.

Ye cliffs, in hoary grandeur pil'd
High o'er the glimmering dale!
Ye woods, along whose windings wild
Murmurs the solemn gale;
Where Melancholy strays forlorn,
And Woe retires to weep,
What time the wan moon's yellow horn
Gleams on the western deep:

To you, ye wastes, whose artless charms
Ne'er drew Ambition's eye,
Scap'd a tumultuous world's alarms,
To your retreats I fly.
Deep in your most sequester'd bower
Let me at last recline,
Where Solitude, mild, modest power,
Leans on her ivy'd shrine.

How shall I woo thee, matchless fair!
Thy heavenly smile how win!
Thy smile that smooths the brow of Care,
And stills the storm within.
O wilt thou to thy fav'rite grove
Thine ardent votary bring,
And bless his hours, and bid them move
Serene on silent wing!

Oft let remembrance sooth his mind
With dreams of former days,
When in the lap of Peace reclin'd,
He fram'd his infant lays;
When Fancy rov'd at large, nor Care
Nor cold Distrust alarm'd;
Nor Envy, with malignant glare,
His simple youth-had harm'd.

'Twas then, O Solitude, to thee
His early vows were paid,
From heart sincere, and warm and free,
Devoted to the shade.
Ah why did fate his steps decoy
In stormy paths to roam,
Remote from all congenial joy!....
O take the wanderer home.

Thy shades, thy silence, now be mine,
Thy charms my only theme;
My haunt the hollow cliff, whose pine
Waves o'er the gloomy stream,

Whence the scared owl, on pinions grey,
Breaks from the rustling boughs,
And down the lone wave sails away
To more profound repose.

O, while to thee the woodlark pours
Its wildly warbling song,
And balmy from the bank of flowers
The zephyr breathes along;
Let no rude sound invade from far,
No vagrant foot be nigh,
No ray from Grandeur's gilded car
Flash on the startled eye.

But if some pilgrim through the glade
Thy hallow'd bowers explore,
O guard from harm his hoary head,
And listen to his lore;
For he of joys divine shall tell,
That wean from earthly woe,
And triumph o'er the mighty spell
That chains his heart below.

For me no more the path invites Ambition loves to tread,
No more I climb those toilsome heights,
By guileful Hope misled;
Leaps my fond fluttering heart no more
To Mirth's enlivening strain;
For present soon is o'er,
And all the past is vain.

DERMODY'S POEMS.

The author of this volume is now beyond the reach either of praise or censure. He died in the year 1802, at an early age, after having passed through a life of more than ordinary vicissitude, and added another name to the melancholy list of those who have shewn that Genius is not always a blessing to the possessor. His talents were of a superior order, but they were not always exerted in a situation to display them advantageously. Many of his pieces were written on the spur of necessity, and bear evident marks of haste, negligence, and lassitude. The present volume, however, does not come under this description: it contains some of his most finished productions. Dermody formed his style on our early poets, and it has many of the excellencies of his masters. His descriptions are lively and interesting, his language and his imagery are poetical and rich, his ideas and combinations of them are frequently original and striking, and his versification has often much sweetness, and spirit. THE TEST.

Young Philo let a snowy ball,
One chilly winter's day,
Into his Nancy's tucker fall,
Which on her bosom lay.
He soon disclos'd the playful jest,
And told her 'twas his heart,
Which he had thrown upon her breast
His passion to impart.
Her modest cheek a blush confest,
She says, "'tis no decoy;
"Dear Sir, it found a warmer nest,
"And MELTED with the joy."

A Tar, in the neighbourhood of Wapping, who has lately opened a tobacconist's shop, has the following notice upon a board in the window:

Full many a gale I weather'd out,
Before this port I made,
And having worn my canvas out,
My anchor here I've laid.
No winds for favour I invoke,
To spare or fill my sail;
But only beg my friends would smoke,
And blow a pleasant gale. [Lou. paper.]

One of the best Reviews in England thus appreciates the value of the new edition of Goldsmith's works.

"Replete with entertaining, if not recondite powers of the mind, and long demanded by the public, we have at length, for the first time, received, in four volumes octavo, 'The Miscellaneous Works of Oliver Goldsmith, M. B. to which is prefixed some account of his life and writings.' This biography appears to be correct, and is unquestionably amusing. The account of the poet's earlier years is avowedly furnished by his eldest sister; and may therefore be implicitly depended upon. We have also several papers introduced, which have either not appeared before the public, or have not hitherto been appropriated, but which, undoubtedly, bear strong internal testimony of being the production of this elegant but eccentric writer."

In addition to the above article, the Editor wishes to state, that, upon his recommendation, a beautiful edition of this fascinating author will be published here in four pocket volumes, which, it is hoped, if habitually perused, will banish those barbarisms, which infect the American style, and teach men to express themselves with the elegant simplicity of their ancestors, and not in the foreign idiom of French jacobins; or in the drawing cant of republican hypocrisy.

Extracts of letters from a travelling friend, a foreigner of talent and observation.

"I stayed near a third of the day in your two houses of parliament at Lancaster. I shall never forget either the sight, smell, or hearing of them: the upper chamber was many degrees worse than a master tailor's shop of a Saturday night, in the closest part of London; and the lower, (what with pestilential vapours within, and filthy avenues to get there) was nearly upon the scale of a Canada priory. If I was not in my fourth sheet, and it is almost bed-time, I would give you a specimen of some of their speeches.

Here (at Washington) things are carried on in a very different style....and sumptuous to a degree....with good, plain gentleman-like speaking in both houses; and, as far as I can judge from one day's debate, less flippancy and wandering from the subject, than in our country. As for the city, there is excellent snipe shooting between the capitol and the palais du president, a tolerable sprinkling of quails, a perpetual serenade of frogs after sunset, and every appearance of musquitos, agues, intermittents, and other Summer advantages; famine is amongst the train, for there are no certain supplies, except you are at the expense of a daily conveyance to Baltimore, which Mr.... is obliged to be at, in order to keep his French cook employed....a most incomparable workman. I once thought six dollars a day too little for your congressmen; but I now find they can save from four and a half to five....they don't live, perhaps, as well as we do....They mess together, on soup, boiled beef, and cabbage, perhaps with a little rum and water, and they never take a coach, but walk, wet or dry, to the capitol, and sleep two in a bed! There's a pretty prospectus for you....doesn't it make your mouth water? It made my eyes trickle with laughter when I heard it, and I should laugh more, if you were to be angry with me for telling it you.

In my Washington news, did I tell you that the varlet Duane has actually been sitting to STUART for his picture, and it now lies along side of Jefferson's. Hogarth, whenever a notorious rogue was going to be hanged, used to go to Newgate and perform this office for him....therefore, I trust, the parallel will run as far on your side of the water, as on ours.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'E' is requested to persevere in her literary exercises. Mental employment sometimes assuages sorrow.

'Ithacus,' in one of his recent odes, has very happily revived the old simplicity of the classic writers in the reigns of the first JAMES and CHARLES.

'Asmodeo,' when in a merry vein, is peculiarly agreeable to the Editor. To the highly humorous travestie of the style of a fashionable author we mean to assign a front place in the Port Folio.

From 'Climenole' we have received, with peculiar pleasure, a note apologetical for a suspension of his essays. We are delighted to understand from this ready writer, that he will shortly resume his lucubrations. Whenever he chooses to copy the old comedians, who

*Si quis erat dignus describi, quod malus aut fur
Quod moechus foret, aut sicarius aut alioqui
Famosus, multa cum libertate notabunt.*

we shall always be alert to usher his bitterest satire into the world. Climenole need not be informed that the Editor of this paper will never hesitate, no not for a moment, to publish whatever can bring Democracy into hatred and contempt. Against the atheists and jacobins of this unhappy country, the prey of every villain, and the sport of every theorist, the Editor will always set his forces in array. He invites every species of satire which may gall or disperse the foe, and Climenole and his friends, who are the Editor's friends, and with whom he is in full political communion, are solicited to communicate their opinions frankly and frequently.

The Editor urges Genius and literary Labour to address to him their fugitive productions. A Journal widely disseminated, like this, is an eligible vehicle for short effusions, whether the object of the authors be mere notoriety, or legitimate fame. Of Learning and Genius it is required, that the collections of the first, and the inventions of the second, be imparted often, and perused by many.

....."The distinguish'd part of men,
With compass, pencil, reed, or pen,
Should in life's visit leave their name
In characters, which may proclaim
That they, with ardour, strove to raise
At once their arts and country's praise,
And in their working took great care
That all was full, and round, and fair."

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Laberius held, or Publius Syrus,
No matter which...the search would tire us,
That he, who strives, by gentle dealings,
To sooth a scrub, of vulgar feelings,
Errs wide as he, by threats severe,
Who thinks to daunt a cavalier.
Dame nature o'er our shoulders threw
A doublet of the truest blue,
Which, tho' we labour to conceal,
By veils that reach from head to heel,
Various, in texture as in hue,
Yet keen observers still peep through.
*She hangs on each a brace of sacks!
One ponderous, fasten'd at our backs,
Contains our own misdeeds...the other
'Bout which, tho' light, we make a pother,

† Perras imposuit Jupiter nobis duas:
Propriis repletum vitis post tergum dedit,
Alienis ante pectus suspendit gravem.

PRÆDUS.

Our neighbors' secret faults enclose,
And ever bobs before our noses!
The freaks of youthful passion, find
Indulgence with the liberal mind;
Blam'd, haply, by the dull discreet,
Whose blood ne'er glow'd with generous heat;
Or by the mean and sordid elf,
Whose rule of right is love of self;
Or rail'd at by the sinner sly,
Who tramples on each moral tie;
What then...unsullied stands his fame,
'Till men of sense and virtue blame.
A scrape's the means our friends to try,
And shew on whom we may rely;
A sort of crucible, or ewer,
To purge base metal from the pure.
Give me the man, who will defend
Each word, each action of his friend;
Who scorns to sit, and hear his foes
Their false and rancorous tale disclose;
But fires, and with affection strong,
Supports him, whether right or wrong.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. SONG.

DELIA'S SMILE.

Go view each brilliant gem that shines
In all Golconda's diamond mines;
And as the radiant sparkles rise
To meet thine eager wond'ring eyes;
Then say, and speak, devoid of guile,
Are they so rich as Delia's smile!

Go mingle in the vulgar fold
Of sordid slaves who worship gold,
And ask if those of most possess'd,
Can say it made them truly blest;
And ask if gold can care beguile,
Like Delia's softest, sweetest smile!

Yet should'st thou e'er expect to meet
An eye so bright, a look so sweet;
Still must thou never hope to find
So true an index of the mind;
So innocent, so free from guile,
As Delia's open, candid smile.

And if in some impassion'd hour,
Thou e'er has't felt th' extatic pow'r
Which eyes like hers alone impart,
Deep thrilling thro' thine inmost heart;
Thou then, must own, if free from guile,
That worlds are poor to Delia's smile!

If on the bed of writhing pain,
Which human strength can scarce sustain;
Or if on thy devoted head
Should fall each ill that mortals dread:
E'en then, thou'lt own, that pain and toil,
Were well repaid by Delia's smile.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Written in 1802, after the death of a favorite child.

Come gentle sleep, contentment's friend,
Thy sweetly soothing influence lend,
To calm my troubled breast.
Ah seal in soft repose these eyes,
Suspend awhile these tears and sighs,
Which rob my soul of rest.

But thou dost not with sorrow dwell,
Nor do'st thou shed thy magic spell,
On lids oppress'd with care.
Thy soothing power is ever nigh,
To close the happy, tearless eye,
The blest thy favorites are.

Verum animo satis hæc vestigia parva sagaci

LUCRET. Lib. 3.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

HAVING signified, in the last number of the Lounger, my intention to appropriate a few essays to the consideration of Miss Williams's Edwin and Eltruda, and made some remarks preparatory to that purpose, conformably thereto, I shall now proceed to a succinct exposition of her plan.

Albert, a veteran knight, retired, covered with laurels, to an ancient castle on the banks of the Derwent, to seek repose from the toils of the field, and find, in retirement, some alleviation of the poignant sorrows, occasioned by the loss of a wife, whom he tenderly loved. His great consolation was the education of a daughter, who resembled her mother in her uncommon endowments both of mind and person. Under the eye of the father, an attachment was formed between his Eltruda and Edwin, a youth of the vicinage, worthy of her affection for the noblest virtues of the heart, and the most manly graces of the person. Time glided on in the enjoyment of domestic bliss, and the endearments of reciprocal affection, until their peace was disturbed by the eruption of a civil war between the houses of York and Lancaster. Ties of honour, which Edwin could not forego, compelled him to espouse the cause of York, while the loyal zeal of old Albert led him once more to take up arms in favour of Henry. The battle of the contending parties was protracted until the close of day, when, in the obscurity of the night, a faulchion, launched from the hand of Edwin, pierced the heart of old Albert. The victor, touched with compassion at his expiring groans, immediately flew to his assistance, and soon recognized him by his prayers for the safety of Edwin, and the happiness of Eltruda. This disastrous event broke the heart of the latter, and Edwin, overwhelmed with horror and despair, expired at her feet.

Upon these incidents the writer has constructed a tale, which, I trust, will be found, on perusal, to correspond with the portrait drawn of it in my preceding speculation. Her plan is elegantly expanded; the delineations of character are appropriate and interesting; the imagery delicate and tender; and the catastrophe worked up with singular ingenuity and pathos. In all the higher modes of composition, the primary works of excellence have afforded systems of rules for the structure of successive efforts of the same nature, and served as the models upon which they were moulded. From the Iliad, Aristotle is known to have extracted the celebrated code of principles, which, since his time, has uniformly regulated the organization of the epopeia. By a scientific and ingenious analysis of Don Quixote, the Spanish Academy have deduced a series of rules for the government of the Burlesque, which it is incumbent upon every candidate for fame, in that line, to study and to follow. No writer, I believe, has ever pursued the same course, or at least done more than collaterally afford general precepts for the particular species under examination, or indeed for any of the humble walks of the muse. Without attempting to legislate in this way, a task for which I feel neither ability nor presumption, I shall go no farther than to suggest those primary relations of congruity which immediately result from the nature of the subject, and will therefore lay open to intuitive perception.

The critics have been almost unanimous in recommending a remote era for the scene of an epic poem. In reflecting upon that of a legendary tale, the perfection of the fable seems to dictate, and the title necessarily implies an adaptation of the same rule. Miss Williams' choice of the reign of Henry the sixth, is particularly felicitous; it combines all the advantages that can accrue from antiquity of plan, and, for the student in history, the eventful period of the sanguinary struggle between the white and red roses, must involve more than common interest. Another qualification prescribed for the epic, is, that the plan should be great, both in the action and duration. I need scarcely remark, that the doctrine in our case is fundamentally opposite. To give any great degree of prolixity to a light poem, must infallibly destroy the congregate effect, by generating satiety and disgust. The legendary poet must excite ridicule, who would adopt for his subject the contention of princes, the foundation of empires or the discovery of new worlds. The simplicity of diction, inculcated so warmly in our preceding essay, is bottomed upon a universal principle of propriety in composition, that the tone and language should be subservient and homogeneous to the subject. The placid equalibility of the familiar duties of life, the tenderness of parental or filial affection, the soft blandishments of love, the anguish of a mind perturbed and agonized by domestic misfortune, even the convulsive horrors attendant on involuntary crime, are themes which the poet may choose, and which Miss Williams has judiciously selected.

Non omnia rerum pariter sunt omnibus apta is a maxim never to be overlooked in writing. When touching upon the battle in which Albert was killed, she properly abstains from a long or pompous description of its terrors, and traces a line of demarcation for the 'timid muse,' with precision and elegance,

The timid muse forbears to say
What laurels Edwin won;
Nor paints the gallant deeds that day
By aged Albert done.

On softer themes alone she dwells,
As trembling through the grove,
Of friendship's woes she sad'ning tells,
Or sings of hapless love.

The intervention of machinery of any kind, the introduction of a fairy or a sylph, in a poem of this nature, would defeat the primary object of the poet, by effacing altogether that transient impression of reality, without which our sympathy must remain torpid. Lord Kaimes sounds their exclusion from tragedy on an analogous principle: every shade of verisimilitude would vanish on the entrance of a supernatural power; the fascination, that for the moment enthralled the senses of the spectator, instantaneously dissolves; and in lieu of that grateful illusion, by which he is led to believe himself actually engaged in the transactions of the stage, he would feel that he is listening to the fictitious sorrows of a poet, and participating in joys not of reality, but of imagination. I know that this hypothesis, as to the spectator, has been warmly controverted by Johnson, in his preface to Shakespeare, but the voice of general experience speaks more cogently than the dictum of authority, or the subtleties of ratiocination.

The characters suitable for a legendary tale, in the next place, fall regularly under examination: on this head, however, it will be unnecessary to do more than refer the reader to our preceding remarks. We shall incidentally notice the sentiments. The proemial strophes of Edwin and Eltruda, comprize a brief description of the castle where Albert resides, whose portrait and situation are then introduced in the following manner:

There liv'd a chief to fame well known,
A warlike, virtuous knight;
Who many a well fought field had won,
By valour and by might.

Yet milder virtues he possess'd,
More gentle passions felt;
And in his calm and yielding breast
Each soft affection dwelt.

Not all the rugged toil of war
His bosom e'er could steel;
He felt for every child of care,
His heart was apt to feel.

And much that heart was doom'd to bear,
And many a grief to prove;
To feel the fullness of despair,
The woes of hopeless love.

To lose the partner of his breast,
Who sooth'd each rising care;
And with mild efforts charm'd to rest
The griefs she sought to share.

He mark'd the chilling damps of death
O'er spread her fading charms;
He saw her yield her quivering breath,
And sink in death's cold arms.

From solitude he hop'd relief,
And this lone mansion sought,
To cherish there his sacred grief,
And nurse the tender thought.

Poets, in general, appear fond of the character of a warrior, who, to the austerity of martial prowess, superadds the 'milder virtues' of a benevolent and feeling heart. The lofty dignity of the hero, tempered by a due share of the social affections, is in fact one of the most satisfactory pictures the mind can contemplate. We regard the pious Æneas with much more complacency than the rough and sanguinary Achilles; and no where does Hector so strongly conciliate affection, or fire us with zeal for the triumph of his cause, as in his tender interviews with Andromache. The last quatrain of the verses just cited is particularly delicate. The closing line, however, may perhaps have been borrowed from Young, who has the same beautiful expression in the commencement of his Night Thoughts:

Silence and darkness, solemn sisters twins,
From ancient night, who nurse the tender thought.

It is an observation founded in the history of the human heart, that the man 'stricken with sorrows' enjoys a species of pensive pleasure in brooding over his griefs, and delights in the frequentation of scenes that are calculated to present kindred images. In expressing this idea, Ossian annexes a qualification unnoticed by other poets, but which must strike as eminently just, 'there is a joy in sorrow, when PEACE dwells with the sorrowful.' To know the 'joy of sorrow,' no phantom of guilt should haunt the imagination, no pang of remorse embitter retrospection. Congreve, in his Mourning Bride, amplifies the subject in the more impassioned language of tragedy:

It is the wretch's comfort still to have
Some small reserve of near and inward woe,
Some unsuspected hoard of inward grief,
Which he unseen may wail, and weep, and mourn,
And glutton-like devour.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CRITICISM ON BOILEAU.

[In Vol. II. of the Port Folio, the reader will find a life of *BOILEAU, elegantly translated, by an American gentleman, from the French of the Abbe Levisac. His character, and a general criticism upon his invaluable writings, were omitted in that article. Our friend and correspondent has kindly favoured us with this desirable continuation, and it gives the Editor peculiar pleasure to call the attention of the lovers of polite literature to a writer, who wisely modelled his style agreeably to the CLASSICAL STANDARD, and who, flourishing in the court of the French AUGUSTUS, was, in all things, the very reverse of a republican.]

Such was Despréaux. Frankness and probity marked his conduct through life; in his friendships he was constant and sincere, in his actions

* I cannot in this place omit the encomium of Boileau in the Pursuits of Literature. It were an injustice to the memory of a famous poet, it would be injurious to learning itself, not to promulgate such criticism as the following, nicely discriminated, and energetically expressed. We hope it will recal the works of the French satirist to a new examination. After delineating the respective beauties and blemishes of Lucilius, Horace, Juvenal and Persius, the author adds....."An interval of ages passed, dark and barbarous. The power of satire, in its full and legitimate strength, was never again to be seen."

artless and noble; he was generous, without ostentation, and just to all the world. The misfortunes of others were to him insupportable. The distress of a man of letters rent his very soul, and this sensibility was not in him an idle sentiment. He exerted his influence in his behalf, and ever aided him with his purse. His personal qualities won the hearts of men, and to them did he owe the acquisition of as many friends, as to the superiority of his talents. He was not less beloved, nor was his society courted less on account of the purity of his morals, and the simplicity of his manners, than of the perfections of his mind, and the wit of his conversation. Even his most malignant enemies did not excite his hatred; he pitied and pardoned them. Did they evince but the slightest inclination to be reconciled to him, he forgot the wrongs which he had suffered, and lived with them on terms of liberality and civility. The judgments which he pronounced on bad authors were never dictated by spleen nor passion: in exposing them to public ridicule, his only aim was to make reason and truth triumph, and to cherish in his native country the laurels which had embellished the happy soils of Greece and of ancient Rome. He saw, with an indignation which he was unable to suppress, that they were the most dangerous enemies of learning and of taste. 'But, says M. de Valcour, in attacking the defects of authors, he always spared their persons. He thought that every man who possessed the faculty of speech or of writing, was authorised publicly to censure a bad book, whose author has had the temerity to publish it; but he looked with horror on those dangerous enemies of the human race, who, without respect for friendship or even for truth, mangle with unrereign of Louis XIV of France. Then appeared a poet, second to none of his predecessors. A philosopher, without being wordy, the friend of sense and of virtue, a gentleman in principle, independent in spirit, and fearless of enemies, however powerful from their malignity, or formidable from their rank. This extraordinary man was BOILEAU. If I am not deceived, there is something in all his compositions so finished, so removed from conceit and forced thought, such an ardent zeal for propriety in sentiment and in expression; such a sense of the dignity of the human character, when undebased; such a hatred of hypocrisy; such a love of purity; such an abhorrence of all profaneness and indecency, and even of indelicacy; that I am not able to name a man, whose works, as a poet and a critic, may be read and studied with equal advantage. Even his compliments, though rather lofty, to Louis the fourteenth, are all conceived in the language of a gentleman and a man of genius, who feels that he is conferring honour, not receiving it. The majesty of the French monarch, in that cultivated age, was surely as worthy of homage as the deity of the Roman Augustus. To read the works of Boileau with full advantage some accuracy of knowledge, and some insight into the delicacy of the ancient French language are required. I call their language ancient, which existed before the revolution, for I scarce understand the modern democratic jargon. Grave virus mundities populi. It is also necessary to have a perception of the peculiar cast of the French poetry, and of the construction of the verse. An allowance must be made for the language itself, which is not poetical, as contradistinguished to prose, but forcible, terse, and well adapted to the condensation of satirical expression. As a writer, I think him original. What he has borrowed he almost seems to have restored to its proper place. He alternately assumes the characters of the three great Romans, and maintains an honourable contest for the mastery. Equal to either of them taken singly, and in the merit of composition sometimes their superior. He is their true and lawful brother. There is a fraternal league between them, which no friend to good literature, good poetry, and good manners will ever suffer to be broken."

lenting malignity every thing that presents itself to their distempered imagination, and who, protected from the vengeance of the laws, by the deep obscurity in which they are enveloped, make a cruel sport of publishing the most secret faults, and blackening the most innocent actions.' To subvert the empire of ignorance and of artifice is not only a laudable action, but a duty.

Why was this man, whose literary merit was so eminent, whose manners were so bland, who was the author of so many benevolent actions; why was he, during his life, attacked with so much virulence, and pursued with so much rancour? Let us search for no other cause than his pre-eminence. That crowd of authors, some of them obscure, others not rising above mediocrity, but who had been regarded as oracles, and whose folly, ignorance, and ridiculous vanity he exposed, could not forgive him for having wrested from their hands the sceptre which they had so long wielded. Forced to descend from that high rank, they formed a league against him, and, in their vengeance, employed all the outrage of envy, and all the atrocity of calumny. Intrigue, satire, criticism, perfidy....all were exercised. But what could the efforts of these pigmies effect? Firm, unshaken in the midst of this host of assailants, Despréaux pursued his career, constantly exhibiting, in opposition to his enemies, the example of an irreproachable life, and new master pieces.

I will not reply to the different accusations made against him during his life; they are sunk in oblivion, and their revival is not to be apprehended. Who, at this day, knows that Cotin, Pradon, Desmarte, Liniere, and some other writers equally obscure, have written against Despréaux? But I cannot pass in silence over the opinion which Marmontel has expressed of him, in a too celebrated epistle, crowned at the French academy. As the opinion of the author of the excellent articles of literature in the Encyclopedia, might inspire prejudices in the minds of those persons, who are ignorant of the plan which D'Alembert had formed to degrade the great men of the seventeenth century, for the purpose of securing to Voltaire the literary supremacy, and who are not informed that paradoxes of this kind were the most certain means of attaining the academical chair, it is essential to shew the weakness of the foundation on which this opinion rests.

In that epistle it is said, 'Despréaux is cold; he is an irascible judge, he has invented nothing, and wants fervour, imagination, fecundity, and sentiment.'

Despréaux is cold. Where is he cold? Is it in his satires? But do they not possess an appropriate degree of warmth? Has the language of reason, or ought it to have the same turn, the same expression, the same animation as that of the passions and of the imagination? The example of Juvenal proves nothing. If Juvenal is exasperated, and raves at the follies and vices of his age, Horace attains his object, with more certainty, by ridiculing those of the age in which he flourished. We laugh at the vehemence of an austere and querulous philosopher; his declamation is lost in air. But we dread the shafts of gay and delicate raillery; the wounds which it inflicts are infallible and mortal. Who has rallied more delicately, or more agreeably, than Despréaux, or in finer verse?....Is it in his Epistles and his Art of Poetry? But are not these works marked with the true characteristics of their species? What elegance, what tenderness in those on rural pleasures! What epic force, what truth of expression and of colouring in those on the passage of the Rhine! What majesty in those addressed to the King! What beauty, what energy, what precision in his Art of Poetry! In a word, what propriety in all! And no sooner did they appear than they became classical. Every one learned them, committed them to memory, and foreign languages were enriched by them. I ask then, are verses, known by every body, admired and cited by every body, are they really destitute of fervour? I shall presently speak of the Lutrin.

Despréaux is an irascible judge; and why? Not surely for having devoted to public ridicule the Chapelains, the Senières, the Cotins, and other authors, equally contemptible. A writer of so correct a taste, as Marmontel, could not but applaud judgments, which all France has long since confirmed. Nor is it for having defended the ancients against the attacks of some moderns. Marmontel, on this subject, frequently expresses himself with as much force, and with even a higher degree of enthusiasm. It is then merely because he has not set a high value on the poetry of Quinault, nor done justice to Tasso. Let us examine the correctness of these charges.

When Despréaux wrote his first satires, Quinault had produced nothing but his tragedies, which, in general opinion, are bad. They were intolerable, not only in representation, but in the closet. It is true that Quinault soon after produced some operas, which are models of perfection in that species of composition. But are works of this kind calculated to please a man of austere and rigid morals, and possessing a taste formed on the finest models of antiquity? What do we find in the operas of Quinault? Lascivious descriptions, maxims tending to the corruption of morals, or at least to render them lax and effeminate; all the tenderness and seduction of scenes the most voluptuous; sorcerers; enchantments; spectres; apparitions of gods and goddesses; fictitious nature; strokes of the magic wand instead of plot; in a word, all the chimeras, illusions, and improbabilities, that a licentiously warm imagination is capable of creating. It must be confessed that Quinault has adorned these productions with all the charms of soft and harmonious versification, although frequently negligent and diffuse, and with the simple and pathetic graces of sentiment always delicate and natural; but that it is which renders them the more dangerous. With him, love is never a frailty; it is, on the contrary, the supreme good, the only object worthy of our attention, that to which every other ought to be sacrificed. These are the causes of the little estimation in which Despréaux held the operas of Quinault.

With respect to Tasso, may he not be justified? I begin by declaring, that I consider Jerusalem Delivered as the most interesting epic poem extant. I go, as may be observed, further than Balzac, who considered it merely as the richest and most finished poem that had appeared since the time of Virgil: and this induced him to remark, that Virgil is the cause, that Tasso is not the first in this species of composition, and Tasso, that Virgil is not the only one. But, however great the beauties of this poem may be, is it exempt from faults, even glaring faults? Does it not contain details, incidents, and even episodes, incompatible with the dignity of epic poetry? Do we not sometimes find in it conceits which shock no less the understanding than the taste? Would not the marvellous, in which it abounds, be better adapted to a burlesque, than to a serious and christian poem? Although the episode of Olinda and Sophronia be extremely interesting, and although we might perhaps regret the privation of it, yet are we not compelled to confess, that it has no connexion with the action? It is a digression, and every digression is a real fault. Is there in this poem perfect unity of action? I think there is; but on this point there is great diversity of sentiment. Is not every man of taste shocked at the monstrous combination of christianism and pagan fable on which it is founded? Enchanted islands; forests and palaces; sorcerers of every description; cavaliers metamorphosed into parrots; trees animated by wood-nymphs; caverns, where all the riches that nature has scattered over the various parts of the globe, are collected within a small space; a voyage to the extremity of the world, made on unknown seas, with the rapidity of an arrow, in a small boat, beneath which the waves bend submissive, furious monsters dismissed by the shake of a wand; syrens, &c. &c. What are these but fairy tales, dreams of an imagination that delights in chimerical and vain ideas? Is not all this, in an epic poem, notwithstanding the magic charms of the style, tinsel, mere tinsel, particularly in the estimation of a man, whom the study of Horace and Virgil had accustomed to pictures drawn by a sprightly, beautiful and strong imagination? Nor is it this tinsel which persons of taste admire in this celebrated poem. What they admire (and it claims the warmest admiration) is the perfect delineation of the characters; it is Godefroy, Renaud, Tancred, the aged Raymond, Soliman, even the ferocious Argant, Armide, &c. personages much more natural and interesting than those of the Iliad, of which they are imitations; it is the tender, the incomparable Erminia; it is the portrait of genuine heroism in its highest perfection; it is that train and that variety of imagery sublime, affecting, noble, smiling or tender, according to circumstances; it is the richness, the diversity, and the justness of the figures, the tropes and the similes; in a word, it is an enchanting style, always possessing dignity, and always characteristic of the thing expressed, with the exception only of those passages in which he has paid homage to the taste of his age for points. Those parts of his Art of Poetry, in which Despréaux speaks of Tasso, and the manner in which he often expressed himself on this subject, in particular discussions with his friends, admit not a doubt but that such was his opinion.

Despréaux has invented nothing, and wants fervour, imagination, fecundity and sentiment. What! is not the Lutrin a poem entirely of invention? What is the subject? A quarrel about a prerogative, in itself totally destitute of interest; but what ingenious means has the poet employed to rivet our attention to it! What art in the texture of his fable! What admirable adaptation of the marvellous to the action! What order and connexion! What skill in the choice of episodes! Where can we find more beautiful imagery, more ingenious figures, more true colouring, a more perfect whole, and details better conceived and drawn? On this subject M. de la Harpe has observed, 'when it was asserted that Despréaux possessed neither fecundity, imagination, nor fervour, surely the Lutrin was forgotten; some fecundity certainly was necessary to the production of a poem of six cantos on the placing and displacing of a reading desk; surely some imagination was requisite to the composition of a work of fancy, and to animate it in all its parts. Who, amongst those deserving to be cited as connoisseurs, has ever denied these poetical attributes to the Lutrin? All the agents employed by the poet have their peculiar destination, and answer it by concurring to produce the general effect. Through five cantos the fable is perfectly conducted; the correct delineation of the characters, and the liveliness of the imagery give to it all the interest of which similar subjects are susceptible; that is, the amusement which we may derive from witnessing high disputes arising out of the most trivial causes; but what resources, what art does it require to fix our attention to such a subject! How has the author been able to enrich one so unprolific, and to sustain himself so long on such slender means? How has it been possible for him to compose so many fine verses on a trifling monkish quarrel? In this consists the miracle of the art; it is by scattering plenteously the attic salt of refined pleasantry, by giving to all his personages a correct and distinct physiognomy, that he has attained the art of transporting the reader into the midst of them, and of attaching him by means which, in the hands of one less dexterous, would have lost their effect. All his heroes have a dramatic aspect, a head and a picturesque attitude, and there is nothing more rich than the colouring with which he has adorned them.'

After this justification, made, by so enlightened a judge as M. de La Harpe, I believe it unnecessary to proceed further in the refutation of Marmontel's paradoxes. I will remark only, that time, which destroys so many reputations, daily adds new lustre to that of Despréaux, and that there is no person who will refuse to concur in the sentiment of J. B. Rousseau, that 'he aided truth to tear the mask from artifice, and combated falsehood; that merit always found in him a patron and a friend; and that his verses were rather eulogies on virtue, than satires against vice.'

Chamouny, November 1.

This day being All-saints, and one much attended to in this Roman Catholic country, I found some difficulty in setting off as early as I wished from Martigny: for my odd looking little fellow of a guide would not advance a step till he had been at matins. He went before day to the chapel, and finding it shut, very patiently waited till it was open, for he had no idea of risking himself on so dangerous a journey as that we were about to undertake across the mountains, without first preparing himself to face every peril. At last we departed, upon two stupid mules, and, after passing the torrent of the Drance, began to ascend, in a straight line, a mountain, whose summit was at least two leagues distant, but which was concealed from our sight by a heavy fog that spread all over the vallis.

As I was advised not to attempt guiding the animal I rode, but to let her take her own way of going, which was by crossing and recrossing the road diagonally, to lessen the steepness of the ascent, and stopping every twenty minutes to get breath to proceed, I had full leisure to observe the comical figure of my guide, who wore a large cocked hat, and a huge pair of mustachios. At first I thought he looked mischievous, and began to reflect how I was to manage him in case of need, but after considering him some time, and entering into a kind of conversation with him, I found he was a harmless, good natured, ignorant fellow, who barely knew how to make his mule go, and who was even unacquainted with the very road he undertook to be my guide in, having never travelled it before. You will easily guess my astonishment when he told me this, but he relieved me from my apprehension by saying there was only one road as far as Trient, where we could gain information about the rest of our journey. As the people of the country speak a kind of French, or Patois, I did not feel alarmed about finding my way at last, and as to my personal safety, I had no fears on that account, from the apparent inoffensiveness of my guide, and the general character of the Swiss peasants, from whom I apprehended nothing. Besides, as I always carry pistols in my pocket, I considered myself a match for any single person, who might venture to attack me.

* The opinion which I here express on the poem of Jerusalem Delivered, is formed according to the ideas of epic poetry which we have adopted in France. I know that they are very much opposed to those which are entertained in Italy; but, in many respects, the taste of nations is not less different than their language.

As we thus slowly ascended, we gained the region that bounded the rise of the vapours, which then appeared like a vast lake, whose shores were full of little bays and promontories, formed by the sides of the mountains. In this fanciful picture I got so deeply engaged, that I might be fairly said to be in a brown study. I was soon roused from my reverie by the obstinacy of my mule, which had made a longer stop than usual, and refused to mount a step higher. I endeavoured to coax her along, but it would not do, and I was obliged to call out lustily for my precursor, (for guide he can hardly be called), to come to my assistance. A few lashes with his whip answered the purpose, and, after some little kicking and restiveness, she again proceeded.

In this manner, tedious enough indeed, we made shift to attain the summit, and I was richly rewarded by a grand view of the distant glaciers of the Upper Vallais, and other lofty mountains. Far below me, in a narrow gloomy valley, lay the little village of Trient, consisting of about half a dozen houses, and a chapel, to which we saw the peasants repairing from all parts of the valley, dressed in their Sunday clothes; but we were so high that we could scarcely hear the tolling of the little bell.

As the descent was now very steep, my guide advised me to dismount, and pointed out a path which brought me through forests of pine and larch, and by the edge of tremendous precipices, to the village, while he went by the road with the mules. Hearing some voices while I was thus searching my way down alone, I looked up, and saw above me two Savoyards and a soldier, who were taking a nearer road to Chamouny, by crossing the Col de Balme. When my man came up, he proposed our engaging them to shew us the way across that high mountain, but not liking the looks of those people, whom I had before observed following us, I told him I would not determine which passage to take till I made proper inquiries at Trient. We soon after arrived there, but found no one in the miserable little ale-house of the place, every body being at chapel, and the house locked up. The mules found the way to the stable directly, without the assistance of the muleteer, who quitted me immediately on my arrival, and I, finding myself alone, repaired to the chapel, where I found him on his knees, at the door, among a few peasants.

Seeing there was no help for it, I amused myself with observing the scenery of this little valley, the cottages and the appearance of the peasants, till service was ended, when I received a very hearty welcome from the landlord of the inn, who served me up some excellent honey, bread and eggs, on which I feasted like an epicure.

I wished very much to enter Chamouny by the Col de Balme, but all the peasants I talked with, dissuaded me from it, saying there was too much snow in that passage for me or my mules. I was of course obliged to take that of the Tete Noire, which, by being less elevated, was even passable during the winter.

We coasted along the thundering Trient for some distance down the valley, among huge fragments of rocks and wrecks of pines, which the avalanches had brought down from the heights. After travelling about a mile in this way, we began to ascend the side of the mountain, called the Tete Noire, (or black head), which well deserves its appellation, for never did I see so many horrors united as in this famous passage. The road ascended and descended for near two leagues, among piles of rock, caught, in their headlong course, by the pines above us, and which threatened the destruction that might be expected on observing the enormous masses that already lay piled up below us. The road, if it can, with propriety, be called one, being little more than a causeway of large stones, over which the mules could scarcely clamber. I considered it so dangerous at last that I dismounted and walked the rest of the way, as I durst not trust the footing of my mule, one false step of which would have, perhaps, precipitated me down the steep into the torrent below, choked up with rocks and trunks of trees. Perhaps there is not in nature a more savage passage, and it was not very pleasant, I assure you, to be scrambling among these horrors, with a guide who knew nothing of the way, and who seemed as much afraid as myself, and durst not trust himself on the back of his mule. The gloom produced by the dark forests of pines, which covered the sides of the mountains, and almost shut out the light of day, rendered the place a fit one for the business of an assassin, and had I not discovered my companion to be perfectly harmless, I should have trembled for my safety in the passage of the Tete Noir, where no ideas are suggested but those of danger, and where no vestige of society, or its blessings, can be traced.

Notwithstanding all this, I confess I am so fond of the terrible sublime in nature, that I felt a kind of sombre satisfaction in the contemplation of the terrific scenery of this celebrated passage, which compensated me for its dangers. Had I been accompanied by any friend to whom I could have communicated my feelings, I should have been doubly gratified, but the solitariness of my journey, deprived me of half the pleasure I might have derived from it.

OBJECTS OF THE MIND.

"Every thing we perceive, or are conscious of, says Lord Kaimes, whether a being or a quality, a passion or an action, is, with respect to the percipient, termed an object. Some objects appear to be internal, or within the mind; passion, for example, thinking, volition: some external; such as every object of sight, of hearing, of smell, of touch, of taste." The objects of the mind are our ideas, as will appear by the writings of various philosophers, who use them as exegetical one of the other. 'By the term idea, says Locke, I mean what is the object of the understanding, when a man thinks; or whatever it is the mind can be employed about when thinking.'

Now we have gotten a definition, we will push our inquiries a little further, and ask how we come by ideas or objects of the mind? Some men have been established in the opinion that there are certain innate principles, or primary notions, stamped upon the mind of man, which the soul receives in its very first being, and brings into the world with it.* Locke opposed this opinion;

* It was the current opinion of all antiquity, that nothing is in our understanding, which was not be-

and I think we shall see no reason to embrace it, if we consider how barren our minds would be, if we had received no ideas since the hour of our birth. We are conscious that there are objects in our minds, and that we think: and we know that whoever thinks, or has thought at a time ever so remote, has a recollection of it, and is conscious to himself that he had thoughts, or objects, in his mind, at such or such a time. We cannot say we remember the time when we had no thoughts: that is impossible.... we cannot have any consciousness of that which never was. A thought must be antecedent to the recollection of it.

We all remember the days of our childhood; we remember the time when we had but few thoughts, and but imperfect or inadequate ideas of many things, of which we have since acquired just notions. It may not be impossible that some can recollect the only idea in the mind, and that the first. At least, we can remember when we could not frame any idea of, or comprehend, the extent of a million of miles, or the bulk of this earth. But if these ideas, which now are adequate, were in our understandings at our birth, it bespeaks very fertile minds, that such ideas have flourished so well, and arrived to such a degree of maturity, all by the force of innate principle, without any external influence.

I see we shall not be satisfied of the origin of ideas by pursuing the theory of innate principles. With Mr. Locke then 'let us suppose the mind to be, as we say, white paper, void of all characters, without ideas. How comes it to be furnished? Whence all the materials of reason and knowledge?' To this he answers, 'from experience and observation.' When these are employed about external objects, we call it sensation. By sensation we receive the ideas of bitter, sweet, yellow, hard, soft, cold, heat, light, darkness, &c. which are, on this account, called sensible qualities. When experience and observation are employed about the internal operations of the mind, things we perceive, think or reflect upon we call it reflection. By this we get the ideas of perception, thinking, believing, willing, wishing, hating, loving, fearing, &c. Therefore, external material things, which, by sensation, excite in us ideas; and the operations of our own minds furnishing ideas by reflection, appeared to Mr. Locke 'the ONLY ORIGINALS, whence all our ideas take their beginnings.'

This opinion is adhered to by more modern authors: Duncan, particularly declares that 'all our original ideas are derived from sensation or reflection.' With regard to ideas excited by external things, the mind is passive. All the action we can use is, when ideas are excited in our minds, we can, with them, frame arbitrary, or make complex ones. But when we have, by sensation, received several ideas, can we entertain our minds with the contemplation of all at once? By no means. Lord Kaimes says, 'in a manner we can attend to some ideas, and dismiss others'....that 'a choice is afforded,' &c. But on what does this choice depend? Is it not upon the impression the objects make upon the mind? Some may probably say on connexion; and Lord Kaimes says 'sometimes we insist on what is commonly held the slighter connexion.' But in this he says 'much depends on the tone of mind.' And on what does the tone of mind depend? On the nature fore in our senses. Descartes, in his Philosophical Romances, advanced that we had metaphysical ideas before we so much as knew our nurses' breasts!

Voltaire's Phil. Dict.

Here is an idea for the advocates of innate principles, which I fancy they had not at their births.

of the objects presented to view, and on the state of the animal spirits. And, I imagine it is not so much because a thing is connected with us, that we 'insist on' it, as it is the impression the thing itself makes on our minds.

'We find, says Mr. Locke, that we cannot avoid having ideas produced in our minds. If I turn my eyes towards the sun, I cannot avoid the ideas which the light or sun then produced in me.' And thus, also persons say they could not prevent such or such things engrossing their thoughts to the total exclusion of other ideas, which they acknowledge are of more consequence to them. When I have seen two objects, I naturally turn my reflections on that which makes the deepest impression; but, in some instances, I may dwell upon the least attracting. Yet, in this case, I believe I do so in consideration of some utility or pleasure, which I think will accrue from this choice, and which will make it excel the other. This, then, is evidently in consequence of the manner in which it strikes my mind.

It will be found even so with the minds of youth. One tutor is said to excite the ambition of his pupils by representing to them the honour, profit, or pleasure they will derive from their studies, and thus induces them to discard other objects from their minds, and direct their attention to what he proposes. Thus one tutor is said to be better than another. But why any better, if it rest entirely with his pupils whether they will 'attend to some ideas and dismiss others,' or not? If this last be wholly the case, then the merit is not in the tutor; but if it be owing to the tutor, then it is the consequence of the impression he makes on their minds, and not the effect of choice.

But, with this reasoning, we should soon destroy the power of making complex ideas, and reduce ourselves to the necessity of entertaining none but original simple ideas: whereas, we find we can, with our simple ideas, frame complex ones, and such as we please too. Hence fables, romances, &c. hence the idea of a centaur, a phoenix, &c. which, like other innumerable vagaries of fancy, never existed but in the imagination. But, with regard to the mind's preferring one idea and rejecting another, perhaps our choice is not purely voluntary. May it not depend greatly on habit? A child, by the constant inculcation of good sentiments, acquires such a habit of thinking, and attaches so much importance to a regular course of conduct in preference to a capricious behaviour, that he has no hesitation whether to employ his mind upon thoughts of business, study, &c. or upon intrigue, faction, and a life of dissipation.

In what 'depends on the tone of mind,' it is clearly perceived we have no agency. Where we are directed by connection, we are passive also. But I think we may dwell upon the object, to which this connection leads us, or, by the help of connection, associate other objects with it, and make to ourselves such a complex idea as we please. But is not this, also, in consequence of the impression which the objects make, &c? Clearly so. But, again, how come objects to make any impression, or excite any idea at all? They evidently make impressions in proportion to our capability of receiving them. And here we see how it comes that habit influences our choice. Our original simple ideas are received passively alike by all; but, on a review, or in recollecting them, they make different impressions on different persons, according to their habit of attaching importance to them, or the pains they have taken to consider them. This is a wise arrangement in the disposition of all things; for, if it were not thus, all men would pursue the same thing, and employ, or have their thoughts employed on the same subject.

But, with regard to the tutor and his pupils, as above mentioned, the reason why one tutor is better than another is easily discerned, even if it depended wholly on the choice of his pupils. For, if the tutor were so inactive or negligent as not to present to their understanding any views of their interest, or excite in them any ideas, it is plain there would be nothing from which they might make a choice, though they had the power of making it. Such would be a miserable master. But as I think it does not depend solely on the pleasure of the pupil, I should consider it of the utmost consequence to put youth under the instruction of such persons as would excite most interest in their minds, and lead them by persuasion.

But the mind being entirely passive in the reception of its simple ideas, the province of the understanding is to contemplate on its original ideas; and at pleasure to make new and complex ones without end. This work of the mind logicians define in three acts, viz. composition, abstraction and comparison; by the first of which we are enabled to make complex ideas, and by the last we get our ideas of relation...greater, less; older, younger; longer, shorter, &c.... When we have an idea fixed, we cannot add another, or a new one: all we can do (except that we can dismiss the idea and receive another) is to modify that, by the relation or connection it has with some other.

This subject displays the widest field for the exercise of the ingenuity of man, and is of all others the most pleasing. But, perhaps, we have already proceeded too far; therefore shall do little else but recommend a habit of thinking for ourselves. We shall generally see clearly, if we think coolly.

When a man sees a building, he immediately has a conception of it; if he shut his eyes the conception is still in his mind; if you carry him to China, or any place, ever so remote, he can there call to mind the conception (which, now he has it only by recollection, is called the idea) he had of that building; and so of any other object. All the difference there will be between the idea recollected, and the conception as first received, is that it will be more faint than the first impression.

And here another thought is suggested.... What makes such a difference in men's ideas, and in their use and arrangement of them, since all are likely to receive, from the same objects, much the same impressions? Many will say such or such a person has more genius, or a better faculty to compound, abstract and compare his ideas, than another. That may be; nature, indeed, is more favourable to some than to others. Yet I will risk the opinion, that the difference in men is attributable, more to their industry and application to this subject, or to their idleness and total neglect of it, than to the partiality of nature. TO THE PUBLIC.

The Society for the institution and support of First-Day or Sunday Schools, in the city of Philadelphia, the District of Southwark, and the Northern Liberties, to their fellow-citizens.

Taking into consideration the many evils that result from a misemployment of the Christian Sabbath; and experience having taught that the improvement of the mind has a powerful tendency to promote good order and suppress vice, the society are induced to call the public to a consideration of this important subject. Being professedly associated for the purpose of improving the habits and manners of the rising generation, amongst the poorer classes in the community, whose happiness depends much upon the acquirement of useful customs and instruction; the great abuse which is witnessed of the Christian Sabbath, cannot but present an awful testimony of the unwillingness of the people to respect it, as a day of sacred ordination; and viewing the many evils which result therefrom, the society cannot refrain from expressing their belief in the efficacy of useful education of mankind, towards the advancement of virtue and happiness. Since the establishment of this institution upwards of thirteen years have elapsed, during which period several thousand children have been admitted into the schools; but owing to the limited state of the funds, their number cannot be increased although it is believed that one in the Northern Liberties would prove very useful.

There are three schools, well supplied with books, &c. into which children of all denominations may be admitted, free of expence, on application to the respective tutors. Spelling, reading and writing are taught in them, and careful attention paid to their moral and religious instruction. The school hours do not interfere with those adapted for divine worship; an attention to which is enjoined.... A school for girls is kept in the third story of the building back of the Presbyterian church, at the corner of Mulberry and Third-streets.... One for boys in Cherry-street, between Third and Fourth-streets; and another for boys in Front-street, nearly opposite to Shippen-street. Committees from the Board of Visitors attend the schools, for the purpose of inspecting and reporting their state, and suggesting such improvements as from time to time may occur.

Examinations are occasionally held, at which premiums are given for excelling in spelling, reading and writing; for constant attendance at school; cleanliness; good behaviour, and steady attendance at divine worship; and various other means are used to excite a laudable inclination for improvement amongst the scholars. The numerous benefits that have resulted from Sunday schools in Europe, of which satisfactory testimonies are abroad, are strong inducements for their establishment in America.

With a full reliance on the merits of the cause they advocate, with a hope that it will receive the favorable consideration of their fellow-citizens, the society conclude, after reminding the Benevolent, the Public Spirited, and the Opulent, that a wide field lies open for the exercise of their liberality.

MOORE'S ANACREON.

This very superior translation, a beautiful edition of which is now printing in this city by Mr. Maxwell, is thus characterized in the Poetical Register, a work eminently entitled to attention, both for the elegance of its verse and the correctness of its criticism:

By this translation the poetical fame of Mr. Moore may be considered as established on a solid basis. His Anacreon comes recommended by an elegance and spirit, which are not often found. There is, perhaps, too much epithet, and the translation is sometimes too paraphrastic, but here objection must end. The notes are at once pleasing and judicious, and show Mr. Moore to be a man of extensive reading and acquirements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

He who understood, better than any other writer, the nature and province of true humour, is ADDISON. Let those, therefore, who wish to be fully instructed in this matter, study him, and learn the theory from his practice. In his mirth, there is nothing profane or impertinent. He is perfectly serious, where he ought to be so: and his smiles, like those of innocence, though irresistibly captivating, are ever inoffensive. He is not, some think, a profound philosopher; for he is always clear and harmonious, rational, manly and interesting. But if writing be good, in proportion as it is useful, and if its noblest use be, to improve the heart, refine the taste, and sweeten the temper, ADDISON is of all uninspired authors at least, in prose, the best, and the most delightful.

The following imitation of an Epigram in Martial, has even more liveliness than the original.

I laugh at Poll's perpetual pother
To make me her's for life;
She's old enough to be my mother,
But not to be my wife.

From a new miscellany we transcribe the following fable, possessing singular merit, both in the ease and ingenuity of the story, and the utility of the moral.

GENIUS AND INDUSTRY.

A FABLE.

On every hand it is agreed,
That Genius never can succeed
In forming an exalted mind,
Unless with Perseverance join'd.
But multitudes, to folly prone,
Move idly onward like the drone,
Nor heed the truth applies to them,
Though foremost others to condemn.
To such the Muse presents a tale,
Examples teach, when precepts fail.

In days of yore, a wond'rous well
There was, as ancient stories tell,
Amid whose waters, glittering bright,
Unnumber'd jewels met the light,
Rich sparkling gems, a glorious show,
More vivid than Aurora's glow;
In substance solid as.....you see
I cannot find a simile.

These gems were free to every lout
Who'd take the pains to draw them out.
It happen'd, on a certain day,
A youth, call'd Genius, pass'd that way;
A starry zone his loins embrac'd,
A flowing vest his shoulders grac'd,
On which was drawn, in tints sublime,
The varied produce of each clime;
A flow'ry wreath his temples bound,
And scatter'd odours all around;
His eye-balls flash'd the living fire,
In his left hand he held a lyre,
Which oft he swept, while from the lofty key
Burst sweetest strains of heavenly harmony.

Enwrapt with wonder and surprise,
The glittering scene he quickly eyes;
And, quite transported with delight,
Scarce stops to feast his eager sight.
Tumultuous hopes his breast swell high,
The rope is seiz'd, his lyre laid by;
The wheel revolves, like lightning round;
The bucket sweeps the sparkling ground;
And now he tugs and works away,
But ah! how deep the treasure lay.

It seem'd a heavy, tiresome load,
Scarce worth the labour he bestow'd;
With joy no more his bosom burns,
The lazy axle hardly turns;
When, looking carelessly around,
He thinks he hears a whizzing sound,
And soon in air his piercing eye
Perceives a beauteous gilded fly.

Mad to possess the gaudy prize,
He quits the wheel, and sudden flies,
While every gem neglected lies,

With ardour now he skims the plain,
Eager the painted toy to gain,
And runs, and runs, but runs in vain.
The fly, as Genius nearer drew,
Still higher soar'd, still faster flew;
Till tir'd, the youth, with slacken'd pace,
Unwillingly gave up the chase,
And back return'd to seek the well;
But ah! his grief what tongue can tell,
When leaning o'er, with doubtful gaze,
He sees no more rich jewels blaze,
But muddy waters, in their stead,
O'er all the blacken'd surface spread.
A ruddy youth, call'd INDUSTRY,
Had, in the interim been by,
And, toiling hard, by labour won,
What GENIUS would have made his own,
Had Fancy been abstracted less,
And Reason curb'd his mind's excess.

La Bruyere says, that a man of wit, who is naturally proud, abates nothing of his pride or stiffness, for being poor. On the contrary, if any thing will soften him, and render him more pliant and sociable, it is a little prosperity.

Modesty is to merit what shades are to figures in a fine picture. It gives it force and relief.

Since it is common to be pleased with rare things, why are we so little struck with virtue?

A man is more faithful to the secrets of others, than to his own; a woman, on the contrary, can keep her own secrets more faithfully than those of others.

If guarding powers preside above,
Who still extend to virtuous love
A tutelary care;
The virgin's bosom earliest dole,
The first born passion of the soul,
Must find protection there.

Never can noon's maturer ray
That charm of orient light display
Which morning suns impart;
So can no later passion prove
That glow, which gilds the dawn of love,
The day spring of the heart.

In the following ode the character of Anacreon is very strikingly depicted. His love of social, harmonised pleasures, is expressed with a warmth amiable and endearing. Among the epigrams, imputed to him is the following; it is the only one, says Mr. Moore, worth translating, and it breathes the same sentiments with this ode.

When to the lip the brimming cup is prest,
And hearts are all afloat upon the stream;
Then banish from my board the unpolish'd guest,
Who makes the feats of war his barbarous theme.

But bring the man, who o'er his goblet wreathes
The muse's laurel with the Cyprian flower;
Oh! give me him, whose heart expansive breathes
All the refinements of the social hour.

ODE 42.

Yes, be the glorious revel mine,
Where Humour sparkles from the wine!
Around me let the youthful choir
Respond to my beguiling lyre;
And, while the red cup circles round,
Mingle in soul as well as sound!
Let the bright nymph, with trembling eye,
Beside me all in blushes lie;
And while she weaves a frontlet fair
Of hyacinths to deck my hair,
Oh let me snatch her side-long kisses,
And that shall be my bliss of blisses!
My soul, to festive feeling true,
One pang of envy never knew;
And little has it learn'd to dread
The gall that envy's tongue can shed;

Away....I hate the slanderous dart
Which steals to wound the unwary heart;
And O! I hate, with all my soul,
Discordant clamours o'er the bowl,
Where every cordial heart should be
Attun'd to peace and harmony.
Come, let us hear the soul of song,
Expire the silver harp along;
And through the dances ringlet move,
With maidens mellowing into love:
Thus simply happy, thus at peace,
Sure such a life should never cease.

SONG, SUITABLE TO THE SEASON.

BY ROBERT BURNS.

Now rosy May comes in wi' flowers,
To deck her gay green spreading bowers,
And now come in my happy hours
To wander wi' my Davie.

Chorus.

Meet me on the warlock Knowe,
Dainty Davie, dainty Davie,
There I'll spend the day wi' you,
My ain dear dainty Davie.

The chrystal waters round us fa'
The merry birds are lovers a',
The scented breezes round us blaw,
A wandering wi' my Davie.

Chorus.

When purple morning starts the hare
To steal upon her early fare,
Then thro' the dew I will repair
To meet my faithfu' Davie.

When day expiring in the west,
The curtain draws o' nature's rest,
I flee to his arms I loe best,
And that's my ain dear Davie.

Epitaph at Market Durnham, Norfolk.

O Death, thou art unkind
To make us all afraid,
By taking away of Rachel Cobb,
That young and virtuous maid.

Her age about fifteen,
I think that was the outside;
She's gone to rest, and there is blest,
I think can't be deny'd.

PARODY OF SHAKSPEARE.

To read, or not to read?...that is the question;
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to study
The taste and learning of the classic age,
Or take up vile and circulating trash
To pass a rainy day:....to study? to improve?
And by close application say we end
The difficulties and the thousand doubts
That Ignorance is heir to: 'tis an effort
Instantly to be made: to read? to construe
Greek? perchance beset fast: aye, there's the rub....
For in those dialects what toil may come
When we sit down in earnest to the task,
Must give us pause: there's the defect
That oscitancy makes of so long yawn;
For who would nothing know, thro' all his time,
Of true philosophy; mechanic powers;
Historic truth, laws of astronomy;
The lines of geography; or, the four rules
Of quick arithmetic, to spurn the frauds
That ready reckoners of the unwary take,
When he might master all that books can teach him,
With a bare resolve?...who would vacant stare,
And hem and haw 'mong literary men,
But that the fag of something worthy search,
Bright glorious Science! of whose recompense
No hopeful youth e'er fails, puzzles the brains,
And makes us flee to cards and silly small talk,
Than handle subjects we were school'd to know:
Thus indolence makes dunces of us all;
And thus the genius, like a standing pond,
Is mantled over with still thoughtless dulness,
Which should discoveries of great pith and moment,
As a brisk fertile current, wide dispense
And turn to useful action.

The greatest wits have their ebbs and flows; they are sometimes exhausted; then let them neither write nor talk, nor aim at entertaining. Should a man sing when he has a cold? Should he not rather wait till he recovers his voice?

How is this? Alcippus saluted me to-day, and with a smile threw himself almost out of the coach to take notice of me! I am not rich, and was a-foot. According to the present modes of life, he should not have seen me. Oh! now I have hit on it. It was that I might see him in the same coach with Mr. Mushroom, the great tank director.

Argiva pulls off her glove to shew her white hand, and never forgets to let her little shoe be seen, that she may be supposed to have a small foot. She laughs equally at things serious or merry, to shew her fine set of teeth. She knows perfectly well all her several interests. One thing only excepted, she is perpetually talking, and has scarcely common sense.

Holcroft remarks, with sagacity, that sallow complexion, length of face, a pointed nose, a projecting chin, and prominent cheek bones have distinguished the countenances of fanatics and persecutors. Fanatics and persecutors are often men of strong minds, but violent passions; and between such men and Bonaparte, allowing for times and circumstances, in physiognomy, in talents, and in manner of acting, there is great resemblance.

The little catechism of the rights of men, says BURKE, is soon learned; and the inferences are in the malignant passions of mankind.

The king of the United Kingdoms has always thought it his greatest glory that he rules over a people perfectly and solidly, because soberly, rationally, and legally free.

VARIETY.

I'll live no more single, but get me a wife;
For change, says poor Tom, is the comfort of life.
A wife then he got, and no mortal could be,
A few weeks after marriage, more happy than he.

But when children and squalling began to increase,
And a loud scolding doxy molested his peace,
I wish in my heart I was quit of my wife;
For change, says poor Tom, is the comfort of life.

The celebrated Sir Thomas More was sent ambassador to the emperor, by king Henry the VIII. The morning he was to have his audience, knowing the power of wine, he ordered his servant to give him a good large glass of sack.... and having drank that, called for another. The servant, with officious ignorance, would have dissuaded him from it, but in vain. The ambassador drank off the second, and demanded a third, which he likewise drank off.... Insisting on the fourth, he was overpersuaded by his servant to let it alone.... so he went to his audience. But when he returned home, he called for his man, and threatened him with his cane! 'You rogue, said he, what mischief you have done me.... I spoke to the emperor, on the inspiration of those three glasses that I drank; he told me I was fit to govern three parts of the world. Now, you dog, if I had drank the fourth glass, I should have been fit to govern all the world!'

But sure the piece you yet may mend,
Take courage, man, and steal the rest.

A very neat monument has been erected in England, in the church at East Dereham, to the memory of the poet COWPER; it is a white marble slab, on which is represented 'THE TASK' leaning on the 'HOLY BIBLE.'

BÜRGER'S LEONORA.

This celebrated ballad has had several translations. Stanley has attempted to give a fortunate conclusion to this celebrated composition.

An extract from Spencer's translation.

Barb! Barb! methinks the cock's shrill horn
Warns that our sand is nearly run;
Barb! Barb! I scent the gales of morn,
Haste, that our course be timely done.
Our course is done! our sand is run!
The nuptial bed the bride attends;
This night the dead have swiftly sped;
Here, here our midnight travel ends!

Full at a portal's massy gate,
The plunging steed impetuous dash'd;
At the dread shock, walls, bars, and gate,
Hurl'd down with headlong ruin crash'd.
Thin, sheeted phantoms gibbering glide
O'er paths, with bones and fresh skulls strewn;
Charnels and tombs on every side
Gleam dimly to the blood-red moon.

Lo while the night's dread glooms increase,
All chang'd the wond'rous horseman stood,
His crumbling flesh fell piece by piece,
Like ashes from consuming wood.
Shrunk to a skull his pale head glares,
High ridg'd his eyeless sockets stand;
All bone his lengthening form appears,
A dart gleams deadly from his hand.

The fiend horse snorts; blue fiery flakes
Collected roll his nostrils round;
High rear'd, his bristling mane he shakes,
And sinks beneath the rending ground.
Demons the thundering clouds bestride,
Ghosts yell the yawning tomb beneath;
Leonora's heart, its life blood dried,
Hangs quivering on the dart of Death.

To lessen the horror, Stanley has added the following stanza:

Sweet spirits! wave the airy wand,
Two faithful hearts your care demand;
Lo! bounding o'er the plain,
Led by your charm, a youth returns;
With hope, his breast impatient burns;
Hope is not always vain.

'Wake Leonora!....wake to love!
For thee his choicest wretch he wove,'
'Death vainly aim'd his dart.
The past was all a dream; she woke....
He lives!....'twas William's self who spoke,
And clasp'd her to his heart.

The father of the present duke of Norfolk, who had no particular antipathy to wine, used to drink much wine with a certain friend of his on this singular account: when drunk he always lost his voice; on the contrary, his friend retained his voice, but lost his legs: so the duke, tho' he lost his voice, rang the bell, and his friend, who could not move, called for more wine.

EPITAPH ON A GLUTTON.

FROM THE FRENCH.

Beneath this humble stone a mortal lies,
Whose sole employment was to gormandise,
E'en when he found he was not made to last,
He still retain'd his hatred to a fast;
And, when about to yield his latest breath,
'Tis said by some he tried his teeth on Death,
But, disappointed, utter'd sighs and groans,
For Death, alas! he found already bones.

Imitated from an ancient Greek author.

With me the rosy goblet share,
With me enjoy the youthful hours,
With me caress the frolic fair,
With me compose the wreath of flowers.

Now drive with me dull thoughts away,
With me defiance bid to sorrow;
Be merry thou with me to-day,
And I'll be wise with thee to-morrow.

SONG.

Though in the festive circle gay,
You see me move in frolic measure,
Mark on my cheek, in purple play,
The bloom of youth and smile of pleasure.

Ah! think not I am free from care,
But think how hard it is to cover
With smiles the anguish of despair,
And pity an unhappy lover.

THE ORACLE CONSULTED.

What's a Frenchman?....Slavery's fool,
What's a Briton?....Freedom's tool,
Form'd to curb despotic rule....
Fit with any foe to cope.

What's the Frenchman's view?....invasion....
If he find a fair occasion.
What's the Briton's?....Full persuasion
That he'll blast the Frenchman's hope.

What's the Frenchman's pleasure?....Plunder.
What's the Briton's?....NAVAL THUNDER,

Disappointment, shame and sadness;
But to Britons....glory, gladness,

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'Constantia' always writes with so much good sense and vivacity, that we regret we are not oftener instructed by the first, and amused by the latter.

'Florian' we hope will be punctual and industrious.

'M' is too negligent of her pen, and it is to be regretted, by every reader of taste, that a pen, which can trace such ingenious characters, should remain so long idle in the ink-horn.

To 'Philaxian' we are greatly indebted for the ingenious poetry of the hapless H. His verses are, in a very remarkable degree, correct and curious, and the imagination is wonderfully interested in their perusal.

'B' is welcome as a writer, and interesting as a traveller. We hope that his agreeable tours will be continued.

The Lay Preacher, for this week, is omitted for want of room.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. Oldschool,

I have received much pleasure in the perusal of the Odes of Anacreon, selected for the Port Folio from Mr. Moore's translation of that bard.

About ten years ago, I was presented by a Bacchanalian friend with an edition of Anacreon, and of Sappho's Odes and Epigrams, published seventy years since.

Although they are by no means equal to Mr. Moore's, in versification, yet I think the translation will strike you as more faithful to the original. As it is probable there is no other copy of this edition extant, I trouble you with a specimen, and add one from Sappho.

The edition is ornamented by a likeness of Anacreon, "apud Fulvium Ursinum," and with a bust of Sappho, taken from a busto in the possession of the then Earl of Pembroke.

Your obedient,

A. H.

SAPPHO....ODE V.

ON THE ROSE.

Would Jove a queen of flow'rs ordain,
The Rose the queen of flow'rs should reign.
The grace of plants! the pride of bow'rs!
The blush of meads! the eye of flow'rs!
Her sweets the breath of love disclose,
Cythera's fav'rite bloom she glows!
What flow'r is half so lovely found,
As when with full blown beauties crown'd;
The Rose each ravish'd sense beguiles,
And on soft am'rous zephyr smiles.

Vith.

Beauty's Goddess, oh descend!
And our social joys attend.

*Let each golden cup be crown'd,
Serve the laughing nectar round.
None are here but who love thee,
None are here but who love me.

P.S. The Ode to the Cicada, in a late Port Folio, is swelled to 32 lines. In the edition before me it is comprised in 20, and has much more point, as well as simplicity, which is Anacreon's forte. Mr. Moore paraphrases his author, but paraphrases in dulcet strains.

ANACREON....ODE XX.

TO HIS MISTRESS.

A weeping rock sad Niob stood
And swell'd with tears the Phrygian flood;
And Progne to a swallow chang'd,
On sable wings swift circling rang'd.
But to your glass transform'd I'd be,
That you may fondly gaze on me:
Or, oh might I those charms embrace!
And shine the fav'rite robe you grace:
Or flow the bath, whose am'rous tide
Your bright transparent limbs divide:
Or else, dissolv'd in sighs, my fair,
I'd breathe the essence for your hair:
Or in your zone's lov'd form be blest,
And bind like that your snowy breast:
Or be those happy pearls; my soul!
Which round your neck's soft iv'ry roll:
Or I your very shoe would be,
Would you but deign to tread on me.

LIV.

ON HIMSELF.

Sporting with the young and gay,
Young I am, methinks, as they.
Swift the mirthful dance I join,
Pleasure's youthful wings are mine.

* As Sappho in this fragment desires Venus to be her cup-bearer, so Anacreon proposes the same office for Cupid. See his 4th ode.

Give me roses! I'll prepare
Rosy garlands for my hair.
Age dismiss, and dance among
Those that young are, and be young.
Fill the bowl then...fill it high,
Whoso dares my vigour try?
I can handle Bacchus' arms,
And my tongue has youthful charms.
Drinking, talking, I can be
Mad as any youthful he.

I cannot resist the inclination of adding one more Ode from Anacreon, conjectured to have been written on Sappho. It is the last ode.

ON CUPID.

Little God, with golden hair,
Son of Venus, ever fair!
Thy various colour'd wings unfold,
Bedropt with pearl, and plum'd with gold,
And gently waft me on my way,
Wrapt in clouds with purple gay.
'Twas you first robb'd my heart of joy,
Have pity, then, celestial boy,
And as we wanton thro' the air,
Teach me how to fly despair!
*The pride of Lesbos gave the wound,
Lesbos for female charms renown'd;
But why should she, inhuman maid!
Deride the snow upon my head?
The very lilies on her cheeks,
Blush for anger as she speaks.

SELECTED POETRY.

[In a volume of "Madrigals" set to music by Thomas Weekes, London 1597, there occurs one, which, as the Bishop of Dromore says, is so complete an example of the bathos, that he could not forbear presenting it to the reader.]

Thulé, the period of cosmographie
Doth vaunt of Hecla, whose sulphureous fire
Doth melt the frozen clime and thaw the skie
Trinacrian Etna's flames ascend not hier.
These things seem wond'rous, yet more wond'rous I,
Whose hart with feare doth freeze, with love doth fry.

The Andelusian merchant that returns
Laden with cutchinele and China dishes,
Reports in Spaine how strangely Fogo burns
Amid an ocean full of flying fishes.
These things seem wond'rous, yet more wond'rous I,
Whose hart with feare doth freeze, with love doth fry.

I CAN BEAT HIM, SIR, AT THAT.

But three months yet I've been a wife,
And spouse already shews his airs;
I wish I'd liv'd a single life;
But as I did not, why, who cares?
Besides, let husband use his tongue,
And scold, and bounce, and cock his hat;
He'll quickly find, I'm not so young,
But I can beat him, Sirs, at that.

I'll go to operas, balls and plays,
Or where I will, and won't be check'd;
But keep it up both nights and days,
Until he treats me with respect.

* The following lines are supposed to be part of the answer which Sappho returned to our poet's gallantry:

The song the Teian sung to me,
Enchanting muse! was thine alone;
Each heav'nly verse he stole from thee,
Soft warbl'd from thy golden throne.

And if he romps with....I know who,
Perhaps he'll meet with tit for tat;
And, faith, may find, and shall so too,
That I can beat him, Sirs, at that.

But this I vow, if he'll be good,
And let me sometimes have my will,
(Young wives, you know, most surely should)
I'll duly ev'ry rite fulfil;
And never, O! no never rove,
But stay with him at home and chat;
And prove, by kindest deeds of love,
That I can beat him, Sirs, at that.

[We hope that the merit of the ensuing song will induce some Amateur to set it to music, and to sing it often in the circles of taste.]

SONG OF THE WANDERING SAVOYARD.

By Mr. Dimond, jun.

Within a silent shelter'd spot,
Is rear'd my lov'd paternal cot.
Behind, the Alps their shadow throw
Here crown'd with pine, and there with snow.
In front, delightful vineyards blush
With thymy dales, where browse the flock,
Just bounded by some granite rock
Where water-falls in murmurs gush.
Ah! how I sorrow'd when farewell
I bade unto my native dell.

The wild bee there gallanting roves,
And sucks the sweet-lip'd flower he loves;
The pigeon weaves her downy nest,
And murmurs o'er her young at rest;
While little birds, of blythest lay,
With shining wings, and trilling airs
O'er-sweep the woods, in love-link'd pairs,
And warble all the live long day.
Ah! faint of praise my tongue to tell
The pleasures of my native dell!

And there, when moon-beams frost the green
With mountain pipe, and mandolin,
The youths and maids on light feet hie,
To hold their rustic revelry.
And, as the cates and cup pass round,
With mazy dance and merry song,
They charm the early night along,
And waken all the sweets of sound.
Ah! how with joy my heart would swell,
Could I regain my native dell.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

[After an interval, which has been necessarily occupied by a variety of other matter, we resume the biography of a poetical magician. The various peculiarities of his extraordinary character, if contemplated by a philosophic eye, will suggest highly curious and useful trains of thought. His inequality of spirits, his pensive and melancholy humour, the loftiness of his pride, and his aversion to the throng of society, are all characteristic of such a youth. It should be remembered too, to his honour, and for the benefit of others, that the ardour of his application was fully equal to the quickness of his genius; and that, amid the arid avocations of an attorney's office, he found both time and inclination for the study of the most recondite, as well as the most elegant literature. He was the genuine Proteus of study, who, agreeably to the testimony of Thistlethwaite, might be found one day busily employed in Heraldry and English antiquities, and next deeply engaged in the subtleties of metaphysical disquisition; at this hour studying a Saxon vocabulary, and at the next a treatise of music.]

Mr. Walpole, though convinced of his intention to impose upon him, could not help admiring the spirit of the poetry which animated these compositions. His reply was cold and discouraging. He hinted his suspicions of the authenticity of the supposed MSS. and complained, in general terms, of his want of power to be a patron, and advised him to pursue the line of business in which he was placed, as most likely to secure a decent maintenance for himself, and enable him to assist his mother.

This frigid reception, extracted immediately from Chatterton 'a peevish answer,' as Mr. Walpole terms it; demanding to have the MSS. returned, as they were the property of another gentleman; and Mr. Walpole, either offended at his warm and independent spirit, or pleased to be disengaged from the business in so easy a manner, proceeded on a journey to Paris, without taking any farther notice of him.

On his return, he found a letter from Chatterton, in a style, as he terms it, 'singularly impertinent,' expressive of much resentment on account of the detention of his poems, roughly demanding them back again, and adding, 'that Mr. Walpole would not have dared to use him so ill, had he not been acquainted with the narrowness of his circumstances.'

'My heart,' says Mr. Walpole, in his Letters to the Editor of Chatterton's Miscellanies, 'did not accuse me of insolence to him. I wrote an answer to him, expostulating with him on his injustice, and renewing good advice; but, upon second thoughts, reflecting that he might be absurd enough to print my letter, I flung it into the fire, and wrapping up both his poems and letters, without taking a copy of either, for which

I am now sorry, I returned all to him;' and never afterwards heard from him, or of him, during his life.

The affront was poignantly felt by Chatterton, thought it is, perhaps, more than repaid by the ridiculous portrait which he has exhibited of Mr. Walpole, in the Memoirs of a Sad Dog, under the character of 'the redoubted Baron Otranto, who has spent his whole life in conjectures.' He has, however, paid him a compliment in his Verses to Miss M. R. printed in the Town and Country Magazine, for January 1770.

To keep one lover's flame alive,
Requires the genius of a Clive,
With Walpole's mental taste.

Mr. Walpole has incurred much censure for his rejection of Chatterton, 'as if his rejection had driven him to despair.' But to ascribe to his neglect the dreadful catastrophe, which happened nearly two years after, would be the highest degree of injustice and absurdity. It appears from his elegant and spirited narrative of these transactions, that he afterwards regretted that he had not seen this extraordinary youth, and that he did not pay a more favourable attention to his correspondence. But, to be neglected in life, and regretted and admired, when these passions can be no longer of service, has been the usual fate of genius and learning.

Chatterton, however, in part, adopted Mr. Walpole's advice, by continuing with his master a full twelvemonth after this transaction; but without applying himself to the duties of his profession, as more certain means of attaining the independence and leisure of which he was desirous.

He past his hours of leisure in respectable company; and his sister says, that 'he visited his mother regularly most evenings before nine o'clock, and they were seldom two evenings together without seeing him.'

'He would frequently,' she says, 'walk the College Green with the young girls that statelyly paraded there to show their finery;' but she is persuaded that the reports which charged him with libertinism, are ill-founded. She could not perhaps have added a better proof of it, than his inclination to form an acquaintance with Miss Rumsey, a young female in the neighbourhood, apprehending that it might soften that austerity of temper, which had resulted from solitary study. He addressed a poem to her, and they commenced, Mrs. Newton adds, a corresponding acquaintance.

Early in 1769, it appears from a poem on Happiness, addressed to Mr. Catcott, that he had imbibed the principles of infidelity; one of the effects of which was to render the idea of suicide familiar, and to dispose him to think lightly of the most sacred deposit with which man is intrusted by his Creator.

The progress, however, from speculative to practical irreligion, is not so rapid as is commonly supposed. The greatest advantage of a strict and orderly education is the resistance which virtuous habits, early acquired oppose to the allurements of vice.

The Editor of his Miscellanies has asserted, that his 'profligacy was at least as conspicuous as his abilities;' but he has rather grounded his assertion on the apparently profane and immoral tendency of some of his productions, than on personal knowledge, or a correct review of his conduct.

Of few young men, in his situation, it can be said, that, during a course of nearly three years, he seldom encroached upon the strict limits which were assigned him, with respect to his hours of liberty; that his master could never accuse him of improper behaviour; and that he had the utmost reason to be satisfied he never spent his hours in any but respectable company.

Mrs. Newton, with that unaffected simplicity which so eminently characterizes her letter, most powerfully controverts the obloquy which had been thrown upon her brother's memory.

The testimony of Mr. Thistlethwaite is not less explicit or less honourable to Chatterton. 'The opportunities,' says he, 'which a long acquaintance with him afforded me, justify me in saying, that, while he lived at Bristol, he was not the debauched character he has been represented. Temperate in his living, moderate in his pleasures, and regular in his exercises, he was undeserving of the aspersion. I admit, that among his papers may be found many passages, not only immoral, but bordering upon a libertinism gross and unpardonable. It is not my intention to attempt a vindication of these passages, which, for the regard I bear his memory, I wish he had never written; but which I nevertheless believe to have originated, rather from a warmth of imagination, aided by a vain affectation of singularity, than from any natural depravity, or from a heart vitiated by evil example.'

But though it may not be the effect of infidel principles to plunge the person who becomes unfortunately infected with them into an immediate course of flagrant and shameless depravity, they seldom fail to unhinge the mind, and render it the sport of some passion unfriendly to our happiness and prosperity.

On the 14th of April, 1770, he wrote a paper, intitled, 'The Last Will and Testament of Thomas Chatterton,' in which he indicated his design of committing suicide on the following day. The paper was rather the result of temporary uneasiness, than of that fixed aversion to his situation, which he constantly manifested; but Mr. Lambert considered it as no longer prudent, after so decisive a proof, to continue him in the house; he accordingly dismissed him immediately from his service, in which he had continued two years, nine months, and thirteen days.

The activity of his mind during this short period is almost unparalleled. The greatest part of his compositions, both under the name of Rowley and his own, was written before April 1770, he being then aged seventeen years and five months; and of the former, they were almost all produced a twelvemonth earlier, before April 1769. But our surprise must decrease, when we consider that he slept but little, and that his whole attention was directed to literary pursuits.

Encouraged by the most liberal promises of assistance and employment from several booksellers and printers in London, he now resolved to try his fortune in the metropolis, which he flattered himself would afford him a more enlarged field for the successful exercise and display of his abilities; and he entered on his new plan of life with his usual enthusiasm.

'I interrogated him,' says Mr. Thistlethwaite, 'as to the object of his views and expectations, and what mode of life he intended to pursue on his arrival in London.' His answer was remarkable. 'My first attempt,' said he, 'shall be in the literary way; the promises I have received are sufficient to dispel doubt; but should I, contrary to my expectations, find myself deceived, I will, in that case, turn Methodist preacher. Credulity is as potent a deity as ever; and a new sect may easily be devised. But if that too should fail me, my last and final resource is a pistol.'

Before he quitted Bristol, he had entered deeply into politics, and had embraced the patriotic party. In March 1770, he wrote a satirical poem, called Kew Gardens, consisting of 1300 lines, against the Princess of Wales, Lord Bute, and their friends in London and Bristol; which has not been printed. He wrote also another political satire, called the Whore of Babylon, consisting of near 600 lines, which is in the possession of a friend of Mr. Catcott; an invective in prose against Bishop Newton, signed Decimus; and an indecent satirical poem, called The Exhibition, occasioned by the improper behaviour of a person in Bristol. Most of the surgeons in Bristol are delineated in it. Some of the descriptive passages in it have great merit. Thus speaking of a favourite organist, he says,

He keeps the passions with the sound in play,
And the soul trembles with the trembling key.

In the latter end of April 1770, he bade his native city a final adieu. In a letter to his mother, dated April 20th, he describes, in a lively style, the little adventures of his journey, and his reception from his patrons, the booksellers and printers, with whom he had corresponded, Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Fell, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Dodgley, &c. From all of them he professes to have received great encouragement, that all approved of his design, and that he should probably be soon settled. He desires his mother to call upon Mr. Lambert. 'Show him this,' says he, 'with uncommon dignity and spirit, or tell him if I deserve a recommendation, he would oblige me to give me one; if I do not, it would be beneath him to take notice of me.'

His first habitation, after his arrival in London, was at Mr. Walsley's, a plasterer, in Shoreditch, to whom he was introduced by a relation of his, a Mrs. Ballance, who resided in the same house.

Of his first establishment his report is favourable. 'I am settled,' says he, in a letter to his mother, dated May 6, 'and in such a settlement as I could desire. I get four guineas a month by one magazine, and shall engage to write a History of England, and other pieces, which will more than double that sum. Occasional Essays for the daily papers will more than support me. What a glorious prospect!'

In consequence of his engagements with the different magazines, we find him, about the same time, soliciting communications from his poetical and literary friends at Bristol, and desiring them to read the Freeholder's Magazine.

In a letter dated May 14, he writes in the same high flow of spirits. He speaks of the great encouragement which genius meets with in London; adding with exultation, 'if Rowley had been a Londoner, instead of a Bristowyan, I might have lived by copying his works;' yet it does not appear that any of Rowley's pieces, except the 'Balade of Charitie,' were exhibited after he left Bristol. He exhorts his sister to 'improve in copying music, drawing, and every thing which requires genius,' observing, that, although in Bristol's mercantile style those things may be useless, if not a detriment to her, here they are very profitable.

His engagements at that period appear to have been numerous; for, besides his employment in the magazines, he speaks of a connexion he had formed with a doctor in music, to write songs for Ranelagh, Vauxhall, &c. and, in a letter of the 30th to his sister, he mentions another with a bookseller, 'the brother of a Lord,' (a Scotch one indeed), to compile a voluminous history of London, to appear in numbers, for which he was to have his board at the bookseller's house, and a handsome premium, 'Assure yourself,' he adds, 'every month shall end to your advantage. I will send you two shillings this summer. My mother shall not be forgotten.'

Party-writing, however, seems to have been one of his favourite employments. It was agreeable to the satirical turn of his disposition, and it gratified his vanity by the prospect of elevating him into immediate notice. When Mrs. Ballance recommended it to him to endeavour to get into some office, he told her, 'he hoped, with the blessing of God, very soon to be sent prisoner to the Tower, which would make his fortune.'

In his letter to his mother, May 6, he says, 'Mr. Wilkes knew me by my writings since I corresponded with the booksellers here. I shall visit him next week. He affirmed that what Mr. Fell had of mine could not be the writings of a youth, and expressed a desire to know the author. By means of another bookseller, I shall be introduced to Townsend and Savbridge. I am quite familiar at the Chapter coffee-house, and know all the geniuses there. A character is now unnecessary; an author carries his character in his pen.'

He informs his sister, that if money flowed as fast upon him as honours, he would give her a portion of five thousand pounds. This extraordinary elevation of spirits arose from an introduction to the celebrated patriotic Lord Mayor, Beckford.

Chatterton had, it seems, addressed an essay to him, which was so well received, that it encouraged him to wait upon his Lordship, in order to obtain his approbation, to address a second letter to him on the subject of the City Remonstrance. 'His Lordship,' adds he, 'received me as politely as a citizen could, and warmly invited me to call upon him again. The rest is a secret.'

His inclination, doubtless, led him to espouse the party of opposition; but he complains that 'no money is to be got on that side of the question; interest is on the other side; but he is a poor author who cannot write on both sides. I believe I may be introduced (or if I am not, I'll introduce myself) to a ruling power in the Court party.'

When Beckford died, he is said to have been almost frantic, and to have exclaimed that he was ruined. He solaced his grief, by writing an Elegy on his death, which contains more of frigid praise than ardent feeling.

Indeed, that he was serious in his intention of writing on both sides, and that he 'alternately flattered and satirized all ranks and parties,' is evident from the following list of pieces, written by him, but never published, which Lord Orford has preserved.

The Flight: addressed to Lord Bute. In forty stanzas of six lines each. Thus indorsed: 'too long for the Political Register....Curtailed in the digressions....Given to Mr. Mortimer. 'Kew Gardens,' a satirical rhapsody of some hundred lines in Churchill's manner, against persons in power. 'The Dowager, a tragedy,....Unfinished....only two scenes. 'Verses addressed to the Rev. Mr. Catcott, on his book on the Deluge: ridiculing his system and notions....[inserted in the supplement to Chatterton's Miscellanies.] 'To a great Lady. A very scandalous address, signed Decimus. On the back of this is written, '(Jeremiah Dyson, Esq. by the Whisperer, 10s. 6d. a column). 'To J. C. Jenkinson, Esq.' an abusive letter, signed Decimus (or Probus, as it should seem from the indorsement): beginning thus: 'Sir, As the nation has long been in the dark in conjecturing the ministerial agent,' &c. To Lord Mansfield. A very abusive letter, signed Decimus (or Eneuenius, as it should seem from the indorsement): beginning thus....'My Lord, I am not going to accuse you of pusillanimity,' &c. In this piece many paragraphs are cancelled, with this remark on the margin: 'Prosecution will lie upon this.' An Introductory Essay to a political paper, set up by him, called the Moderator, in favour of administration: thus beginning, 'To enter into a detail of the reasons which induced me to take up the title of this paper,' &c. To Lord North; a letter signed the Moderator, and dated May 26, 1770: beginning thus....'My Lord, it gives me a painful pleasure,' &c. This is an encomium on administration for rejecting the Lord Mayor Beckford's Remonstrance. A Letter to the Lord Mayor Beckford, signed Probus; dated May 26, 1770....This is a violent abuse of government for rejecting the Remonstrance, and begins thus: 'When the endeavours of a spirited people to free themselves from an unsupportable slavery,' &c. On the back of this essay, which is directed to Cary, (a particular friend of Chatterton in Bristol), is this indorsement: 'Accepted by Bingley, set for and thrown out of the North Briton, 31st June, on account of the Lord Mayor's death.'

Lost by his death, on this essay, £1 11 6
Gained in Elegies, 2 2 0
.....Essays, 3 3 0
Am glad he is dead by 3 12 6

'Essays,' he says to his sister, 'on the patriotic side, fetch no more than what the copy is sold for. On the other hand, unpopular essays will not even be accepted, and you must pay to have them printed, but then you seldom lose by it. Courtiers are so sensible of their deficiency in merit, that they generally reward all who know how to do them with an appearance of it.'

On this sandy foundation of party-writing, Chatterton erected a visionary fabric of future greatness. It was a common assertion with him, 'that he would settle the world before he had done.'

In a letter to his sister, July 20, he tells her, 'My company is courted every where; and, could I humble myself to go into a compter, could have had twenty places before now; but I must be among the great; state matters suit me much better than commercial.'

His taste for dissipation seems to have kept pace with the increase of his vanity. To frequent places of public amusement, he accounts as necessary to him as food. 'I employ my money,' says he, 'now, in fitting myself fashionably, and getting into good company; this last article always brings me in interest.'

In the letter to his mother, May 14, he says, 'a gentleman who knows at the Chapter, as an author, would have introduced me as a companion to the young Duke of Northumberland, in his intended general tour; but alas! I speak no language but my own.' It is not very credible that he was likely to be accepted on so slender a ground of recommendation.

But his splendid visions of promotion and consequence soon vanished. Not long after his arrival in London, he writes to his mother, 'the poverty of authors is a common observation, but not always a true one. No author can be poor, who understands the arts of booksellers; without this necessary knowledge, the greatest genius may starve, and with it the greatest dunce may live in splendor. This knowledge I have pretty much dipped into.'

This knowledge, however, instead of conducting to opulence and independence, proved a delusive guide; and though he boasts of having pieces in the month of June 1770, in the Gospel Magazine, the Town and Country, the Court and City, the London, the Political Register, &c. and that almost the whole Town and Country for July was his; yet it appears, so scanty was the remuneration for those periodical labours, that even these uncommon exertions of industry and genius were insufficient to ward off the approach of poverty; and he seems to have sunk, at once, from the highest elevation of hope and illusion, to the depths of despair.

Early in June, he removed his lodgings from Shore-ditch, to Mrs. Angel's, sackmaker, in Brook-street, Holborn. Mr. Croft attributes the change to the necessity he was under, from the nature of his employments, of frequenting public places. It is probable that he might remove, lest Mr. Walmsley's family, who had heard his frequent boasts, and observed his dreams of greatness, should be the spectators of his approaching indigence. Pride was the ruling passion of Chatterton; and a too acute sense of shame is ever found to accompany literary pride.

But, however desirous he might be of preserving appearances to the world, he was sufficiently lowered in his own expectations; when we find his towering ambition reduced to the miserable hope of securing the very ineligible appointment of a surgeon's mate to Africa.

His resolution was announced in a poem to Miss Bush. Probably, indeed, when he wrote the African Eclogues, which was just before, he might not be without a distant contemplation of a similar design; and perhaps we are to attribute a part of the exulting expressions which occur in the letter to his mother and sister, to the kind and laudable intention of making them happy, with respect to his prospects in life, since we find him, almost at the very crisis of his distress, sending a number of little unnecessary presents to them and his grandmother, while, perhaps, he was himself almost in want of the necessaries of life.

He applied, in his distress, to Mr. Barrett, for a recommendation to this unpromising station. On the score of incapacity, probably, Mr. Barrett refused him the necessary recommendation, and his last hope was blasted.

Of Mrs. Angel, with whom he last resided, no inquiries have afforded any satisfactory intelligence; but there can be little doubt that his death was preceded by extreme indigence.

Mr. Cross, an apothecary in Brook-street, informed Mr. Warton, that when Chatterton lived in the neighbourhood, he frequently called at the shop, and was repeatedly pressed by Mr. Cross to dine or sup with him, in vain. One evening, however, human frailty so far prevailed over his dignity, as to tempt him to partake of the regale of a barrel of oysters, when he was observed to eat most voraciously.

Mrs. Wolfe, a barber's wife, within a few doors of the house where Mrs. Angel lived, has also afforded ample testimony, both to his poverty and his pride. She says, 'that Mrs. Angel told her after his death, that on the 24th of August, as she knew he had not eaten any thing for two or three days, she begged he would take some dinner with her; but he was offended at her expressions, which seemed to hint that he was in want, and assured her he was not hungry.'

'Over his death, for the sake of humanity,' says Mr. Croft, 'I would willingly draw a veil. But this must not be. They who are in a condition to patronise merit, and they who feel a consciousness of merit which is not patronised, may form their own resolutions from the catastrophe of his tale;....those to lose no opportunity of befriending genius; these to seize every opportunity of befriending themselves, and upon no account to harbour the most distant idea of quitting this world, however it may be unworthy of them, lest despondency should at last deceive us into so unpardonable a step.'

Chatterton, as appears by the Coroner's inquest, swallowed arsenic in water, on the 24th of August 1770, and died, in consequence thereof, the next day, at the age of seventeen years and nine months. He was buried in a shell in the burying ground of Shoe-lane work-house.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Finding very little occasion for my guide or mule, and being much plagued with leading the latter from rock to rock, I determined sending them back as soon as I arrived at the little village of Valorsine, where I hired a smart looking young peasant to guide me to Chamouny, which was about twelve miles off.

The mountains which shut in the little valley of Valorsine are extremely high and steep, from which large avalanches fall in winter, and frequently destroy travellers as well as the peasants, for they are sometimes so huge, that their velocity, increased by their weight, carries them even across the valley, and some distance up the side of the opposite mountain.

My guide appeared a very intelligent young man, and amused me by the account he gave of his little valley, from which he had never wandered farther than Martigny and Chamouny. He said there were only ninety-four inhabitants who worked the ground themselves, with the assistance of their cows, for there was not a mule or horse belonging to it, the winter being too long, and the hay they make insufficient for their support. Oxen are for the same reason rejected for cows, which not only perform all the laborious parts of agriculture, but supply milk, cheese, and butter, their staple articles, and which they exchange at the neighbouring towns, on market days, for the necessaries they require.

When I first entered the valley of Chamouny, I was struck with the grandeur of the scenery, and the beauty of the cultivation of the plains. Thick vapours enveloped the summit of Mont Blanc, but his white sides betrayed the giant of the Alps, and I admired its grandeur, though in part obscured. In one single view I beheld the glaciers of Argentiere and des Bois, the former of which is the source of a rapid torrent, whose azure arch I crossed the stream, among blocks of granite, to admire. I ventured near enough to distinguish the gushing of the waters from out of the deep recesses of this cerulean grotto, but as I had heard of accidents from the falling of the arch of ice, which is constantly dissolving, I refrained from a closer examination.

I continued my walk along the banks of the Arne till I came to the village of Chamouny, after passing through several small hamlets, whose neat cottages and inclosures bespoke content and humble happiness. The fields began now to assume a tawny hue, and the season had spread its influence up the sides of the mountains, where the deep green of the pine forests was all the verdure nature had left to enliven the dreary prospects, except a few pastures in the bottoms, whose happier situation had spun out their existence a little longer than the rest, and informed the traveller of the beauties an earlier visit would have presented to his view in this much celebrated and charming valley.

My arrival was a cause of great joy in the village, where travellers, particularly Englishmen, (who are great favourites), have been scarce since the war began; and as Americans are universally on the continent considered as Englishmen, I received a hearty welcome from the landlord of the inn, who put me into a nice little building, which he had erected for the accommodation of travellers of the better sort, and left me the whole house to myself.

I was soon after my arrival beset by guides, chrysal hunters, &c. offering their services and curiosities with such importunity, that it cost me a few livres to get rid of them. My landlord recommended to me, as a guide, Jacques Paccard, who had often accompanied M. de Saussure in his Alpine excursions. As he appeared intelligent, strong, and obliging, I have engaged him to attend me by day break to-morrow, to show me the top of the Montanvert. So, till I return, farewell.

November 2.

Excursion to the Montanvert and the Mer de Glace.

I was up this morning as soon as the day dawned, and was mortified to find the valley covered with fog. I returned to my bed in despair of ever seeing the far-famed glaciers of Chamouny, but it was not long before Paccard rapped at my door, telling me he was ready, and congratulated me on the morning being so fine. I instantly ran to the window, and was astonished to find the fog had entirely disappeared, and left me the proud prospect of Mont Blanc to his very summit without a cloud. Elated with my good fortune, I made haste to dress myself, and, after partaking of a slight breakfast, set out with my guide for the top of the Montanvert.

About a mile beyond the Arve, we began to ascend by a slanting, rugged path, through a dark grove of pines and larches. Had I not been pretty well accustomed to mountainous ascents, I should have found this a very fatiguing one. On emerging from the forest, we crossed a deep ravine, worn by the rapid fall of the rocks from above, the fragments of which lay in piles below us, with trunks of trees brought down by the impetuosity of their descents. On raising my eyes, the prospect of the projecting masses above me was not a little terrifying, as I could not tell the moment when they might be loosened, and particularly as my guide had cautioned me, just before we entered upon this scene, not to speak loud, lest the vibrations of the air might detach any rocks that were tottering, and required only a slight agitation to produce their fall. A short distance farther we crossed the fragments of a small avalanche of snow, that had fallen a few days before, which was another warning to me of the danger of travels among the Alps, for had we met with it in its descent, we should infallibly have been precipitated down the steep in the forest, which grows at the foot of the mountain.

MISCELLANY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

It has been my practice, for several years, to keep minutes of the little excursions, which the heat of the city renders necessary during the summer; and though my vanity cannot dub them travels, yet I have thought that some of them might give interest to a page of narrative. I have lying by me one of an excursion to Albany, in which I have attempted to sketch a few scenes from the banks of the Hudson; should the present attempt meet a favourable reception, that will be sent you for insertion.

B.

Extracts from mem. of an excursion to Bedford, in the county of West Chester and state of New-York, in the summer of 1803.

Arrived about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Bedford is a pleasantly situated village, surrounded by rugged elevations, which, though they do not deserve the name of mountains, yet give an air of serenity and seclusion to the valley they incircle. To those, who have been accustomed to contemplate the unvaried surface of a sea coast, in which little escapes the innovations of art, but the soil which she cultivates, this village and its environs must furnish a topic of new and delightful emotion. And surely to persecuted Virtue, or deluded Hope, no asylum can be more sacred; no solitudes in which oblivion may sooner steal over the poignancy of sensation, and sooth, in his exile from the world, the wearied victim of its passions. On descending into these secluded vales, the deepness of the shade, and the hallowed stillness of the air, divested me of the cares, and I might almost say the consciousness, of a social being. I left behind me all ideas of a world in which repose is denied even to virtue; or thought of it only to render more delicious the quiet that incircled me. Fancy pictured, in the seclusion of Bedford, those haunts which the passion of Petrarch has made immortal. The sighs of the evening gale seemed to breathe the imperfect accents of his lyre, and the echo, that floated on its bosom, murmured the name of Laura!

The approach to Bedford furnishes a view as interesting from its rudeness, as from its extent. After a gradual ascent of about a mile, you reach the summit of a hill, on the south side of the valley in which the village is situated. On gaining this elevation, an assemblage of objects, than which nothing in nature can be conceived more sublime or beautiful, occasions a momentary pause of rapture. Beneath you, the road is seen at intervals, as it descends the hill, till it is lost in the foliage of locusts: from these the spire of the village church rises in all the pride of rustic magnificence. The cottages, which from the abruptness of the declivity, themselves in a great measure escape the view, are beautifully reflected from the transparent bosom of a lake. To the right, the eye extends over a soil, at one time swelling into craggy elevations, and at another spreading itself into vales of the most enchanting verdure. To the north and west, it extends over a vast succession of mountains, wooded to their summits, and throwing their shadows over intervals of equal wildness. It is, at length, arrested in its excursions by the lofty barriers of the Hudson, which, from their distance and elevation, form an interesting back-ground to the picture. The lake, whose placid bosom seems never to have felt a tempest, is not the least interesting object in the group; and had it been seated amid the haunts of Avernus orocluse, instead of bearing, (as it does here), the humble title of a pond, would, ere this, have grown immortal with the strain that floated from its shores, or the pencil that sketched its beauties.

Rode the same evening to Mr. JAY's, formerly the governor of this state, and the author of the famous treaty with Great Britain, which has excited the clamours of some, but the admiration and gratitude of every real friend to his country.

Great men are always interesting, but never more so than in retirement. Power throws around them a lustre which too often dazzles the eye of scrutiny, or seduces her into a complaisance to error. Though the closet may be, in some measure, an avenue to the heart, and there are moments when even hypocrisy is herself, yet the scope which they give to speculation is so narrow, and so perfidious to truth are the confidants of the great, that genuine character may lie forever concealed behind the fame of a statesman or a hero. In retirement we view them without the hazard of deception. Ambition has there ceased to glow; the fervors of party have subsided, and the meridian of action and of enterprise is exchanged for the mild twilight of philosophy. We there view them stripped of the ceremonials of office, and wielding the humble sceptre of individual sway. And surely no idea can be more interesting or sublime than that of a genius which has once swayed the councils, or shaped the destinies of an empire, engaged in domestic duty, and incircled by the domestic virtues. The great man, in retirement, is like the ship of war, which, after braving many a combat, lies peacefully embosomed in the harbour, and yet awes us by the recollection of the victories she has won.

To men, who have served their country merely because she served their interest, and who measure merit by equipage or dress; it would, perhaps, be matter of not a little astonishment to recognize in the venerable farmer of Bedford, a character who has more than once filled, with honour, the highest dignities of this state, and represented in Europe the legatory sense of the nation. And yet in his countenance you cannot but read the superiority of the man. With an eye of the mildest expression, he is possessed of features which are the sure indications of intellectual activity and vigor. Serious, yet not severe, and superior to the artifices of a borrowed consequence; you see in him nothing of that decisive superciliousness, which is so often (and it would seem with some justice) the companion of his greatness. In short his condescensions are not less dignified than his commands; and he interests you as much by the superior powers of his mind, as he does by that bewitching address, by which he teaches you to forget that you are his inferior.

Mr. JAY has chosen, for his retreat, a spot most beautifully adapted to study and contemplation; in which, like Cincinnatus, he can enjoy, apart from its turmoils, the sweet reflection of having served his country. But his ease is not inglorious. It is not the nerveless apathy of indolence or disgust. He has but exchanged one sphere of action for another. While his lighter moments are divided between the little cares of his family and the delightful study of nature, his closet is still the scene of painful application. He is preparing to favour the world with a comment on the Prophecies; a subject on which he has bestowed much thought and attention. So that those who lament the state of things, which forced such patriotism and talents into exile, will, at least, have the consolation to reflect, that, even in retirement, those talents and that patriotism are devoted to his country. B

FROM THE CHARLESTON COURIER.

The celebrated Henry Fielding, who had certainly more wit as well as humour than any man of his day, has in one of the preliminary chapters which we find prefixed to each Book of his novels, very gravely laboured to prove that men who pretend to write, ought to make themselves masters of the subject they attempt to discuss. The reader will see that this was an ironical sneer at ignorant scribblers, and will feel the acumen of it more poignantly when he reads 'The Contents' of that chapter, which, as well as we can recollect, is couched in these words: 'Chap. I. Which serves to shew that an author will not be likely to write the worse for understanding a little of his subject.' A man must live long and variously in life, and be habituated to diligent critical observation upon language, and the subjects to which language is applied, before he would be able to discern the beauty and force of this satire of Fielding's, or to conceive the number of instances, and the extent of the abuses to which it may be applied, almost every day that he looks about him, or reads a common publication. According to all the received notions of the lettered men of the world, a person, before he attempts to instruct, ought to have been instructed; before he enters upon the office of explaining a science, or discussing a subject of any kind, he ought to be master of it in all its relations; and before he erects himself into the office of holding discourses, whether to instruct, to convince, or to persuade, ought at least to know the use of words, the correct construction of language, and the properties of style. In a word, that to constitute a writer, even a moderately decent writer, two things are absolutely and essentially necessary: one, knowledge of the subject on which he descants; the other, knowledge of language sufficient to appropriate precise words to the meaning which he intends to convey.

If either of these were of necessity to be dispensed with, it is evidently the power over language which could be best spared, though words, being the types of ideas, one would think it must be impossible to utter the one, but at the suggestion of the other; for, exclusive of the trifling consideration, that words without any meaning are at best unproductive of improvement or pleasure, there is this accumulation of evil in it, that those who have the courage to attempt such displays of their talents, are sure to multiply and increase the sound and the bulk of their words in proportion to the vacuity of their brains; so that the sound is sure to be always in the inverse ratio of the sense.

Whenever the itch for scribbling, or making speeches, commonly called Orations, has seized a young person without adequate talents or education; when that distemper called the cacoethes scribendi, gets a fast hold of him, he may be set down at once as in a state of incurable madness. The very nature and origin of the disease prevents the cure of it; for he who imagines himself capable of giving public instruction, or blazing as an author or poet, without information or learning, labours under a calenture of the brain, which never will submit to the drudgery or humiliation of receiving from the instruction of others what he so deplorably wants himself.

If some of this sort of gentlemen, who flatter themselves that they are writers merely on the strength of heaping together a congeries of words, which convey no one distinct idea; and who think themselves eloquent, when they are only provoking laughter or pity, by their efforts, were acquainted with the light in which their compositions are viewed by the discerning, or could imagine the contempt they excite, assuredly they would not take such pains to incur it. The mind goes along with, approves, and often admires the labours of a man, who, though deficient in words, possesses strong sense, sound judgment, and a perfect knowledge of his subject. His words, such as they are, convey his thoughts, and his thoughts being worth the conveying, and deserving of attention, his efforts are always more or less successful. He has not ready-treasured up in memory a variety of words, from which to make a choice, but his thoughts engender words suited to them; and when they are not engendered by thoughts, words are as troublesome and disgusting to the hearers or readers, and much less curious than the chattering of a monkey, or the mimicry of a parrot or magpie.

If those gentlemen could be prevailed upon to lower their great minds down to a little reading, the first books that a good instructor ought to put into their hands, would be those in which they might see a picture of their own style; and after they had laughed heartily at it, and enjoyed all the pleasure to which the ridiculous can help them, they should then be shown the resemblance between it and their own productions, and if they are not ashamed at once out of writing, they must be eternally incurable: wanting, as they must, the fundamental materials of improvement, discernment and modesty. If Blackmore could continue to write epic poetry, after having read Martinus Scriblerus, he must have had a singular organization of nerves.

Or if some modern writers and orators (God bless the mark) were to be shown the mock tragedy farce of Cronenhotonthologos, or the letter which the schoolmaster, in Peregrine Pickle, writes for Tom Pipes to Emilia, and were told 'behold, there is the picture of your style,' they would be startled, and probably for a while doubt the existence of a resemblance, thought it could be seen by every other eye to be a likeness not caricatured, and very little, if at all, overcharged.

A man who is skilful in style, knows from the reading of the first two or three sentences at most, the calibre of the writer's intellect and acquirements. If he sees words which convey no precise idea, or have no business in that place; if he sees a starved thought puffed out like a dropsical carcase on spindle legs, or a bladder puffed with wind, he at once discerns the radical incurable feebleness of the writer; if he sees a laborious attempt to raise a trivial or ordinary object beyond its natural level, by overstrained, awkward efforts at quaint thoughts, and disproportionate, extravagant words, multiplied as well as magnified; if he sees redundant, useless epithets, extravagant far-fetched metaphors, many figures confounded and jumbled together in one illustration; in a word, if he sees that farra-go of trash, which writers of the description we allude to void, when they get seated under the ridiculous operation of a verbal diarrhoea, he directly perceives that the author is not only unfit to write, but ignorant of his subject; and what is much worse, because more incurable, ignorant of his own deficiencies.

Those extravagant effusions of vanity and weakness resemble nothing of which we read in the annals of folly, so much as the caperings of the crack-brain Knightrider, or the Sorrowful Countenance, when he strips himself, and exposing his meagre nakedness to broad sunshine, dances, sings and cuts capres to the tune of his own fancy, and the honour of his dulcinea. If indeed they were as harmless; if they were done on the Sierra mountains, or in the swamps and wildernesses of America, in private prank, it would be something; but if they come forth from the press, publicity may make them mischievous. Those who have not had means of judging by comparison, will accept them as models, perhaps adopt their manner, and thus the very heart of the growing literature of the country be gangrened and polluted. Such things ought certainly to be discouraged, on that important principle. But on another account also. For the honour of the country they ought to be discountenanced. For what must the people of Europe think of Americans, if they see that with them the most vapid nonsense passes current for literary composition, and the most turgid bombast for style?

For grievances of this kind, in which the law denies the remedy which the public advantage requires, there is but one mode of procedure, and that is, by ridicule. The species of vicious composition now complained of, has obtained such general circulation of late, that one would think it was owing to some new distemperature of the air. The majestic, vigorous, energetic simplicity of the style which distinguished the writings of WASHINGTON, and was the result of his clear and comprehensive genius, has fallen out of use along with his virtues and politics, and the country is already inundated with productions, which, if not discountenanced, will produce, within the sphere of their influence, a foul, corrupt taste; a taste for that bloated badderdash and fulsome bombast; that froth and whip-syllabub, so characteristic of weak, uninformed minds, and so congenial to the maudlin politics and flimsy philosophy of the day.

CORREGIDOR.

From the Picture of London, for 1803.

THE PORTER BREWERY.

The wholesome and excellent beverage of Porter, obtained its name about the year 1730, from the following circumstances, which not having yet been printed, we think them proper to record in this work. Prior to the above mentioned period, the malt liquors in general use were ale, beer, and two-penny, and it was customary for the drinkers of malt liquor to call for a pint or a tankard of half and half, i. e. a half of ale and half of beer, a half of ale and half of two-penny, or a half of beer and half of two-penny. In course of time it also became the practice to call for a pint or tankard of three threads, meaning a third of ale, beer, and two-penny; and thus the publican had the trouble to go to three casks, and turn three cocks for a pint of liquor. To avoid this trouble and waste, a brewer, of the name of Harwood, conceived the idea of making a liquor which should partake of the united flavours of ale, beer, and two-penny. He did so, and succeeded, calling it entire, or entire butt, meaning that it was entirely from one cask or butt, and as it was a very hearty, nourishing liquor, it was very suitable for porters and other working people. Hence it obtained its name of porter.

Messrs. Whitbread & Co's. brewery, in Chiswell-street, near Moorfields, is the greatest in London. The commodity produced in it is also esteemed to be of the best quality of any brewed in the metropolis. The quantity of porter brewed in the year in this house, has, when malt and hops were at a moderate price, been about 200,000 barrels.

There is one stone cistern that contains 3600 barrels, and there are 49 large oak vats, some of which contain 3500 barrels. One is 27 feet in height, and 22 feet in diameter, surrounded with iron hoops at every four or five inches distance, and towards the bottom covered with hoops. There are three boilers, each of which holds about 500 barrels.

One of Mr. Watts' fire-engines works the machinery. It pumps the water, wort, and beer; grinds the malt, stirs the mash tubs constantly when wanted, and raises the casks out of the cellars. It is able to do the work of seventy horses, though it is of a small size, being only a 24 inch cylinder, and does not make more noise than a spinning wheel.

One of the most curious parts of the machinery is a screw on the principle of Archimedes, which turns round in a fixed case, and literally screws the malt that is ground by the mill, and conveys it to the top of the building, as the mill happens to be situated rather too low.

In the upper part of the building are cooling cisterns, that would cover above five acres of land, only six inches deep, but made quite tight, and kept very clean. The porter cools in these generally in about six hours.

Great improvements are daily making, and particularly in the boilers, two which are covered so as to collect the steam, and use it instead of cold water, which saves a great deal of fuel.

The barrels, or casks, of ordinary dimensions, are in number about 20,000; two hundred workmen are employed, and eighty horses of a very large size. One was lately killed, being diseased, whose four shoes weighed 24lb. and probably one of the largest of his species.

In the course of the operations, the beer is forced by a pump, in pipes under the street, to a large building on the other side, to be put in casks.

In the mash-tubs, which are about twenty feet deep, there is a machine to stir up the malt, that constantly turns round, and is very ingeniously managed so, by means of a screw, as to rise and fall alternately at the top, the middle, and the bottom.

Whether the great size, or ingenuity of contrivance, is considered, this brewery is one of the greatest curiosities that is to be seen any where, and certainly little less than half a million sterling is employed in machinery, buildings and materials.

We must not omit here to mention, in contradiction to a long but ill founded belief, that Thames water alone would make good porter, that in this large brewery the water used is not from the Thames, but from the New-River.

The quantity of porter brewed in London annually, exceeds 1,200,000 barrels of thirty-six gallons each.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The works of STERNE, after contending with the prejudices of some, and the ignorance of others, have at length obtained that general approbation, which they are intitled to by their various, original, and intrinsic merits. No writer of the present times can lay claim to so many unbounded excellencies. In none have wit, humour, fancy, pathos, an unbounded knowledge of mankind, and a correct and elegant style, been so happily united. These properties, which render him the delight of every reader of taste, have surmounted all opposition...even Envy, Prudery and Hypocrisy are silent.

Time, which allots to each author his due portion of fame, and admits a free discussion of his beauties and faults, without favour and without partiality, hath done ample justice to the superior genius of STERNE. It hath fixed his reputation as one of the first writers in the English language on the firmest basis, and advanced him to the rank of a classic. [E. Editor.]

Of a noted trimmer and time server in our government, whom the stupidity of republicanism has exalted to an undeserved dignity, we may say in the words of the witty Dr. South, that 'he is like a church weather cock, notable for nothing so much, as standing high, and turning round.'

A brilliant writer says, perhaps more elegantly than justly, that the variety of opinions which prevails among mankind, like the wind blowing at different times from different quarters, and with different degrees of violence and temperature, is certainly productive of a salutary agitation. The languor occasioned by a constant Sicilian sirocco would not be more insufferable than the insipidity of universal consent. If all men thought alike on all subjects, their pursuits would flag for want of opposition. That enlivening diversity, which appears in human life, and is found to promote the ends of social union, by mutually supplying defect, and by stimulating to cheerful exertion, would sink into the dead repose of unvaried uniformity. An offensive stagnation would be the consequence of an exact and universal resemblance of sentiments, instead of that delightful vivacity, which results from the apparent chaos, the discordant concord of taste, studies, sects, parties, principles, antipathies, and predilections. All the hues of the prismatic spectrum are intermixed to produce that beautiful result of the whole, the snowy whiteness of the Swan's plumage.

The modest Addison was accused by a lady of being dull and heavy in conversation. 'Madam,' he replied with great dignity, 'I have only nine pence in my pocket, but I can draw for a thousand pounds.'

It is, perhaps, not generally known that Addison had apartments at the village of Islington, whither he occasionally retired, and where it is supposed he wrote some of the papers in the Spectator.

TO THE EVITES.

In ancient Greece, we know, the nude
Was scientifically pursued;
In public stood full many a goddess,
Without a kerchief or a boddice;
Such charms celestial could defy,
And blind at once the critic's eye.
Thus now a lady at a ball,
Whose wealth is merely personal,
If she is pretty, gay, or young,
Displays her charms the beaux among,
While all can read in her soft eye,
'Bosoms to sell; at who will buy?'
When madam, of a certain age,
Yields to this all unstripping rage,
And shews to the amaz'd beholders
Her ample back and brawny shoulders,
And by her plenteous lack of dress,
Shews her thin neck quite bosomless!
Since no sound motive can direct her,
So far at least as I conjecture,
No hopes from gentle love entice her,
I wish her modester and wiser.

A TALE.

A learned lady, there are some,
Or were, at least, who us'd to come,
In the life time of Montague,
To a snug club yclept Bas bleu,
Once to a sage was introduc'd,
And soon the lady's tongue was loos'd.
The man had quite a philosophic scowl,
Nodded, and look'd as grave as any owl;
But such a constant silence kept,
You would have thought the man had slept.
Soon after this choice conference,
The lady with her friends began:
'I never met with so much sense,
Such modesty, in any man!'
He nodded at the proper place,
And never once mistook the case;
Would now most pertinently smile,
And paid attention all the while.
I now have met, for what I've long been yearning,
A man of real wit and real learning.

A wag, who had devis'd the scheme,
Thought this a time to raise their mirth,
Dear madam, this is all a dream,
I'm glad he was not troublesome,
But I have known him from his birth,
And the poor man was born both deaf and dumb.

On the Ladies, wearing watches in their bosoms.

Widings might say, each lovely creature
Wears in her bosom a repeater,
Because most ladies shew a liking
To every thing they reckon striking;
And that some fair ones love the trick
Of taking up their goods on tick,
What though I would not wish to flatter,
My thoughts are different on the matter.
Dear creatures, I rejoice to spy
Such symptoms of philosophy;
That time you most devoutly prize
Is plainly shewn by where it lies;
Or, could it occupy a part
So very near a lady's heart?

My Chloe has immortal charms
Which time and death defy;
Of ivory are both her arms,
And a diamond is each eye.

Her hair of ebony is made,
Each lock so strong and big,
That not e'en fashion will persuade
My nymph to wear a wig.

Her bosom, all so fair and round,
Is made of alabaster;
So no good reason can be found
To say it will not last her.

The face of this enchanting maid,
Is one bright damask rose;
And when it on her cheeks shall fade,
'Twill flourish on her nose.

For beauty equal, and for fame
Her praise I'll still rehearse,
Whose charms are lasting as my flame,
And deathless as my verse.

To Lucasta, on going to the wars, by the celebrated
Col. LOVELACE.

Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
To warre and arms I flee.

True; a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field;
And, with a stronger faith, embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such,
As you too shall adore;
I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Lov'd I not honour more.

'Leopold,' a new novel, is highly praised in that elegant miscellany, the European Magazine. It is said to abound with incidents ingeniously imagined, and characters in high and low life well delineated, and properly contrasted. It is evidently the production of an experienced writer, capable of deducing useful instruction from the passing scenes of life.

SONG.

From the Sylph of Charles Lofty, Esq.

I danc'd with Harriet at the fair,
And prais'd her for her jetty hair,
Which, like the tendrils of a vine,
About her brow in wanton twine

Luxuriantly ran;
But why I prais'd her, sweet one, know,
Because I recollected, so
The tresses negligently flow

About the cheeks of Ann.

One evening in the passion week
When Lucy play'd at hide and seek,
Her black eyes shone like glow worms bright,
And led me by their sparkling light
To find out where she ran;
But if I praise them, sweet one, know
I recollected even so
The black eyes sparkle, burn and glow
Of gentle mistress Ann.

Louisa's lips in kisses meet
Like a twin cherry, ripe and sweet;
In Catharine's breath rich perfume dwells;
But, ah! how Julia's bosom swells
To charm the gaze of man!
Yet, if I praise them, sweet one, know
They singly but remind me....so
Lips, breath and bosom I can show
All blent in mistress Ann.

Lines written on the back of a picture, painted by J. Cranch, honorary member of the American Philosophical Society:

What steads the shivering artist fancy's fires;
The shadow'd garb....the visionary bread;
Condemn'd in cold obscurity to pine,
Himself unclad, and 'mid the feast unfed'? J. C.

ANSWER.

Why, artist, should thy honest soul repine
At ragged coat shin beef, and vapid wine?
Why waste thy rich fraught hours in plaints to heaven,
For aught it has withheld, or aught has given?
Fools fatly live to....die without a name;
Wits greatly starve....to gain immortal fame!

EPIGRAM.

Tom's fruitful spouse bestow'd a yearly child,
And he was happy while the bantlings smil'd;
Three years ago he join'd a martial band,
And sought for laurels in a distant land:
Yet such the force of habit, Nell, they say,
Still has her yearly child, tho' Tom's away.

Democracy and universal suffrage have an inevitable tendency to equalize property, and to destroy all artificial distinctions, which are created by property. But it should be remembered, for our consolation, that property, especially property in slaves, is firmly established by our free constitution, and that the votes, which the masters of slaves acquire by that property, may sometimes enable them to choose a president of the United States, in opposition to the majority of the citizens, slaves being the only species of property that is represented in our legislature.

No doubt the British entertain hostile dispositions towards America, which they now consider as a province of France, their ancient enemy. But while we are secure in the union of our citizens, which so happily prevails, and the friendship of the great nation, we need not care for British hostility, nor court British friendship. In a manner, suitable to republican economy, we have engaged to pay them what we owed them, or, at least, what the Virginia merchants owed them, and we have nothing further to do with the English, except to use their manufactures, as long as the French traders refuse to give us credit. Being now in possession of liberty and independence, and holding so lofty a rank among the nations of the world, as we do at present, we may laugh at the melancholy apprehensions and mistaken conjectures of the disciples of the old school. There is not the remotest probability of a civil war, or a dissolution of our famous confederacy. The north has the most perfect confidence in the virtue of the south, and Virginia would to-morrow surrender up her virgin charms to Vermont. Negroes and republicans love each other like Jonathan and David, and Puritans and rakehells harmonize in a concert truly delightful.

There are many who are the most fit to govern, and that the duty of the few is only to obey them, is a principle so evident to a republican understanding, that it has become the ruling and determining principle in all legislative and judicial assemblies in which the sentence of the majority is held to be the sentence of the whole, which supposes that every individual has an equal right and capacity of judging; as, otherwise, the majority of the citizens of a state, counted, like cattle, by the head, could not be reckoned the whole state, in matters of election.

Mr. Hooker has long since observed how easy it is to persuade men that they are ill governed when they themselves are not the governors, but this art has been carried to much greater perfection, since his time, by our modern demagogues, whose liberty is enlightened by philosophy, whereas, in Mr. Hooker's time, all men were hampered by religious principles of one sort or other, to which they were obliged to reconcile their notions in the best manner they could, though at present they are only governed by reason and philosophy, i. e. by their own ideas and inclinations.

The, celebrated Bonaparte appears to have posset, in the highest degree, the talent described in our last paragraph. He was able to persuade the directory and legislative assemblies of France, that the republic had been ill governed for years. He did not, it is true, trouble himself to collect proofs, but supported his assertion by forty grenadiers, abundantly qualified to supply the place of arguments.

A passion for revolutions and reforms, was unquestionably introduced into England at the revolution of 1688, and so confirmed as to be almost established in the national faith and practice. The habit of finding fault with almost every thing that is established proceeds from a persuasion that government is neither sacred nor inviolable. But this must appear absurd to those, who believe that government is merely an ordinance of the people, which they may alter or overturn at their pleasure.

A wit, bemoaning the uncomfortable prospect of celibacy, and comparing the respective happiness of a married and single state, exclaimed, what can make the bitter cup of a bachelor's life go down! and in the same tone, by way of self-condolent response, observed, a-las! a-las!

There is a passage in Churchill's Poems which one would suppose was written for the express purpose of ridiculing that nonsensical and whining style of poetry, too prevalent on this side of the Atlantic.

Ah! woeful me! ah! woeful man!
Ah! woeful all! do all we can.
Who can on earthly things depend,
From one to t'other moment's end?
Honour, wit, genius, wealth and glory,
Good lack! good lack! are transitory;
Nothing is sure and stable found,
The very earth itself turns round.
Monarchs, nay ministers must die,
Must rot, must stink.....ah me! ah why?
Cities themselves in time decay;
If cities thus.....ah! well a day!
If brick and mortar have an end,
On what can flesh and blood depend.
Ah! woeful me! ah woeful man!
Ah! woeful all! do all we can!

Inordinate desire for power and rank is the secret stimulus for canting patriotism. John Hampden did not value the payment of twenty shillings to a tax gatherer of Charles I. a sum so puny was not an object to an opulent country gentleman. But it imported his ambition much to engage in a controversy with the king his master. One ray of anger from a STUART would illumine the obscurity of John Hampden.

From a late most extraordinary and stupendous communication to the apostate Talleyrand, it should seem that our French ambassador at the court of the Corsican was not only deaf to the suggestions of prudence, but blind to the dearest interests of his country.

Wanted for the Aurora service. Three fellows without ears, two with backs flagrant from the beadle, one traitor, and a couple of deists. None need apply, but who can comewell recommended from Newgate, or their last place.

COVENT GARDEN.

OTHELLO. This play is got up with unusual magnificence, and was, as it deserved, well received. Mr. Kemble in Othello, was in general tame and whining. The famous apology in the first act we never heard so badly delivered. In some of the impassioned parts he was very impressive. Pity it is that the advantages of person, of attitude, and of matchless art, which he possesses, should not be attended with a more natural manner of speaking.

Mr. Cook, in Iago, drew, and most justly drew, an universal applause from the beginning to the end. He appears no where to greater advantage than in Iago.

Mrs. Siddons bids defiance to time, and though we might wish her younger, we cannot wish her to play the part of Desdemona better.

Mrs. Litchfield was, as usual, admirable. Her merit last night is greatly enhanced by the state of her health, which would have given her a juster right to plead indisposition than is sometimes assumed.

Charles Kemble was superior to himself. His drunken scene was excellently performed.

[Lon. paper.]

An Irish Journalist observes, that an invisible female is exposed in Paris to the curiosity of spectators. The price is one shilling a sight.

A novel has been lately published in England, intitled 'Azemia,' by Jaquetta Agnetta Mariana Jenks. This bead roll of a name reminds us of Dr. GOLDSMITH's Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs.

EPITAPH.

Here rests my spouse; no pair thro' life
So equal liv'd as we did,
Alike we shar'd perpetual strife,
Nor knew I rest till she did.

Any person, moderately skilled in the English language, and in the laws of logic, will have instant occasion, in perusing the Aurora, to apply to that paper the following lines from GIFFORD:

Abortive thoughts, that right and wrong confound,
Truth sacrific'd to party, sense to sound;
False glare, incongruous images combine,
And noise and nonsense clatter thro' the line.

The Fellows of Baliol College, in Oxford, ordered the gates to be shut on the fast day. Dr. Leigh, the master, said on the occasion: 'we are very strict on the observance of this day; we not only fast ourselves, but make the gates fast also.'

A butcher's boy, on Saturday last, carrying his tray on his shoulders, accidentally struck it against a lady's head, and discomposed her wig. 'The deuce take the tray,' cried the lady in a passion. 'Madam,' said the lad gravely, 'the deuce cannot take the tray.'

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'Climenole' is very earnestly requested to persevere in his laudable design. Let him shame those by satire, who are callous to every thing else, and render ridiculous those false traitors and false tenets, on which argument and truth have been exercised in vain and exhausted. We hope to hear from him both publicly and privately.

It is understood that there are certain studious and literary ladies in this city, who, though possessing the powers of invention and poetry, are timid of criticism, and slow to publish. They may be assured that their essays shall experience no rude or cold treatment from the Editor. He is anxious to render service to modest merit, and to give the most liberal encouragement to the genius, talents, and virtue of the ladies.

The successful imitator of the style of Hudibras, who once called himself Simon Spunkey in the country, and now passes by the name of Christopher Caustic in town, has promised certain poetical contributions to the Editor.

The spirited strictures by FALKLAND on the indiscreet and pernicious letter of Mr. Livingston, our French ambassador, shall be inserted next week. The name, the style, and the sentiments of this indignant writer are all respectable, in the estimation of the Editor.

'B' the author of a tour, which has been vividly sketched in the Port Folio of this week, is a traveller with the eye of a poet, and the observation of a man of the world. His remarks on the character of Mr. JAY are peculiarly delightful to the Editor. To the sagacity, courage, foresight, and energy of this eminent statesman, we are indebted for a Treaty, without which this country would have been completely convulsed by the lunatics of Jacobinism, and probably nothing more than a fief of the regicide.

The well deserved and contemptuous criticism by 'Corregidor,' we copy with alacrity from the Charleston Courier, an elegant and judicious Journal, whose circulation if, commensurate with our warm wishes, would be as wide as the limits of our country.

The translation of that exquisite elegy of Milton, which, with 'luscious elegance,' he composed during his minority, is confessedly from a juvenile pen. Still to attempt a version of such elegant Latinity, as is contained in those sweet verses, which begin thus,

In se perpetuo tempus revolvibile gyro
Iam revocat zephyros vere tepente novos.

is itself worthy of commendation. Our youthful translator has in many stanzas acquitted himself adroitly, and if some of his lines be harsh or obscure, there is general evidence of Genius in the production. In this new and rude country, in consequence of the execrable nature of our institutions, it is very rare for a republican stippling to read Latin, and it is still more rare to relish it. For neither in the style nor the sentiments of the ancients is there any thing which is of kindred to Indian literature, or Gallic opinions. We, therefore, always hail every performance, which exhibits either ROMAN beauty, or ENGLISH good sense, and disdainfully leave to the Vandal republican his Boston orations of the fifth of March, and his fanatic sermons of the nineteenth of April. With the taut and tinsel of speech let him be dazzled, while the Editor and his friends are contented to admire its STERLING PURITY.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. OLDSCHOOL,

If you think the following attempt to translate one of the youthful Latin effusions of that great poet, Milton, merits a place in the Port Folio, you will be pleased to insert it. It is but justice to the translator to mention, that, at the time of the translation, he was of the same age, as the author was when he wrote the original, Anno. Ætatis 20.

A TRANSLATION OF MILTON'S FIFTH LATIN ELEGY, ON THE APPROACH OF SPRING.

Now Time, revolving in perpetual gyre,
Recalls th' enlivening zephyrs of the Spring,
And earth, array'd in juvenile attire,
From icy bondage free, essays to sing.

Am I deceiv'd?...or does the season shed
Its genial influence on the poet's mind?
While all around its blooming flowrets spread,
The grateful Muse returns her gifts in kind.

Castalia's founts, Parnassus' tops, appear,
And visions bear me o'er Iberia's mound;
Apollo comes, the Io Pæans hear,
Apollo comes, with wreaths of laurel crown'd.

I feel my heart with strange emotions heave,
With an internal, sacred ardour glow;
I seem terrestrial objects now to leave,
And on the swift-wing'd flying clouds to go.

Through groves and haunts of ancient bards I rove,
In fanes of deities I dare to go;
I see the secrets of the heaven above,
And all th' arcana of the hell below.

What so sublime my feeble voice inspires?
What means this sacred fury of the mind?
'Tis joyous Spring the muse's gifts requires,
Gifts of a pleasing, profitable kind.

Now, Philomela chaunts the woods among,
Yet is each songster silent in the grove;
Permit the muse to join thy evening song,
And hail the time of universal love.

Hail! happiest season of the rolling year!
In annual stanzas would I sing thy praise;
But youth unskill'd forbids the task to dare,
A task reserved for superior lays.

Now Sol from Africa withdraws his ray,
And guides his horses to the northern plain;
Short is Night's journey, short is her delay,
And early morn dispells her horrid train.

Bootes follows not the lesser bear,
Few stars keep watch around the court of Jove;
The gods more gigantic crimes may fear,
For murder, fraud, and force with night are drove.

Perchance some shepherd, on a rock reclin'd,
When first Sol brightens o'er the dewy lawn,
Cries, 'sure, O Phebus, Thetis was not kind,
Whose potent charm can oft protract the dawn.'

Now quiver'd Cynthia to the forest strays,
Soon as she spies bright Phebus' car on high,
And as she faintly darts her pallid rays,
Joys to behold her brother's aid so nigh.

Then Phebus....'fair Aurora, rosy maid!
What joy to doze on Tithon's fetid bed!
The youthful hunter waits you in the glade,
Arise, and gild Hymettus' lofty head.'

The splendid goddess modest blush'd her crime,
And urg'd her matin steeds to quicker pace,
To gladden mortals with the morning's prime,
And gild the mountains with her golden face.

Reviving Earth strips off her hated age,
And longs, O Phebus, to attract thy love,
Thy fond affections she would fain engage,
And by her charms thy sensual passions move.

And sure she's worthy;....what more beauteous now?
What bliss luxurious does her breast disclose?
She breathes Arabia....from her comely brow,
With mild camomia sheds the Paphian rose.

Behold, a sacred grove her forehead bind!
(Thus Ops of Ida wore a piny crown);
Her moisten'd locks, with various flow'rs entwined,
Exhibit charms peculiarly her own.

Thus did the goddess of Sicilian plains
Her golden ringlets dress with every flower;
Thus did the trident-bearing god, who reigns
O'er Ocean's realm, submit to beauty's power.

See o'er thy head the Loves alluring play,
And Zephyr fans thee with his odorous wing,
Their vernal orisons the breezes pay,
And birds seem soothing blandishments to bring.

Nor does she poor with ardent passion glow,
Nor the much wish'd for nuptials ready claim;
Salubrious herbs in plenty she'll bestow,
And add a title for thy healing fame.

But if thy breast is touch'd with sordid gain,
(For wealth too oft is venal love's ally),
She boasts whate'er the depth of seas contain,
Or in high heap'd up mountains hidden lie.

If thou, O Phebus, down the west descend,
And languid on thy mother's breast recline;
Says Teren, 'why thy time with Tathes spend?
Why lave thy godlike countenance in brine?

From my cool shades far purer joys accrue,
And softer sleep shall lull thee to thy rest;
Here come, and quench thy ardent locks in dew,
Here come, and lay thy splendor on my breast.

Where'er you loll, each gentle whispering breeze
Shall fan thee fragrant of the humid rose;
Nor (trust me) shall the luckless Semaes,
Nor fate of Phæton, my bliss oppose.'

Thus wanton Terra breath'd her amorous sighs,
The fair example mankind still admire,
For gadding Cupid o'er the world now flies,
And lights his languid torch from Phebus' fire.

His fatal bow now twangs with new fix'd strings,
His ferrean shafts now shine with splendor dire;
On Dian's virtue his attempts he brings,
And the vow'd vestal of the sacred fire.

Venus repairs her beauty in decay,
The marine goddess we again adore,
The youths of Hymen shout along the way,
But Hymen, Hymen, echoes from the shore.

The bridegroom comes array'd in decent vest,
His saffron garments richest perfume bring,
The girdled maid now heaves her virgin breast
For joys peculiar to the blissful Spring.

So fondly wishes what is wish'd by all,
O! Venus, grant me but the man I love,
To virtuous love let fame and grandeur fall,
While thro' the wilds of pleasing sense I rove.

The shepherd too his jointed reed now plays,
And pretty Phyllis has her fav'rite song;
The sailor soothes his stars in plaintive lays,
And to the sound the listening dolphins throng.

E'en Jove himself, on high Olympus seen,
Now fondly dallies with his darling spouse;
To feasts ambrosial all the Gods convene,
O'er flowing bowls of nectar to carouse.

The Satyrs also at the dappled dawn,
And old Sylvanus with his Cypress rod,
In dancing choirs skip o'er the flowing lawn,
Part demi-goat and part a demi-god.

The Dryads, heretofore in woods conceal'd,
Now range o'er hills and o'er the level plain;
Pan wantons through each shrubbery and field,
Scarce Cybele or Ceres safe remain.

Some mountain-nymph of laughing merry mien,
Faunus pursues with lustful ardor fraught,
She hides, though hiding, wishes to be seen,
And flies, though flying, wishes to be caught.

The gods to heaven prefer the sylvan shade,
And hallow'd groves their deities contain;
Long may each grove by them be sacred made,
Nor leave, ye deities, the bless'd domain.

Thee, mighty Jove, may golden ages bring
To this late manacled and wintry land;
But why wilt thou the clouds of fiery wing,
Arm with red bolts the weapons of thy hand?

Do thou, O Phebus, drive with gentle ease,
Let later shades approach our northern climes;
Let hoary Winter vanish by degrees,
And let the joyous Spring look out betimes.

ODE

To a friend, with a borrowed guinea returned.
By the late Mr. Hoyland.

Auspicious orb! whose cheerful glow
Dispels the sable clouds of woe;
And, circling this terrestrial ball,
Like the gay sun, enlivens all!

Remitted to a generous friend,
My undissembled love commend;
And (such the interest poets pay)
Chink in his ear this moral lay.

'Lo! I return with brighter beam;
Beneficence refines my gleam;
O! may I ever sacred be
To friendship and humanity!

So shall my rays, when yonder light
Is shaded in eternal night,
Above the wreck of nature rise,
And glitter in immortal eyes.'

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

Simplex, et arti prænans facili color
Laboriosa.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

IT is observable in our ancient ballads, that the 'fair ladies,' whom they commemorate, are depicted in as vivid tints, and with as much luxury of description, as was consistent with the sententious phraseology peculiar to the times. They were written in ages when the romantic spirit of chivalry had almost metamorphosed the sex into divinities, when the adventurous knight, or baron bold, deemed the toils of the field, and the perils of impending death more than amply remunerated, if she, whom he selected, and habitually invoked as his tutelary angel, looked with a smile of approbation on his labours, or encompassed his brow with a garland of victory. The 'crisp'd lock' that shone 'like threads of gold,' the sparkling eye that beamed with the lustre of 'orient pearl,' the breath that respired the fragrance of Asphodel, and the arm that outvied the lily, are scattered in generous profusion. With almost all nations the rose appears to have been a favourite standard of comparison: the intertexture of the rose and lily in the cheek, a thought eminently delicate and significative, is celebrated by most of our legendary writers, and before them, by some of the most distinguished of the Roman poets. It is said of fair Rosamond, that

The blood within her chrystal cheeks
Did such a colour drive,
As though the lily and the rose
For mastership did strive.

And of another,

Upon whose lively cheek,
To prove my judgment true,
The rose and lily seem to strive
For equal change of hue.

Virgil gives to his beauty the same embellishment,

Indum sanguineo veluti violaverit ostro
Si quis ebur, aut mixta rubent ubi lilia multa
Alba rosa:

So roses mixt with lilies in their bed,
Blend their rich hues.

Tibullus compliments his Delia on the same attraction:

Et color in niveo corpore purpureus,
Ut cum contextunt amaranthis alba puella:
Lilia, et avumno candida mala rubent.

Lib. 3. Eleg. 4.

and Catullus's Lesbia charms with a similar glow:

Ore floridulo nitens
Alba Parthenice velut
Luteumve papaver. CARM. LXI.

William Thomson, the English poet, has selected this hue for his imaginary beauty, in his masterly 'Hymn to May,'

Young circling roses, blushing round them throw
The sweet abundance of their purple rays;
And lilies, dipt in fragrance, freshly blow,
With blended beauties, in her angel face.

Logan, a Scotch poet of merit, introduces the heroine of a ballad, intitled 'Edward and Emily,' in a manner particularly poetical and interesting:

Her voice, the gentle tone of love,
The heart a captive stole;
The tender accent of her tongue
Went thrilling to the soul.

The graces, that, for nature fair,
Present us mimic art;
The false refinements, that refine
Away the human heart.

She knew not;....in the simple robe
Of innocence and ease;
Complete she shone, and ever pleas'd
Without the thought to please.

In forming the portraiture of 'Eltruda,' Miss Williams has evinced uncommon skill by the amenity of her colouring, and the superior melody of her numbers.

In his Eltruda's gentle breast
His griefs he could repose;
With each endearing virtue bless'd,
She soften'd all his woes.

'Twas easy in her look to trace
An emblem of her mind;
There dwelt each mild attractive grace,
Each gentle charm combin'd;

Soft as the dews of morn arise,
And on the pale flower gleam,
So soft, so sweet, her melting eyes
With love and pity beam.

As far retir'd the lonely flower
Smiles in the desert vale,
And blooms, its balmy sweets to pour
Upon the flying gale;

So liv'd in solitude unseen
This lovely, peerless maid;
So sweetly grac'd the vernal scene,
And blossom'd in the shade.

Genius languishing in inactive seclusion, or beauty flourishing in obscurity, assimilated to the flower that blows unseen, and pours its sweets on the passing gale, is one of the most exquisite comparisons to be found in the whole range of literature. Gray has pursued and illustrated this image in his Elegy on a Church-yard, to render it the most prominent of the felicities both of sentiment and of diction, which mark that first of elegies. Although Miss Williams cannot claim the palm of originality, she is scarcely inferior to any poet in the happy evolution of the idea, and the suavity of her verse. Ossian, whose allusions and similitudes are so luxuriantly drawn from almost every object, either tender or sublime, of uncultivated nature, has not permitted this to escape his research. 'Why did I not pass away in secret,' exclaims a character in Fingal, 'like the flower of the rock that lifts its fair head unseen, and strews its withered leaves on the blast.' Thomson also dwells on the same subject, in his beautiful episode of Lavinia.

As in the hollow breast of Appennine,
Beneath the shelter of incircling hills,
A myrtle rises far from human eye,
And breathes its balmy fragrance o'er the wild:
So flourish'd, blooming and unseen by all,
The sweet Lavinia, &c.

Eltruda's employments are finely designed to impart a more powerful attraction to the character we have just ascribed, and are embellished with imagery highly appropriate and picturesque.

Oft o'er the daisy-sprinkled mead,
She wander'd far away,
Some lambskin to the fold to lead,
That haply chanc'd to stray.

Her heart, where pity lov'd to dwell,
With sadness oft was wrung;
For the bruise'd insect, as it fell,
The soft tear trembling hung.

As roving o'er the flow'ry waste,
A sigh would heave her breast,
The while her gentle hand replac'd
The linnet's falling nest.

Then would she seek the vernal bower,
And haste, with tender care,
To nurse some pale declining flow'r,
Some op'ning blossom rear.

And oft with eager steps she flies
To cheer the lonely cot,
Where the poor widow pours her sighs,
And wails her hapless lot.

Their weeping mother's trembling knees
Her lisping infants clasp;
Their meek imploring look she sees,
She feels their tender grasp.

Wild throbs her aching bosom swell!
They mark the bursting sigh....
(Nature has form'd the soul to feel)
They weep, unknowing why.

Her hands the liberal boon impart,
And much her tear avails,
To soothe the mourner's bursting heart,
Where feeble utterance fails.

On the pale cheek where hung the tear
Of agonizing woe,
She bids the gust of joy rise there,
The tears of rapture flow.

These and similar colours have been generally chosen by the great masters in descriptive poetry, for the delineation of warm sensibility and artless innocence. Such pictures, when appositely introduced, when heightened by the enthusiasm of kindred feeling, and clothed in those 'witcheries of expression,' which the above stanzas must be allowed to possess, irresistibly elicit the sympathy of the reader, and secure the triumph of the poet. Tibullus, unrivalled among the Romans in excellence of this kind, gives to his happy rustic an exercise of humanity ascribed to Eltruda, that of returning the stray lamb to the fold....

Non agnamve sinu pignat fœtum capellæ
Desertum obitâ matre referre domum.

The tear flowing even for the bruised insect, a sigh drawn for the dismemberment of the linnæ's nest, the bosom that pants with anguish at the widow's distress, and the orphan's cry, are images particularly grateful, because we conceive them to be the progeny of emotions most congenial to the female character.

Lacrymæ que decoræ
Gratior et pulchro veniens in corpore virtus.

Qualities that exalt the dignity of manhood, the vehemence of martial ardour, a spirit of undaunted resolution, or hardy enterprise, lose their grace, and cease to ennoble when they warm the other sex. They are virtues by their nature masculine, and as incongruous for the female mind as the herculean form, the athletic powers, and muscular arm of the gladiator, for the female person. The prevalence of any hateful passion, in the breast of a woman, of inordinate ambition, of revenge, or of avarice, seems to involve peculiar atrocity. Boadicea, animating her troops to combat, or obtesting heaven and earth for the justice of her cause, may perhaps compel us to admire; but can never excite commiseration. Phædra, raging with jealousy and despair, or Horatia, imprecating curses on her country, are scenes from which we turn with increased horror and disgust. The querimonious accents of a softer sorrow, a despondency that melts away in tears and sighs, not the impetuosity of frantic rage, nor the convulsions of mad despair, supply the poet with the most efficient means of reaching the heart. We shall adduce an illustration of these remarks, in the 'fair maniac' of Penrose's 'Flights of Fancy,' odes, which, for grandeur of sentiment, boldness of metaphor, and brilliancy of colouring, deserve to be classed with the sublimest effusions of Gray or Collins.

Not so the love-lorn maid,
By too much tenderness betray'd;
Her gentle breast, no angry passion fires,
But slighted vows possess, and fainting, soft desires,
Streaming eyes,
Incessant sighs,
Dim haggard looks, and clouded o'er with care,
Point out to pity's tears the poor distracted fair.
Now sadly gay, of sorrows past she sings,
Now, hensive, ruminates unutterable things;
She starts....she flies....who dares so rude
On her sequester'd steps intrude?

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

Whatever unfinished pieces he might have, he cautiously destroyed them before his death; and his room, when broken open, was covered with little scraps of paper.

What must increase our regret for this hasty and unhappy step, is the information that the late Dr. Fry, head of St. John's College, Oxford, went to Bristol, to search into the history of Rowley and Chatterton, and to patronise the latter, if he appeared to deserve assistance. When, alas! all the intelligence he could procure, was, that Chatterton had, within a few days, destroyed himself.

The poems produced by Chatterton, at different times, under the names of Rowley, Canynge, &c. were purchased from Mr. Catcott and Mr. Barrett, and published by Thomas Tyrwhit, Esq. the learned editor of Chaucer, in an octavo volume, 1777, with 'a preface, introduction, and glossary.' Mr. Tyrwhit added to the edition, 1778, an 'Appendix, containing some observations upon the language of the poems, tending to prove, that they were written, not by any ancient author, but entirely by Chatterton.' A very splendid edition was published in 4to. 1782, by Jeremiah Milles, D. D. Dean of Exeter, and President of the Society of Antiquaries, with 'a preliminary dissertation and commentary,' tending to prove that the poems were really written by Rowley and others, in the fifteenth century. His Miscellanies, in prose and verse, collected from the Magazines, &c. with a sketch for Beckford's statue, a specimen of his abilities in the arts of drawing and design, were published in octavo, 1778, with a preface, signed J. B. dated Bristol, June 20; and this publication was followed by a 'Supplement to the Miscellanies of Chatterton,' 8vo. 1786. Besides these, there are many unpublished poems in the hands of his friends, and seventeen historical prose compositions and drawings, in the possession of Mr. Barrett. His poems, reprinted from Tyrwhit's edition, 1777, the Miscellanies, 1778 and 1786, Croft's Love and Madness, 1780, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The celebrated 'Archæological Epistle to Dr. Milles,' 4to. 1782, supposed to be written by Mason; a beautiful 'Monody to the memory of Chatterton,' written by Mrs. Cowley; a 'Sonnet to Expression,' from the polished and pathetic pen of Miss Helen Maria Williams; an irregular 'Ode,' from 'Rowley and Chatterton in the Shades,' 8vo. 1782;....are inserted in this edition, with the double view of adorning the collection, and of gratifying the reader.

His character, compounded of good qualities and defects, may be easily collected from this account of his life. A few of his peculiarities remain to be mentioned. His person, like his genius, was premature: he had a manliness and dignity beyond his years, and there was something about him uncommonly prepossessing. His most remarkable feature was his eyes, which, though gray, were uncommonly piercing. When he was warmed in argument, or otherwise, they sparkled with fire; and one eye, it is said, was still more remarkable than the other. He had an uncommon ardour in the pursuit of knowledge, and uncommon facility in the attainment of it. It was a favourite maxim with him, that 'man is equal to any thing, and that every thing might be achieved by diligence and abstinence.' If any uncommon character was mentioned in his hearing, 'all boy as he was,' says Mr. Croft, 'he would only observe, that the person in question merited praise; but that God had sent his creatures into the world with arms long enough to reach any thing, if they would be at the trouble of extending them.' 'He had read,' he himself tells us, 'more than Magliabechi, though he spoke no tongue but his own.' He probably might have acquired some knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and French languages; but it cannot be supposed to have been very extensive.

When we consider the variety of his engagements while at Bristol, his extensive reading, and the great knowledge he had acquired of the ancient language of his native country, we cannot wonder that he had not time to occupy himself in the study of other languages; and after his arrival in London, he had a new and necessary science to learn, the world; and that he made the most advantageous use of his time, is evident from the extensive knowledge of mankind, displayed in the different essays which he produced in the periodical publications. His lively and vigorous imagination contributed, doubtless, to animate him with that spirit of enterprise, which led him to form so many impracticable and visionary schemes for the acquisition of fame and fortune. His ambition was evident from his earliest youth; and perhaps the inequality of his spirits might in a great measure depend upon the fairness of his views, or the dissipation of his projects. Mr. Catcott left him one evening totally depressed; but he returned the next morning with unusual spirits. He said 'he had sprung a mine,' and produced the Spytes, a poem, in the possession of Mr. Barrett. His natural melancholy was not corrected by the irreligious principles which he had so unfortunately imbibed. But he is not convicted of any immoral or dishonest act in consequence of his speculative opinions. The preservatives of which he was possessed against the contagion of vice, and the criminal excesses of the passions, were the pride of genius, the enthusiasm of literature, and that delicacy of sentiment which taste and reading inspire. To the regularity of his conduct, during his residence at Bristol, some respectable testimonies have been already exhibited. After his arrival in London, there are some proofs in his favour, which ought not to be disregarded. During a residence of nine weeks at Mr. Walmsley's, he never staid out beyond the family hours, except one night, when Mrs. Ballance knew that he lodged in the house of a relation.

The list of his virtues appears to exceed the catalogue of his faults. His temperance was in some respects exemplary. He seldom eat animal food, and never tasted any strong or spiritous liquors. He lived chiefly on a morsel of bread or a tart, with a draught of water. His high sense of dignity has been already noticed. But the most amiable feature in his character, was his generosity and attachment to his mother and relations. Every fortunate project for his advancement in life was accompanied with promises and encouragement to them: while in London, he continued to send them presents, at a time when he was known himself to be in want; and indeed the unremitting attention, kindness, and respect, which appear in the whole of his conduct towards them, are deserving the imitation of persons in more fortunate circumstances. It can never be sufficiently lamented that this amiable principle was not more uniform in Chatterton. A real love for his relations ought to have arrested the hand of suicide; but when religion is lost, all uniformity of principle is lost.

He had a number of friends; and, notwithstanding his disposition to satire, is scarcely known to have had any enemies. By the accounts of all who were acquainted with him, there was something uncommonly insinuating in his manner and conversation. Mr. Cross informed Mr. Warton, that in Chatterton's frequent visits, while he resided in Brook-street, he found his conversation, a little infidelity excepted, most captivating. His extensive, though in many instances, superficial knowledge, united with his genius, wit, and fluency, must have admirably accomplished him for the pleasures of society. His pride, which, perhaps, should rather be termed the strong consciousness of intellectual excellence, did not destroy his affability. He was always accessible, and rather forward to make acquaintance, than apt to decline the advances of others. There is reason, however, to believe that the inequality of his spirits affected greatly his behaviour in company. His fits of absence were frequent and long. He would often look stedfastly in a person's face without speaking or seeming to see the person for a quarter of an hour, or more. Mr. Walmsley's nephew (Chatterton's bedfellow during the last six weeks he lodged there) told Mr. Croft, that, notwithstanding his pride and haughtiness, it was impossible to help liking him; that, to his knowledge, he never slept while they lay together; that he never came to bed till very late, sometimes three or four o'clock, and was always awake when he (the nephew) awaked, and got up at the same time, about five or six; and that almost every morning the floor was covered with pieces of paper, not so big as six-pences, into which he had torn what he had been writing before he came to bed.

He had one ruling passion which governed his whole conduct, and that was his desire of literary fame; this passion intruded itself on every occasion, and absorbed his whole attention. Whether he would have continued to improve, or the contrary, must have depended, in some measure, on the circumstances of his future life. Had he fallen into profligate habits and connections, he would probably have lost a great part of his ardour for study, and his maturer age would only have diminished the admiration, which the efforts of his childhood have so justly excited.

As a poet, his genius will be most completely estimated by his writings. His imagination was more fertile than correct; and he seems to have erred, rather through haste and negligence than through any deficiency of taste. He was above that puerile affectation which pretends to borrow nothing. He knew that original genius consists in forming new and happy combinations, rather than in searching after thoughts and ideas, which never had occurred before. He possessed the strongest marks of a vigorous imagination, and a sound judgment in forming great, consistent, and ingenious plots, and in making choice of the most interesting subjects. His genius, like Dryden's, was UNIVERSAL. It will be difficult to say, whether he excelled most in the sublime, the pathetic, the descriptive, or the satirical. Whatever subject is treated by him, is marked with the hand of a master, with the enthusiasm of the poet, and the judgment of the critic.

His poems abound with luxuriant description, vivid imagery, and striking metaphors. Through the veil of ancient language, a happy adaptation of words is still apparent, and a style both energetic and expressive. They are equally conspicuous for the harmony and elegance of the verse; and some passages are inferior, in none of the essentials of poetry, to the most finished productions in our language.

It must not, however, be dissembled, that some part of the charm of his compositions may probably result from the Gothic sublimity of the style. We gaze with wonder on an ancient fabric; and, when novelty of thought is not to be obtained, the novelty of the language, to which we are unaccustomed, is frequently accepted as a substitute. Even Shakspeare and Milton have derived advantages from the antique structure of some of their most admired passages. The facility of composition is also greatly increased, where full latitude is permitted in the use of an obsolete dialect, since an author is indulged in the occasional use of both the old and the modern phraseology; and if the one does not supply him with the word for which he has imagination, the other, in all probability, will not disappoint him. Thus, in the Songe to Ælla, the poet had in one line written,

Beesprengedd all the mees with gore.

In a subsequent stanza he writes,

Orr seest the hatchedd stede
Yprauncing oer the mead.

Mees being the ancient word, and mead the modern English one, he thought himself at liberty to write modern English whenever rhyme required him to do so. The use of the Anglo-Saxon prefix y, as yprauncing, for prouncing, enables him to write a smooth line in any given number of syllables. The imagery and metaphors, in this style of poetry, are frequently very common-place, and it is possible to labour through several stanzas, without finding any striking beauty, when the attention of the reader is kept alive by the subject alone. Many defects of style, and many passages of rant and bombast, are concealed or excused by the appearance of antiquity.

The piece of most conspicuous merit among the compositions of Chatterton, is 'Ælla, a Tragical Enterlude;' which is a most complete and well written tragedy, upon the model of Mason's Elfrida and Caractacus. The plot is both interesting and full of variety, though the dialogue is in some places tedious. The character of Clemonde reminds us of Glenalvon in Douglas, but it is better drawn. His soliloquy is beautiful and characteristic. The first chorus, or Mynstrelles Song, is a perfect pastoral. It contains a complete plot or fable, and abounds in poetical and tender sentiments, and apposite imagery. Thomson's Masque of Alfred probably suggested the idea of a Danish march. For converting Hubba into Hurra, he might have his reasons. The raven standard of the Danes, to which he alludes, is poetically described by Thomson.

The imperfect tragedy of Goddwyn, as well as Ælla, is indebted to the Grecian school, revived in the eighteenth century. Both are the effusions of a young mind, warm from studying Elfrida and Caractacus. The beauties of poetry are scattered through them with no sparing hand. The first ode or chorus, in Goddwyn, rivals, if not exceeds any thing of that kind we have in Mason, or even Gray or Collins. In the animated portrait of Freedom, and the group of her attendants, Affright, Power, War, Envy, &c. both Sackville and Spenser must yield the palm of allegoric poetry.

When Freedome, dreste in blodde-steyned veste,
To every knyghte her warre songe sunge;
Uponne her hedde wyldede wedes were sprede;
A gorie anase bye her hunge,
She daunced onne the heathe,
She heard the voice of deathe;
Pale-eyned affryghte, his harte of sylver hue,
In vayne assayed her bosomme to acale;
She hearde onfemed the shrieking voice of woe,
And sadnesse in the owlette shake the dale.
She shooke the burled speere,
On hie she jeste her sheelde,
Her foemen all appere,
And flize along the fælde, &c.

The 'First part of the Battle of Hastings,' which he confessed he had written himself, when he was taken by surprise, though at other times he preserved a degree of consistence in his falsehood, contains an unvaried recital of wounds and deaths, with little to interest curiosity, or engage the tender passions, and but few of the beauties of poetry to relieve the mind from the disgusting subject. In the Second Part, with the same faults, there is more of poetical description, more of nature, more of character. The imagery is more animated; the incidents more varied. The character of Tancarville is well drawn; and the spirit of candour and humanity which pervades it, is unparalleled in any writer before the age of Shakspeare. The whole episode of Girtha is well conducted; and the altercation between him and his brother Harold is interesting. The following description of morning is exquisitely beautiful, and the versification musical and pleasing. The eighth line is a striking imitation of a line of Milton's, 'Scatters the rear of darkness thin.'

And now the greie-eyd morn with v'lets drest,
Shakyng the dew-drops on the flourie meedes,
Fled with her rosie radiance to the west:
Forth from the easterne gatte the fierie steedes
Of the bright sunne awaytynge spirits leedes;
The sunne, in fierie pompe enthroned on hie,
Swyfter than thoughte along his jerne gledes,
And scatters nyghtes remaynes from oute the skies;
He saw the armies make for bloodie fraie,
And stopt his driving steedes, and hid his lyghtsome
.. raye.

The description of Salisbury Plain is picturesque and animated. In that part of it which relates to the worship of the ancient Brutons, Mr. Tyrwhitt proposes to substitute vyctimes for vyctualle, an ingenious, but perhaps unnecessary emendation. The stanza of Prior was his model for versification, in this poem, as well as the Tournament, &c. The origin and use of Stonehenge, he might find in modern works. Though he could have no access to Malmesbury, and other Latin chroniclers, he might take many particulars from Hollinshed, who has translated them. The names of the Norman warriors he might find in Fuller's 'Church History.' He had but few Saxon names to which he might refer; of the Normans, he had a list of eight hundred. He borrowed his Homeric images from the versions of Chapman and Pope, in the latter of which he found these allusions dressed out in all the splendid ornaments of the eighteenth century. The prolix circumstantial comparison, which did not exist in the fifteenth century, but was imported into our poetry by Spenser, affords a proof, excluding all imposition, that the Battle of Hastings is the forgery of Chatterton.

The interlude of the Tournament has some beautiful and nervous lines; particularly the description of Battayle and Pleasure, in the chorus of Minstrelles, that opens with—'When Battayle, mesthyng,' &c. Compare this with Collins's Ode to Mercy, and the marks of imitation will be sufficiently evident.

The 'Bristowe Tragedy, or the Dethe of Syr Charles Bawdin,' has little but its pathetic simplicity to recommend it. It has nothing ingenious in the plot, or striking in the execution. It is, however, clear and intelligible, and ranks with the best imitations of the ancient tragic ballad.

The Eclogues are not inferior to the best compositions of that kind, either ancient or modern. The first pastoral bears a remote resemblance to the first eclogue of Virgil, and contains a beautiful and pathetic picture of the state of England during the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. The thoughts and images are all truly pastoral; and it is impossible to read it without experiencing those lively, yet melancholy feelings, which a true delineation of nature alone can inspire. The second pastoral is an eulogium on the actions of Richard I. in the Holy Land. It is supposed to be sung by a young shepherd, whose father is absent in the Holy War; and the burden is happily imagined:

Spytes of the blest, and every seyncte ydedde,
Pour out your pleasaunce on my fadere's hedde.

Before he has concluded his song, he is cheered by the sight of the vessel, in which his father returns victorious. The third pastoral is chiefly to be admired for its excellent morality. It is, however, enlivened by a variety of appropriate imagery, and many of the ornaments of true poetry. The last of these pastorals, called Élinoure and Juga, is one of the finest pathetic tales in our language. The complaint of two young females lamenting their lovers slain in the wars of York and Lancaster, was one of the happiest subjects that could be chosen for a tragic pastoral. The beautiful stanza beginning,

No moe the miskynette shall wake the morne.

seems to be an imitation of a stanza in Gray's Elegy.

The Songe to Ælla is an admirable specimen of his abilities in lyric composition. The following stanza is eminently beautiful—

O thou, where'er (thie bones att reste)
Thye spryte to haunte delyghteth beste,
Whether uponne the bloud embrewed-pleyne,
Orr where thou kennst from farre
The dysmal crye of warre,
Orr seest somme mountain made of corse of slyne,

Those who can suppose that this stanza was written in the fifteenth century, must be very little acquainted with the style and manner of our poetry in that period. Only change the orthography, and it is perfectly modern.

O thou, where'er (thy bones at rest)
Thy sprite to haunt delighteth best,
Whether upon the blood embred plain,
Or where thou kenn'st from far
The dismal cry of war,
Or seest some mountain made of corpse of slain.

The original manuscript is written in long lines, like a prose composition, as was usual three hundred years ago, when parchment was scarce; but it was surely less difficult to write it on parchment, in 'lines not kept distinct in the manner of prose,' than to be the author of it.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Excursion to the Montanvert and the Mer de Glace.

While we were at this place, my guide looked carefully about to see if he could discover a Chamois for me, but without success. The constant chase given these animals by the mountaineers, has rendered them so timid, that it is rare for a person, not a hunter, to get a sight of one. He entertained me by the account of the manner in which they are hunted, and related some curious facts respecting their sagacity, their agility, and their despair when closely pursued; whenever there is a herd feeding together, one of the number is placed upon some commanding rock as a sentinel, who gives notice by a faint cry of the approach of an enemy, and then sets off with great speed for the most inaccessible craggs, whither even daring man dares not venture to follow. Yet it is astonishing what bold attempts a hunter will make when warm in the pursuit; no danger appears to fright him; no precipices make him giddy; and he often finds himself, after he has killed his game, in situations from which he knows not how to descend when his ardour has abated, and to which his unreflecting eagerness alone could have carried him. No life can be more dangerous than that of a Chamois hunter; he is exposed to every peril of the mountains; thick fogs, which cause him to lose his way, and wander for days in deserts and wilds, without food; avalanches, storms, and gusts of wind, which sweep him down, before he has time to screen himself from their attack; his foot slipping as he jumps from ledge to ledge; and, last of all, the desperate leaps made by the animal, when pressed close by the hunter, and who blocks up the only passage by which it can escape; and I am informed it is not uncommon for a chamois, thus situated, to spring at his enemy, and, by the violence of the shock, overturn him down the steep. Paccard pointed to a rock, opposite, where, in the heat of the chase, he had been unfortunate enough to make a false step, and fell headlong down to a snow-covered rock. He also shewed me, where my guide, with some others who went in search of him, discovered his body, partly covered by an avalanche that fell after him. These are the perils to which the hunter is exposed, and yet they are so attached to their mode of life, that nothing can deter them from following it.

M. De Saussure mentions a young man with whom he had spoke on the subject, and whom he endeavoured to dissuade from so dangerous a pursuit; his reply was, 'my grandfather died in the chase; my father perished also; and I have no doubt but I shall finish my career on the summit of some mountain in pursuit of the Chamois; yet, notwithstanding all this, I am so fond of it, that were you to offer to make me independent, on the condition of relinquishing it, I would reject your proposal.' This young hunter soon after met with the fate he expected, by his foot slipping in a desperate leap he made from one rock to another, while in pursuit of his game.

The Bouquetin, an animal not unlike the Chamois, was once hunted in the Alps, but the chase has so reduced their numbers, that they are rarely found, except about the summit of the St. Gothard, and other high mountains. I saw the skin of one stuffed at Chamouny, as well as that of a Chamois. Bears, which were formerly much hunted, are now rarely to be met with; and wolves are so little known in this valley, that a goat or two are only lost when they brouze too high up the mountain, and approach their lurking places in the forest.

But, to return to my journey. I soon after arrived at a hut called Blair's cabin, on the top of the Montanvert, after an ascent of about three hours. This hut is of loose stones, and was built by an English traveller of the name of Blair, for the temporary accommodation of those who passed days in these high regions.

But how shall I find words to express to you the grandeur, the sublimity of the objects which all at once burst upon my sight! How paint to you nature in her most awful, most majestic dress! Except the roar of the subterraneous waters, or the thundering of the glaciers in their progressive motion, a profound silence reigned around me. I felt myself alone in the world. Except my guide, no living creature could be seen in the space of leagues. All was desolation, horror, and sublimity; and a man would be almost tempted to lay himself down and exclaim, 'this is the end of all things.'

Beneath me, and stretching out in length for more than two leagues, and in breadth half a one, lay the Mer de Glace, (or sea of ice) a sight absolutely unique. This immense expanse of ice and snow, rent into ten thousand gaping chasms, whose depths reflected the most beautiful azure, was shut in nearly all round by the highest mountains of the Alps. Before me rose the majestic needle of the Dru, without exception the finest point of rock in the world; the regular pyramid of its form, its abrupt point, and jagged sides, all which give it the appearance of a rich Gothic steeple, render it, in my eyes, a finer object than even the fine one of the cathedral at Strasburg.

The Aiguilles (or needles, so called from their rising abruptly and sharply to a great height) of Blaitiere, those of Charmos, the grand Jorasse, and the Giant, formed a part of the surrounding mountains. M. De Saussure ascended the last, after a painful and perilous journey of two days, and remained sixteen days on the top, to make experiments on the atmosphere at such an elevation.

That I might have a better and nearer view of Mer de Glace, I descended with Paccard to the moraine, or pile of stones and sand, brought down by this icy sea, and deposited along its shore. It is a confused heap of rubbish of great height, in which are innumerable blocks of granite, that no power but that of nature could have removed from their original place. And here I was much surprised to find that the sea of ice, which appeared nearly smooth from the Montanvert, was of a most unequal surface, and composed of peaks and waves of ice, from twenty to fifty feet in height. It has exactly the resemblance of a very troubled sea, which, when its waves ran mountains high, was in an instant caught and congealed by a powerful frost. Between these ridges the ice is cleft in different directions, presenting chasms of various widths, some of these are several hundred feet deep, into one of which I threw stones, and it was a long while before I heard them fall in the water, which is constantly produced by the melting of the mass below. I had the curiosity to hazard a little excursion on this singular sea, but my feet were first armed with a pair of crampors, or iron bars, with four sharp prongs, to prevent me from slipping into the gulfs that yawned around me, and I supported myself with a long stick that had a spike at one end. Thus prepared, I entered on the ice, and crossed waves down whose sloping sides I should have slipped (without my crampors and stick) into the clefts I mentioned. As there had fallen some snow a few days before, which had even impeded a little my ascent of Montanvert, I was obliged to move with caution, and sound before me with my stick, lest I should unwarily fall into a concealed chasm. It is not uncommon to meet with such hidden dangers, and it requires some circumspection to avoid them.

M. De Saussure, who was the first person that ever traversed the Mer de Glace, relates an adventure, in which he had very nearly lost his life. There had fallen a great deal of snow a few days before, which was succeeded by a severe frost: at that time he ventured upon this sea of ice, with an intention of crossing it. All at once he felt one of his feet sink into the snow, and then the other, so that he found himself seated as it were upon the surface. At the same instant his guide, who preceded him, and who was one of the most experienced of Chamouni, sunk in the same manner, but so that he could see, thro' an opening, made by one of his feet, the blue gulf below, and perceived all the danger of his situation, being suspended over a chasm of uncertain dimensions, which rendered an attempt to extricate himself highly perilous. The moment he could recollect himself he called out to M. De Saussure 'for God's sake don't move;' and repeated these words every minute, notwithstanding M. De Saussure's assurances that he would remain quiet, and that he was perfectly cool and collected. He found it necessary at least to appear so, lest his guide should lose his senses in the desperate circumstances they were in. After reconnoitering their position to discover the source of the clef, they crossed their long pikes before them, and threw themselves flat upon this support, which, extending in several directions, bore their weight, and enabled them to extricate themselves from this horrid situation.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Huddart, Esq. v. Grimshaw, and Others.

This long and important cause was conducted by Mr. Erskine, Mr. Plumer, Mr. Garrow, Mr. Adam, Mr. Gazely, and Mr. Pell, for the Plaintiff; and Mr. Gibbs, Mr. Parke Mr. Serjeant Best, Mr. Holroyd, and Mr. Jarvis, for the Defendants.

Mr. Erskine, in a very eloquent and philosophical speech, observed, that this was a cause that would require a good deal of attention. It was important, as it related to the public: it was most important as it respected the most ingenious individual, who was the plaintiff in this case. Captain Huddart had been for many years in the East India Company's service, as a captain of one of their ships, and acquainted, of course, with that distant and perilous navigation, and with what related to the safety of shipping, and having besides, one of the most ingenious and philosophical minds that belonged to any person on this subject. And this was not a rude untutored philosophy: it was not that ingenuity which you sometimes found among men, without knowing the sources or causes from which it was derived. But his ingenuity was the effect of science and of long experience. He was a member of the Royal Society, and had devoted the whole of his life to mechanical and nautical pursuits.— This action was brought for the infringement of a patent for one of the most important discoveries, and for one of the most important improvements in the arts. An improvement in the security of navigation, to a maritime country, was, at all times, most important; and he thought there never was a moment at which the importance of such a discovery must strike the minds of Englishmen more than at the time he was addressing them: when the safety of this country did not alone depend on the bravery of its inhabitants, and on the skill, discipline, and heroism of the naval part of the community, but on the superior security, and superior art, by which we were able to blockade the audacious flotillas and fleets of the enemy on their own shores. Without that, what could the bravery of admiral Cornwallis, and the intrepidity of the sailors have done, who, by an unexampled patience during the storms, had kept the enemy within their own ports? though, even without their great and glorious exertions, we were safe from the strength and courage of the inhabitants on land. The learned counsel said, the thing which his client claimed to be the inventor of was this: "A new mode or art of making great cables and other cordage, so as to attain a greater degree of strength therein, by a more equal distribution of the strain on the yarns." Mr. Erskine explained, with the greatest clearness and perspicuity, the defects in the common mode of making ropes and cables; and pointed out the vast superiority of the cables made on captain Huddart's principle. By the common mode of making cables, there was an unequal degree of tension in the yarns, of which the strands were composed; that the greatest strain was on the yarns on the superficies; that the yarns next these had a less tension; and so it continually diminished till you came to the centre of the strand, which had no tension at all, and which was puckered up. The consequence was, when a number of these strands were so put together, of yarns of an equal length, which composed a cable, and when a weight was applied to it, the yarns on the outside at the circumference which had the greatest tension first gave way, then the second, then the third, &c. till you came to the centre. The great excellence of captain Huddart's invention was, that by means of a plate made of metal full of holes, forming concentric circles and a cylindrical tube, all the various yarns were so arranged and so placed before they came to be twisted into rope, that each individual yarn composing the cable had precisely the same degree of tension, and the effect was, that a cable made on this new principle never broke, till it broke all at once with a loud explosion. This new invention, as well as the common mode of making ropes, and its defects, were admirably well explained by Mr. Rennie, the engineer. From some experiments which he had very lately made, in order to ascertain the superiority of this new invention over the common mode, this appeared. He said he took two equal quantities of yarns made of the same hemp, and one of these quantities of yarns was made into cable, on captain Huddart's principle, and the other quantity in the common way. The first sustained a weight of seventeen tons, five cwt. and one one qr. when the cable made in the old way, was broken by a weight of eight tons, thirteen cwt. one qr. four lbs. A piece of cable that was proved to have been purchased of the defendants, was shewn to Mr. Rennie, and on examination, he was clearly satisfied that it had been manufactured by using the apparatus of the plaintiff. The witness said, he did not know how it could be manufactured in the way in which it appeared, in any other way than by following the new mode invented by captain Huddart, which, in his judgment, furnished a perfect remedy to all the defects in the old method, by giving to every yarn composing the cable, an equal degree of tension. The plaintiff's patent was obtained in 1735; and the defendants' counsel endeavoured, in cross examination, to shew that Mr. Balfour's patent, which was obtained previous to that period, was on the same principle with captain Huddart's; but Mr. Rennie said, according to the experiments he had made on Mr. Balfour's method, it was inferior to the common way of making cables.

Captain Bond was next examined; and as far as he went, confirmed what had been before stated.

Several letters that had passed between the plaintiff and defendants were read, and great stress was laid upon one, which was written in 1799, by the defendants to captain Huddart, requesting him to permit them to adopt his method of making cables. He good naturedly told them, if those gentlemen with whom he was connected would consent, he had no objections to it. However this consent was not given. Some time after that the defendants, who are rope makers in Sunderland, carried on their business in a concealed way. They would not permit the plaintiff to look at the manner in which they carried on their business; and from the cordage they produced, he strongly suspected they had invaded his patent by following his method. He afterwards desired Mr. Rennie, the engineer, to call upon them for the same purpose, in order to ascertain how they manufactured their cables. He met with the same reception. They would not permit him to see how they carried on their business.

A great deal of confirmatory evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff.

Mr. Gibbs, in a most able speech for the defendants, among other things, contended that the defendants' patent could not stand for a moment, since it was on the same principles with that of Mr. Balfour's, which was previous to it in point of date. By supposing this method of making cables, that was used by captain Huddart to be a new invention, he submitted they had not proved any invasion of it.

After a very eloquent reply from Mr. Erskine,

Lord Ellenborough, in an excellent address to the jury, summed up the whole of the case with great accuracy and precision; after which the gentlemen of the Jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff, for One Shilling.

OBITUARY.

Among the many losses, which the literary world has recently sustained, we regret to mention that of Doctor PRICE, a clergyman who was in many respects an honour to his profession. He had enjoyed the very high esteem of one of the most distinguished characters of the last century, bishop Warburton, whose extraordinary talents, profound erudition, and penetrating sagacity, dignified every one whom, he honoured with his regard. With respect to the doctor's jacobinical and dissenting principles, we hate them with a most cordial hatred; and we as cordially lament that his learning had not been applied to better purposes than the overthrow of the church and state under which he enjoyed more real "Civil Liberty," than can be derived from the visionary theories of discontented jacobins.

R. Jephson, Esq. celebrated for his convivial powers, and his felicity in ludicrous composition. He is the author of many dramatic pieces, which have been well received.

Mr. WILLIAM WOODFALL, the Editor of "The Publick Advertiser."

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

There are certain principles on which modern philosophers lay great stress, and which they consider as exclusively necessary for forming the character of a good citizen; such as the love of liberty and equality, zeal for the rights of man, patriotism, interest, and especially the gratification of the selfish and animal passions. A conduct, directed by these principles, forms the character of a republican philosopher, and a regenerated man!

The notion that a righteous nation is happy under the dominion of Divine Providence, will be rejected by our republican philosophers, for two reasons: first, because it implies the belief of a Providence, whereas true republicans acknowledge no power superior to the sovereign people; and secondly, because righteousness, which implies restraint, is totally incompatible with liberty, the birth right of a republican.

Some good men, and accurate remarkers, deplore the ignorance, undutifulness, forwardness, and impudence of most of the American children and youth. But a good republican will congratulate the country, and the age, on the increase and vigor of the spirit of liberty, which disdains all subordination. With regard to the decay of the Social Affections, though some may consider it as a vice, yet our republicans glory in it, as arising from the spirit of patriotism, which teaches every citizen to postpone all private affections for the sake of the public.

The virtue of obedience is a very strange sound to our citizens, who believe that they were born to govern! The only obedience that they admit of is the obedience of officers of government to the sovereign people.

A late author of rank, talents, and virtue, speaks somewhere of higher and lower classes; of the better sort, and the poorer sort, &c. Hence, it is evident he is an enemy to equality. Moreover, he censures dissolute and profligate manners: therefore it is no less evident, that he is an enemy to liberty and republicanism. For, as agreeably to republican principles, every free citizen, or negro, has a right to think, speak, write, and act as he pleases, and owns no authority, except that of the sovereign People he must reckon it impertinent, to establish moral distinctions, which are inconsistent with equality, or moral rules, which tend to restrain his freedom.

If government be thought an evil, it can only apply to monarchical and aristocratical governments; for no republican will ever believe that the sovereignty of the people is an evil, though he may often think it meritorious to oppose even a republican government, if he holds no lucrative office under it; but, in this case, he must consider it as an oppressive aristocracy, and oppose it as such.

It has been said that government itself, or government in the abstract, is too often confounded with the ministers of government. But true republicans are not guilty of confounding these, as they distinguish the ministers of government as their servants, who are bound to obey their orders in all cases whatsoever. When they do not, it is easy to raise a cry of maladministration, corruption, and tyranny against them, till they are driven from their offices, and others elected, who will will pay more respect to the mandates and opinions of the people.

True republicans sometimes reckon opposition and systematic opposition, as a crime equal to high treason, if not high treason itself. But this is only when public opinion, including the influence of the negroes, has burst open the doors of honour and preferment to the friends of the people. It is true, that when the government is in the hands of aristocrats, though it is surprising that this should happen in a country where all are federalists and all republicans, then the duty of true democrats is quite the reverse. and opposition to government, nay, insurrection itself, becomes a sacred duty.

It is the habit of a few in this country, to deride the flimsy orations and dashing speeches of the republican Ciceros. But this is nothing but envy at the success of the democratic declaimers, and their influence with the people. It should be known that our orators are capable of distinguishing themselves by their silence, as well as by their speaking.

An author, who published his book in the year 1774, has compared the strife among the herdmen of Abram and Lot about water, with the famous dispute between Great-Britain and her colonies about tea. But this only affords a strong presumption, that the aforesaid author knew not the value of liberty, as it was for that, and not merely for tea that our patriots contended. But what ought to incline us to censure this author with moderation, is the great advantage we have over him: He viewed the strife in the beginning, while the issue of it was doubtful, and the people divided: whereas, we know the issue, and the great benefits, that have been derived by us from its success. We can only accuse him of having been mistaken in his conjectures. He augured nothing from our independence, except misery, division, anarchy, and conquest by a foreign power. We know that by it, we have acquired liberty, the sovereignty of the people, and the friendship and protection of the great nation, in reliance on which, we find that we can exist as a nation, without an army, or navy. France can defend our trade against the piratical powers of Barbary, and give us perfect security on every side, so that we have nothing to do, but to improve our republican institutions, to cultivate our country, and to trade to all those ports from which the power of France has excluded the English. The acquisition of so many, and so great advantages, demands some return of gratitude on our part, by subjecting us to a moderate tribute, or requisition, when the exigencies of the great nation may render it necessary; and no true republican will grudge to pay for the defence of his country, in the same proportion as his friends and allies, the free citizens of France.

That wild freedom, which greedy revolutionists are at all times so eager to possess, is a sort of forbidden fruit. In the day we eat thereof, we surely die, instead of being as Gods, as our political tempters would persuade us.

Some of the ancient moralists have endeavoured to establish some connexion between principle and practice; but this is extremely unpalatable to the enlightened republicans of the age, who are constantly prating of the indifference and equality of all opinions. Abbe Raynal considers this as a doctrine which, has been fully demonstrated.

The doctrine of obedience, for conscience sake, which has been assumed as the firm basis and corner stone of all good government, can only be relished by those, who believe that government is the ordinance of God; but it cannot apply to republican government, which is only the ordinance of the people, and in which liberty of conscience, or, to express it more properly, liberty from conscience, is considered as the most valuable of the Rights of Man.

If a man should complain of the decay of the principles of obedience among republican children, and the envy of the poor towards the rich, it would only be a proof of his ignorance of the principles of liberty, and the rights of man, which are so clearly understood among us, that it would be superfluous to endeavour to demonstrate them.

Some audacious politicians stigmatise revolutionary principles, as inimical to the happiness of society, but those who are enlightened by modern philosophy are convinced that every government ought to be revolutionary, which they express by its containing within itself a principle of reformation.

He who considers government as the ordinance of God, naturally enough infers, that it ought to be conducted according to the laws of God, which should be considered as first principles, that ought not to be called in question. On the other hand, those who hold that government is merely the ordinance of the people, admit of no first principles, except liberty, equality, and the sovereignty of the people, who can, at an alter or abolish what they have set up regard to God, as true republicans hold the indifference and equality of all opinions, they have no occasion for a God in their system, and can even swear without him: though, to do them justice, they allow those who please, to believe the existence of one God, no God, or a plurality of Gods, even to the number of twenty: and this belief may be altered as often as any citizen thinks proper.

The eacommiums, which Sir William Jones, and many other profound and elegant scholars, have pronounced on the sacred scriptures, as containing many specimens of fine writing, will not be relished by the admirers of the Age of Reason, though they have great weight with the disciples of the old school, who firmly believe the Bible to be a Divine revelation; but, as the Mock Doctor says in Moliere, nous avon's change tout cela. Philosophy, which has produced such vast benefits in France, has to render it worthy of being governed by Bonaparte, has now so far enlightened this country, that Bible examples and Bible maxims have very little weight with an American citizen.

The attempts of republicans and revolutionists, encourage a novel experiment, by which it is proposed to build up a constitution, without any foundations. But it should be remembered, that while the people remain, they can give it one foundation after another, as has been happily done in France, where liberty, equality, and the sovereignty of the multitude are now fully established, under the protection of a first consul, at the head of a numerous army.

Mr. William Cole, of Milton, near Cambridge, died some years since, and bequeathed a large collection of manuscripts to the British museum; but with this singular injunction, that they should not be opened until twenty years should have expired. That period, which has so long interested the curiosity and the hopes of the English book-worms, has at length arrived. The works consist of sixty volumes, written or collected by himself. They contain, chiefly, we are informed by the English magazines, copies from public archives, and original composition. We shall occasionally make some extracts from the latter for the entertainment of our readers.

MATTHEW PRIOR.

In the year 1712, my old friend, Matthew Prior, who was then afellow of St. John's, and who not long before had been employed by the queen as her plenipotentiary at the court of France, came to Cambridge, and the next morning paid a visit to the master of his own college. The master, Doctor Jenks, loved Mr. Prior's principles, had a great opinion of his abilities, and a respect for his character in the world: but then he had a greater respect for himself. He knew his own dignity too well to suffer a fellow of his college to sit down in his presence. He kept his seat himself, and let the queen's ambassador stand. I remember, by the way, an epigram of Matt's on the reception he met with. We did not reckon, in those days he had a very happy turn for an epigram. But the occasion was tempting, and he struck it off, as he was walking from St. John's college to the Rose, where we dined together: it was addressed to the master:

I stood, sir, patient at your feet,
Before your elbow-chair,
But make a bishop's throne your seat,
I'll kneel before you there.

One only thing can keep you down,
For your great soul too mean;
You'd not, to mount a British throne,
Do homage to the queen.

The most wonderful anecdote, perhaps, in the world of letters, is the following. MILTON, that glory of British literature, received not above ten pounds, at two different payments, for the copy of Paradise Lost; yet Mr. Hoyle, author of the treatise on the game of whist, after having disposed of the sale of the first impression, sold the copy to the booksellers for two hundred guineas.

The irregularities of genius have been so often observed, that it has at length become almost proverbial to associate a want of prudence with the possession of a brilliant imagination. We easily pardon in others, and excuse in ourselves, an eccentricity of conduct, which we suppose connected with the warmth of feeling, or the energies of fancy, and set down propriety and discretion as homely qualities, to be valued, perhaps, but not to be envied.

IMITATION OF ODE XVI. BOOK II. OF HORACE.

Otium Divos.

When jolly Jack afar is bound,
Some hundred leagues from British ground;
His course rude Boreas stopping;
He looks askew at low'ring skies,
Thinks of his Sally's sparkling eyes,
And longs for ease and Wapping.

In London, negro beggars pine
For ease, in huts beneath the line,
Remote from beadies sturdy;
The poor Savoyard, doom'd to roam
In search of halfpence, sighs for home,
And spins his Hurdy Gurdy.

Ease loves to live with shepherd swains,
Nor in the lowly cot disdains
To share an humble dinner—
But would not for a turtle treat
Sit with a miser or a cheat,
Or canker'd party-sinner.

In Britain, Ease makes Labour glad—
She travels with the merry lad,
Who whistles in his waggon;
Bids him not envy Fox or PITT;
Whilst ale inspired, homespun wit
Flows from the guggling flaggon.

Care's an obtrusive craz'd physician,
Who visits folks of high condition,
And doses them with bitters;
Claps caustics on the tenderest sores,
And won't be turn'd from great men's doors
By footmen or beef eaters.

Some, to avoid this frantic pest,
Sail to the north, south, east, or west—
Alas! Care travels brisker;
Light as a squirrel he can skip
On board a ninety-four gun ship,
And tweak an admiral's whisker.

The lamp of life is soon burnt out,
Then who'd for riches make a rout,
Except a doating blockhead?—
When Charon takes 'em both on board,
Of equal worth the miser's hoard,
And spendthrift's empty pocket.

In such a sorry world as this
We may not hope for perfect bliss,
And length of days together;
We have no moral liberty
At will to live, at will to die,
In fair or stormy weather.

Rockingham, good as he was great,
Was seiz'd by unrelenting fate,
Our freedom whilst he guarded;
Others, whom, if it pleas'd the Lord
To take 'em, we could well afford,
May live as long as Parr* did.

* Old Wm. Parr, of Bristol, who lived 130 years.

Many I see have riches plenty,
Fine coaches, livery-servants twenty—
But envy never pains me;
My appetite's as good as theirs,
I sleep as sound, as free from fears—
I've only what maintains me.

And while the precious joys I prove,
Of Will's true friendship, and the love
Of bonny blue-ey'd Jenny—
Ye Gods! my wishes are confin'd
To health of body, peace of mind,
Clean linnen, and a guinea.

SONNET

TO THE AUTHOR OF 'THE TASK.'

Written in the life-time of Cowper.

COWPER! who now in Weston's favour'd shades,
Serenely seated, dost, with vision clear,
Scan old Ilyssus' haunts, and to the maids
Of Phœbus' train thy name for age endear
By classic song. Ah, rather let our ear
Catch the high rapture of that holier strain,
Which Israel's prophet had rejoic'd to hear
On Horeb's sacred mount, or Salem's plain.
Energic sage! thy pious 'TASK' resume;
Let Homer's verse no longer thine suspend,
With heavenly ray our terrene path illumine,
Bid Christian with Mæonian ardours blend.
So round thy laurels still shall palms entwine,
And future ages hail thee—bard divine!

The following, from the prolific pen of Dibdin, that beautiful nautical poet, will create a smile in some of our readers.

I made a promise to be wise,
But 'twas a promise out of season;
So much so—that I'm sure he lies,
Who says he always follows reason.
I soon grew tir'd of wisdom's dream,
And, turning from pale melancholy,
Fell on the opposite extreme—
But I, at last, grew tir'd of folly.
Thus separate, what was next to do?
Perhaps 'twould keep them to their tether,
If I could work upon these two
To live in harmony together.
After, of course, a little strife,
'Twas settled, without farther pother,
One should be treated as a wife,
And only as a mistress t'other.
Her portion of my joys and cares
Now each, by my appointment, measures;
Reason—transacts my affairs,
And Folly manages my pleasures.

MR. LIVINGSTON.

It is impossible for any American, whatever may be the complexion of his politics, to read without the liveliest indignation, the letter of Mr. Livingston, in reply to the communication of the French minister of foreign relations. It presents a picture of indiscretion, of absurdity, and of servility, which has no parallel in the history of ambassadors. Even in the conduct of the representatives of the enslaved, dependant, and debased states of Europe, we have observed nothing more derogatory to national dignity. As a pander to the passions of the Corsican usurper, regardless of his 'sacred character,' as the minister of a neutral nation, our envoy has departed from the line of his duty, and in a manner, perfectly unexampled, volunteered a declaration, which impeaches of a crime the most atrocious, a nation, with whom we are in the bonds of friendship and amity. Whence proceeds the authority of Mr. Livingston to pronounce "that Mr. Drake, the British minister at Munich, has held a culpable correspondence with traitors, for objects which all civilised nations must regard with horror"? What entitles him at all to take cognizance of this affair? Admitting that the British ministry had instigated the assassination of the tyrant of France, it could not become a subject for the proper interference of an ambassador, unless expressly instructed by his court.

But is it credible that even the weak and prejudiced mind of this old man could suppose, for a moment, that a government hitherto distinguished by its magnanimity, would descend to the pitiful expedient of assassination to remove its enemy? He could not be ignorant that, though means of this base and grovelling description have been employed by the profligate Jacobin, and the desperate usurper, that they would not be resorted to by the legitimate government of Britain, which is too strongly fortified by power to create the necessity, and too firmly supported by virtue, to yield to the adoption, did that necessity exist.

We are, therefore, unable to explain, in any other manner, the motive of this extraordinary address, than by referring it to that abject subserviency to the views of the first consul which has marked uniformly the official proceedings of Mr. Livingston. Deaf to the frequent calls that have been made on him to vindicate the honour, and to uphold the consequence of his country, he has allowed the arrogant upstart to multiply his aggressions without complaint, and to repeat his insults without remonstrance. The effect of this undignified conduct has been, that with the entire loss of the consideration with the French government, which his high official situation ought to have imposed, he has excited the contempt of every enlightened foreigner, and the execration at least of such Americans, as have had the mortification of witnessing the disgrace of their country in its representative.

Exceptionable as we consider the general tenor of Mr. Livingston's letter, there yet remains a part to be noticed, which we view as peculiarly reprehensible. Continuing the strain of adulation, which characterises the language of this singular paper, Mr. Livingston congratulates the despot on the preservation of his life, that his exertions may be prolonged to confirm the "happiness of the nation of which he is the chief, a happiness which is the result of his noble labours in the field of honour, and in the cabinet, and which is not, as sufficiently established, not to be deeply shaken by his loss."

And does really then the ambassador of the 'most free and enlightened nation on earth' avow to the world that the present military despotism of France is a condition of happiness? Let us inquire what are those 'noble labours,' which Mr. L., so highly commends. Is it the achievement of that usurped power, which has enabled Bonaparte to tyrannise over his own country, to extinguish every spark of civil and political liberty, to subjugate, enslave, oppress, desolate, and plunder, with more than Vandal rapacity, the fairest portion of Europe? Perhaps the massacre of those thousands of defenceless prisoners at Acre, in violation of a stipulation which expressly provided for the preservation of their lives; or the deliberate murder, by the administration of poison, of his wounded soldiers at Jaffa, may be those glorious exploits of the field, which our truly benevolent and republican minister applauds!

Had we accidentally met with this letter, without a signature, we should have been disposed to have ascribed it to a missionary from some petty vassal nation, who had long been habituated to cringe, to flatter, and to supplicate, or at least we could never have supposed that sentiments, such as it contains, could have proceeded from the minister of these 'free, sovereign, and independent states.' On the whole, we very gravely recommend to Mr. Livingston, to abandon diplomatic life as soon as possible, and to return to the shades of this 'new country,' here to resume, with his friend Jefferson, the more harmless employment of deceiving his ignorant countrymen with the tricks and impositions of philosophical empiricism.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LINES TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE

W. V. MURRAY, ESQ.

And has no muse o'er MURRAY'S urn
Her wreath of lasting honour spread?
Nor pensive Genius lean'd to mourn
The pupil, friend, and fav'rite dead?

Ah! well ye muses did ye love
To guide him to your fairy bow'rs,
Taught him to tread your sacred grove,
And where to cull your choicest flow'rs.

And ev'ry genius strove to impart
Bright treasures to his infant mind;
Swell'd with their ecstasies his heart,
And gave him wit, and taste refin'd.

No trophies of his country rise
To mark her sense of patriot worth!
Forgotten in the tomb he lies
By her he valued most on earth!

But yet, though vengeful party, here,
Deny the vote of honour due,
In other climes, will many a tear
The cheek of sorrowing chiefs bedew.

Batavia o'er her wat'ry plains,
Shall oft resound thy much lov'd name;
And Gallia's giddy land, in strains
Of deep regret, thy praise proclaim.

While ev'ry heart that beats with love
Of honour, truth, and virtue fair,
Thy cherish'd memory shall move
To sadness, for thy absence here.

And he, who humbly thus has tried,
Thy various merit to relate,
Will oft thy friendship boast with pride,
And oft deplore thy early fate.

AMICUS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO A FRIEND, BOUND TO SMYRNA.

Winds of happy omen rise;
Loose the sail, the vessel flies.
Soon Alcides' pillars past,
Greece salutes the western mast;
Greece, what magic in the name!
Catch, O catch the holy flame;
Check, O check the vessel's speed,
'Tis—O 'tis the Doric reed.
Hark! the liquid measures glide,
Laughing Arethusa's side—
Tender scenes!—away, away,
Ida's waving tops display;
Dames of beauty, warriors bold,
Hundred gates of Crete unfold.
On the left Cythera's queen
Spreads her gay, romantic scene,
Where Apelles' vivid art,
Bids to life the colours start.

By the shade which Delos throws,
Half way down Mycale's snows,
Lesbos queen of isles is near;
List! the lyre of Sappho hear!
'Tis the bard of Mitylene
Sweeps the strings to beauty's queen;
Now the louder, bolder strain,
Kindles through th' embattl'd train;
Generous bosoms, how they glow!
Now they rush to meet the foe.
Sensitive measures hither float,
Philomela pours her throat,

Parent of the rural throng,
Orpheus' spirit swells the song.

By the tepid gales that bear
Moving softness through the air,
Soft Iona's coast is near;
Furl the sail, the anchor clear,
Hoist the barge, and ply the oar,
Now you reach the happy shore;
Scene of pleasure, clime of ease,
Form'd the Teians soul to please:

As you walk the marbled street,
Should you early chance to meet
Some devout and tender maid,
Ask her where the bard was laid:
She, whose Grecian forehead high,
Arches o'er an azure eye;
She, whose crimson cheeks retain
Yet a tint from Sappho's vein;
She, whose mother gave her charms
To the blest Anacreon's arms.

First upon her lips impress
One impassion'd soft carress;
Lead her then the groves among,
Where the careless harp was strung.
High amid the sylvan scene,
Waves an olive, ever green;
Thither roves the bonied fly,
When the sun is up the sky;
Mark the murmur'ing insect's flight,
What his course, and where he light;
For he always loves to rest
Where the poet's urn is prest;
If no carmine blossom there,
Doubly fragrant is the air.
If he fail to lead your feet
To the silent bard's retreat,
With the maid, whose ruddy smile
Lights you round the Teian isle,
Further search the groves and shore,
Till the whole is travers'd o'er.
Then a goblet, deep and large,
With delicious liquor charge;
Such as Chios only prest,
For the highly favour'd guest;
If the tomb cannot be found,
Pour it on the thirsty ground;
Not a spot, but as an heir,
Claims his portion'd dust to share;
If the winds, that heard his lay,
Through the isle diffus'd his clay,
All the soil of virgin bloom
Thus became Anacreon's tomb.
But his soul and spirit wide
O'er the world immortal ride;
Now a whisper in my ear
Says 'Anacreon's soul is here,
In his works you have his heart,
In his works th' immortal part.'

AWALASKI.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

To J. K. with a locket, enclosing the hair of a deceased friend.

Ah, no! 'tis not the polish'd gems of art,
Nor all that soft affection's tribute gives;
No fair device can soothe the aching heart,
Where my lov'd sister's tender image lives.

But oft, my friend, in starry radiance dress'd,
Her heaven-born virtues shall recur to me;
And long, the cherish'd fondness of her breast,
Bind my sad heart in unison with thee.

Yet not bereft of hope, shall friendship mourn,
Nor pale despondence breathe th' unbidden sigh;
For lo, whilst sorrow clasps the sacred urn,
And filial anguish swells my tearful eye—

O'er the dim shadows of affliction's night,
(On faith's broad wing) th' unfetter'd spirit soar'd,
Mix'd with the pure, angelic host, in light,
And humbly at the throne of God ador'd.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO,
THE AMERICAN SAILOR BOY

WRITTEN AT SEA.

From distant fields, unknown to fame,
Which Susquehanna's waters lave,
A little shepherd-boy, I came,
Resolv'd to plough the ocean wave.

For oft the passing stranger told
The merry life the sailor led,
Who rov'd from clime to clime for gold,
No care to hover o'er his head.

With cautious step at first I move,
And timid climb the slipp'ry shrouds;
But bolder grown, I mount above,
And hang suspended in the clouds.

With fearless heart I stride the yard,
And swiftly seek its utmost verge;
Nor think my lot of danger hard,
But smiling eye the dashing surge.

When peril's past, and safe from harm,
And safe in port our vessel's moor'd,
Unhurt by battle, fire, or storm,
I fly to see my maid ador'd.

Then with an eager hand I pour,
My treasures in the lap of Jane;
Live quietly a month ashore,
Then seek the roaring waves again.

MR. OLDSCHOOL.

The following description of thoughtless jollity, is from the pen of a young gentleman, whose talents, should he persevere in poetical attempts, will not long be wrapt in the napkin of obscurity. To 'hold a mirror up to nature' is the poet's task, and I am much mistaken if some of your readers do not recognise themselves in this short ode.

TO MIRTH.

Hither boy, the goblet bring,
Let the dolts at care repine,
I'll enjoy perpetual spring,
Quick, boy, bring the rosy wine.

Should old sorrow dare to call,
Drown him in a flowing bowl,
Or deep plunge him in his gall,
He shall ne'er disturb my soul.

But for Mirth, with ivy crown'd,
Open wide the folding gates;
Let the merry music sound,
He's the guest my soul awaits.

ORIGINAL PAPERS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO. THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 93.

Hæc novimus esse nihil.

THE pure and peaceful enjoyments of Edwin and Eltruda, on which we have hitherto dwelt, are disturbed by the civil war between the houses of York and Lancaster. In supposing the lover capable of taking up arms against the father of his mistress, Miss Williams has neither rendered him less amiable, nor exceeded the bounds of probability. When the ties of honour and the dictates of love come in collision, the preponderance of the former is a victory calculated to generate a stronger interest in favour of the subject, and which perfection of character seems absolutely to require.

L'amour est un plaisir, l'honneur est un devoir.
CORNEILLE.

The internal struggle, consequent on this situation, the equilibrations of a mind fluctuating between impulses diametrically opposite, are productive of the most forcible dramatic effect; and, to be well delineated, demand the agency of transcendent powers. They form the scenes which have most contributed to immortalize the tragic writers of Greece, and, in Othello and the Cid, have called forth all the energies of Shakspeare and Corneille, the two great masters of the modern drama. But to exhibit the successive modifications of the mind thus agitated, to develop minutely the operation of adverse passions, until the final predominance of one of them, belongs to Melpomene, and her more dignified sisters. Miss Williams has pursued the correct line in touching briefly on the pungency of Edwin's grief for the melancholy alternative to which he found himself reduced. His separation from Eltruda, the battle between the contending parties, the death of Albert, the excruciating agonies of the lover on discovering the person pierced by his falchion, are narrated with an equal sense of propriety, and imbued with exquisite pathos. Eltruda, without knowing by what hand her father fell, and seeing Edwin at her feet, accosts him in a language at the same time natural, and particularly calculated to heighten the distress of the scene.

Eternal woes his heart must prove,
Its tenderest ties are broke;
Ah, say, what ruthless arm, my love,
Could aim the deadly stroke

Could not thy hand, my Edwin, thine,
Have warded off the blow?
For ah, he was not only mine,
He was thy father too.

When Edwin is about to turn the steel against his own breast, she starts from a temporary insensibility to avert the blow.

His hand the death-fraught weapon grasp'd,
The steel he firmly prest;
When sudden she arose, and clasp'd
Him wildly to her breast.

'Methought, she cried, with panting breath,
My Edwin talk'd of peace;
I knew 'twas only found in death,
And fear'd the sad release:

I clasp him still....'twas but a dream....
Help yon wide wound to close,
From which a father's spirits stream,
A father's life-blood flows.'

These stanzas remind us of an analogous passage in Langhorne's 'Owen of Carron,' when Ellen, after finding Nithisdale dead, and swooning in consequence of it, momentarily recovers her reason:

As the soft star of orient day,
When clouds involve his rosy light,
Darts thro' the gloom a transient ray,
And leaves the world once more to night;

Returning life illumines her eye,
And slow its languid orb unfolds....
What are those bloody arrows nigh?
Sure, bloody arrows she beholds!

What was that form so ghastly pale,
That low beneath the poplar lay?
'Twas some poor youth... 'ah, Nithisdale!
She said, and silent sunk away.

Eltruda goes on to apostrophize her father in a strain highly tender and animated:

My father, yet in pity stay!
I see his white beard wave....
A spirit beckons him away,
And points to yon cold grave.

E'en now, my love, I trembling hear
Him breathe a last adieu!
I see, my love, a falling tear,
His furrow'd cheek bedew!

I feel within his aged arms
His poor Eltruda prest;
I hear him speak the fond alarms
That wring a parent's breast.

He's gone!....and here his ashes sleep;
I do not heave a sigh....
His child a father does not weep,
For, ah, my brain is dry!

But come, together let us rove,
At the pale hour of night,
When the moon, glim'ring thro' the grove,
Shall shed her faintest light.

We'll gather from the rosy bow'r
The fairest wreaths that bloom,
We'll cull, my love, each opening flow'r,
To deck his hallow'd tomb,

We'll thither from the distant dale
A weeping-willow bear;
And plant a lily of the vale,
A drooping lily there.

We'll storn the glaring face of day,
Eternal silence keep;
Thro' the dark wood we'll cheerless stray,
And only live to weep.

To shun the face of day, to rove at the pale hour of night, to live but to weep, are among those 'joys of grief,' of which we have spoken in a preceding essay. They bring to memory the commencement of Warton's address to Contemplation, in his poem intitled 'the Pleasures of Melancholy.'

Oh, lead me, queen sublime, to solemn glooms
Cougential with my soul, to cheerless shades,
To ruin's seats, to twilight cells and bowers,
Where thoughtful melancholy loves to muse
Her fav'rite midnight haunts.

The stanzas which speak of culling flowers to deck the tomb of Albert, and of fixing near it the emblematical willow, and drooping lily of the vale, are happily conceived, and beautifully executed. It is not unworthy of remark what a predilection all the poets of a tender cast seem to entertain for chaunting obsequies, and consecrating the graves of their favourites. They become hallowed by an assemblage of all the images that are calculated to inspire sadness, and create reverential awe. They are adumbrated by the cypress of spontaneous growth, the plaintive songsters of the grove meet there

'To wail in widow'd notes, and sing their hapless loves.

they become the haunt of sprites, the scene where Oberon and his elfin train hold their midnight revels, and solemnize the rites of fairy mysticism. Gray, in a quatrain originally intended for, but not inserted in his inimitable Elegy, says of the village cemetery

There scatter'd oft, the earliest of the year,
By hands unseen are showers of violets found;
The red-breast loves to warble there,
And little footsteps lightly print the ground.

Collins, in his ode on 'the superstitions of the Highlands,' paints the sprite of the swain, destroyed by 'the water-fiend,' in the 'dank fen,' appearing to his disconsolate wife, during her sleep, 'with drooping willows drest.' Among those superstitions he enumerates

The choral dirge, that mourns some chieftain brave,
When every shrieking maid her bosom beat,
And strew'd with choicest herbs his scented grave.

The Romans were accustomed religiously to effuse aromatic unguents, and strew fragrant flowers over the monuments of their dead, which were for the most part placed near the highways, with the names inscribed. It is thus that

Æneas, in the fifth book of the Æneid, is said to honour the cenotaph of Anchises,

Purpureosque jacet flores ac talia fatur, &c.

Their amatory poets frequently mention this ceremonial, and dwell con amore on the prospect of its being faithfully discharged towards their own remains. Propertius complains that the graves of lovers are liable to be profaned by their too public exposition, and, therefore, beseeches the gods that he may be laid in a spot unmeasured by vulgar steps, and secluded from vulgar vision by the density of the incumbent foliage. The classical reader will pardon me for transcribing the passage.

Ornabit custos ad mea busta sedens;
Dii faciant, mea ne terrâ locet ossa frequenti
Quâ facit assiduo tramite vulgus iter.
Post mortem tumuli sic infamantur amantum,
Me tegat arborea devia terra coma,
Aut humer ignotæ cumulis vallatus arenæ;
Non juvat in media nomen habere via.

Eleg. 16. Lib. 3.

And again in the thirteenth elegy of the second book—

Et sit in exiguo Laurus superaddita busto
Quæ tegat extincti funeris umbra locum.

Miss Williams terminates her tale by the death of Edwin and Eltruda. The concluding stanzas are marked by that superior harmony of versification, and that delicate vein of pensive morality, which pervades the whole performance.

He saw her dying eye-lids close,
He heard her latest sigh,
And yet no tear of anguish flows
Fast streaming from his eye.

For, ah, the fulness of despair,
The pangs of high-wrought woe,
Admit no silent, trembling tear,
*No lenient drop to flow.

He feels within his shiv'ring veins
A mortal chillness rise:
Her pallid corse he feebly strains....
And on her bosom dies!....

No longer may their hapless lot
The mournful muse engage;
She wipes away the tears that blot
The melancholy page.

For heaven, in love, dissolves the ties,
That chain the spirit here;
And distant far, forever flies
The blessing held most dear.

To bid the sufferer's soul aspire
A higher bliss to prove;
To wake the pure, refined desire,
The hope that rests above!

I have thus examined, although rather in a desultory mode, the plan and characters, and incidentally adverted to the sentiments of 'Edwin and Eltruda.' The reader will perceive that, in the course of this examination, I have never attempted to look through the microscope of criticism, or exercised any inquisitorial severity in the notation of faults; nor have I been as copious in transcribing illustrative passages from our poets, as inclination prompted. The blemishes are but few, and more than counterbalanced by the beauties of the context; and in both cases I was principally swayed by my aversion to swell the bulk of these essays, which, even in their present state, must appear too extended for the comparative insignificance of the subject. This tale was written by Miss Williams, at an early age, and in a situation where she was almost necessarily debarred access to poems of the same nature. Whatever of merit it may be found to possess, must, therefore, be deemed purely original; and, if occasional resemblances to tales of a prior date be discovered, we should attribute them more to fortuitous coincidence of thought, than to intentional imitation. The historical ballad may be said to be sui generis, an insulated species of composition. It rejects all gorgeous imagery, or ambitious ornaments; its beauty should be modest, its guise without affectation: it requires a native simplicity of thought and expression, a chastity and refinement of taste, an art of management, and a nicety of execution, rarely enjoyed or attainable by genius of an exalted stamp. In such walks Goldsmith, Mickle, Bruce, and some other of our minor poets, were eminently calculated to excel: among them Miss Williams will hold a conspicuous rank in the estimation of every mind alive to all the finer influences, or familiarized to the softest vibrations, of poetry.

FLORIAN.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Excursion to the Montanvert and the Mer de Glace.

I returned with my guide to the top of Montanvert, where we dined on the cold meat we brought with us. No person, I fancy, ever ascended to this place, which is six thousand feet above the level of the Mediterranean, without acquiring an appetite keen enough to relish the simplest food. I assure you, for my own part, I did justice to our's, and envied no epicure his most dainty dishes, nor any prince his most sumptuous apartments. Our table was the humble sod of nature, our ceiling the unbounded heavens, of a deeper blue than can be found at a lower elevation, and the decorations of our grand saloon were superior even to the imagination of man.

At the edge of the Mer de Glace is a large flat piece of granite, called the English stone, where it was the custom to dine before Mr. Blair erected the cabin on Montanvert. The French resident at Geneva, (M. Felix Despontes) has lately had a pretty little cottage built near Blair's cabin, which is much more convenient and comfortable for those who visit the glaciers, and who generally pass the night there, that they may set out early to traverse the Mer de Glace, which winds among the mountains for many leagues.

From Montanvert we descended by a shorter road, than the one we ascended by, but which was very steep and dangerous; however, by jumping from rock to rock, with the assistance of my long pointed stick, and crossing from one side to the other, in a zig-zag direction, to render the descent less rapid, I arrived in the valley without any accident, and near the foot of the glacier, which mingled its masses of ice and snow with the verdure of the plains, and the leaves of the forest.

There we beheld the source of the Arveiron; a rapid torrent, which bursts from an azure vault, at least one hundred feet. Unfortunately for me, part of the arch had fallen down, and destroyed part of the beauty of this singular place. Above at the height of near two thousand feet, rose the pyramids of ice, which cover the Mer de Glace. The appearance of this glacier from those pyramids till it reaches the valley, it is impossible for me to describe, as words would convey but an imperfect idea of so extraordinary a mass, broken and rent into thousands of chasms, and bristled with needles of ice.

I was lucky enough to see two avalanches of dust, (as they are called) produced by huge fragments of the Mer de Glace being left without support by the continual dissolving of their bases, tumbling into the valley with a thundering noise.

The depth of the mass of ice, which forms the Mer de Glace, is immense; but it is difficult to calculate it with certainty. Some have estimated it at eight hundred, others at four hundred feet. The regular and eternal melting of its lower stratum, furnishes an inexhaustible stream, that forms the Arveiron, an impetuous torrent, that in a short distance loses its name and waters in the Arve.

Delighted, and scarcely satisfied, with these sublime objects. I have just returned to my inn, and now contemplate the noble summit of Mont Blanc, gilded by the setting sun, while the vapours of evening are beginning to settle round his white sides. It is impossible not to recollect here the beautiful lines of Goldsmith in his Deserted Village:

Like some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
Tho' round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

You, perhaps, know that the summit of Mont Blanc is the highest point in Europe, and, except that of one of the Cordilleros, in South America, supposed to be the most elevated on the face of the globe; many attempts were made, at various times, to ascend this mountain, but without success, and it was at length deemed impracticable, till in 1786, Jaques Balmat and Dr. Paccard, (the cousin of my guide) succeeded in attaining a height which no mortal, perhaps, had ever before reached; but as they were unprovided with instruments, and no great philosophers, nothing satisfactory resulted from so bold an attempt, but the certainty of the mountain being accessible, which immediately induced M. de Saussure to undertake the ascent; and accordingly on the 13th of August, 1787, he set out, attended by eighteen guides, who carried a tent, mattresses, and philosophical instruments. The party got no farther the first night than the top of the mountain Dela Cote, where they slept in a hut which had been previously erected. At 4 o'clock the next evening they reached an elevation of 9312 feet above the priory at Chamouny, or 12762 feet above the level of the sea. Here they encamped, and made an excavation in the hard snow, which they covered with a tent. At seven the next morning, the whole company departed, and found the ascent, in some places, so steep, that the guides, who preceded, were obliged to cut out steps with a hatchet. At eleven they reached the summit, where they continued three hours and a half, during which time M. de Saussure enjoyed, with rapture and astonishment, a view the most extensive, as well the most rugged and sublime in nature; and made those observations which will render this expedition no longer a matter of curiosity.

The amazing height of this mountain, ascertained by him, by the barometer, is 15,662 above the level of the sea.

* Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

SENEC. HIP.

The party descended a little lower than the place where they passed the preceding night, and arrived at Chamouny the next morning, where Madame de Saussure had been anxiously watching their dangerous ascent through a telescope.

Soon after M. de Saussure's attempt, an Englishman, of the name of Beaufoy, gained the summit of mont Blanc, but encountered infinitely more dangers and difficulties, than those who preceded him. Since that time, very few have followed their example. Many have ascended to a great height, but the state of the air, with other causes, forced them to return.

What renders mont Blanc more remarkable than any other mountain of the Alps, is the immense mantle of snow which covers it, without a rock to break the flowing line. M. de Saussure supposes this crust to be 400 feet thick, and its horizontal extent about 9000. The perpendicular height of the snow, ice, and glaciers, from the source of the Arveiron to the summit of mont Blanc, is about 12000 feet; which is equal to mount Vesuvius, placed upon mount Etna.

The valley of Chamouny contain about 400 inhabitants; who live by cultivating the ground. Their beasts of labour are cows, for the same reason as in Valorsine. They raise grain of different kinds, which they sell at the market towns, with their laituges (cheese, milk, butter, &c.) and honey, celebrated for its mildness and delicate flavour.

The people are tolerably well made, strong and active; honesty, I believe, is one of their greatest characteristics, and before the revolution there was not a happier spot on the face of the globe than the valley of Chamouny, which now composes part of the canton of the Leman.

MISCELLANY.

[The following essay, in very elegant language, and with very sensible reasons, exposes the danger of hasty and superficial studies.]

ON THE ILL EFFECTS OF READING WITHOUT DIGESTING.

An analogy between the powers of the body and the faculties of the mind is obvious in many instances. The eye cannot survey a great space with the same accuracy, with which it views a single object at a nearer distance. It takes in the coarser parts indeed, but comprehends not the more minute, though not less beautiful appearances. Thus too the mind, when attentive to every part of knowledge, seldom attains to perfection in any single science. And daily experience evinces that the Helluo Librorum, the great reader and devourer of books, who is more studious of quantity than quality, and is led on by the love of novelty rather than of excellence, is rarely learned in an eminent degree.

Adages are commonly true, because founded on experience; 'the rolling stone gathers no moss.' To carry on the allusion, one may add, that, while the rolling stone is traversing the whole garden, the spade, in the space of a few yards, may gather the produce of a year.

Pliny, the younger, who is as remarkable for the justness of his sentiments, as well as for the elegant manner of expressing them, has given a hint on this subject, which, though comprised in a few words, may be more instructive than volumes of advice. After some remarks on cursory and superficial reading, he says, we should be content with few books, and study them perfectly.

We should read, says he, 'non multa sed multum.' The epigrammatic turn of the word fixes the precept stronger on the mind, and renders it more easy to be retained in the memory.

The powers of the human mind are not strong enough to acquire knowledge by intuition. This rapid mode of learning truth is reserved for beings of a superior order. To gain a complete knowledge of a subject, in all its parts, it must be frequently reviewed and examined in every light.... a process which requires time, labour, and attention: none of which will be in his power, who hastily passes from science to science, and with too much volatility to admit thought and recollection.

It frequently happens that men of natural parts are excelled by others, whose talents are originally inferior. Nor is this to be attributed to any other cause but the patience of labour, which is frequently the concomitant of dulness, and which proves an ample compensation for the want of vivacity.

A man of slow understanding can stop to investigate obscurity step by step, till he brings light from darkness, can combat difficulties seemingly insurmountable, can repeat the same labour without fatigue, and review the same ideas without satiety: but the volatility of genius affects to pass over every thing disgusting, and voluntarily neglects those subjects which it cannot see through at a glance.

The fable of the tortoise and the hare is too obviously applicable to the present subject to admit quotation, could genius check that precipitation which precludes accurate inquiry, and perfect views; it might surely be capable of enlarging the boundaries of human knowledge, and of deriving to itself all the light of which the mind is susceptible; since it is a known truth, that hardly any difficulty is insurmountable, even to industrious stupidity.

Patients, when at school, was not remarkable for the brightness of his parts, or the sensibility of his temper.

The compositions which he was obliged to bring as exercises, were not lively, elegant, or florid, but then they were seldom deficient in orthography or grammar. He disliked not the labour of seeking the words, he was unacquainted with, in his lexicon; and though he did not comprehend the full meaning and spirit of the author he read, he could tell the English of every word in his lesson, and trace it through all its grammatical variations. In short, he underwent every kind of literary labour, without weariness or discontent. After all the necessary forms of education, he at length entered into the profession of the law.

Velox, one of the contemporaries of Patients, was fond of learning, and desirous of excelling in it; but he was of a quick apprehension, he was capable of construing a passage at one view, which would cost Patients an hour's application. He, therefore, never read his lesson over twice, but diverted his fancy with the perusal of light modern publications, several volumes of which he would devour in a day.

Great hopes were entertained of the future eminence of so lively a genius. He went to the university, flattered by his friends, and elate with confidence in his own powers, but it soon appeared, that he who submitted to so little labour, while under authority, entirely relinquished study, when at his own disposal.

Plato, Aristotle, and Epictetus, remained untouched on the shelves; but the works of Fielding, Richardson, Smollet, together with those of every modern dramatic writer, were constantly on his table. If at any time he deigned to cast an eye over Coke upon Littleton, it was with the same levity and precipitation with which he read a monthly magazine. When at last he was called to the bar, and the time was come when he was to make his way to eminence by dint of merit, he found himself as much a stranger to the laws of England as an inhabitant of Otaheite. Chagrined by disappointment, and weary of learning, which he had never rationally pursued, he gave up all thoughts of rising in the world, and retired to a small estate in the country, where he lived and died an honest sportsman. Patients, in the meantime, though he did not reach the top of his profession, yet, from his known integrity and abilities as a counsellor, he was always supplied with a number of briefs, by which he acquired an affluent fortune, and lived universally respected as a man of untainted honour, strong sense, and profound learning.

ORIGINAL LETTER FROM DR. FRANKLIN.

[The following is an original. It will excite, it is presumed, no ordinary degree of attention. It will be read by some with eagerness, because it is from the pen of Dr. Franklin; and, in the opinion of his disciples, it is no superstition to venerate every thing from him, as a precious relic. It will be read by others, as a curious specimen of the doctor's liberality of sentiment on religious subjects. Many will be captivated and deceived by the blandishments of a plausible and affected benevolence; and the few will discern, at once, the germ of deism, the embryo of rancour against church establishments, the feverish symptoms of a male-content; and those daring doctrines, 'at which both the priest and philosopher may tremble.']

Philadelphia, June 6, 1753.

SIR,

I received your kind letter of the 2nd instant, and am glad that you increase in strength; I hope you will continue mending till you recover your former health and firmness. Let me know whether you still use the cold bath, and what effect it has.

As to the kindness you mention, I wish it could have been of more service to you. But if it had, the only thanks I should desire is, that you would always be equally ready to serve any other person that may need your assistance, and so let good offices go round, for mankind are all of a family.

For my own part, when I am employed in serving others, I do not look upon myself as conferring favours, but as paying debts. In my travels, and since my settlement, I have received much kindness from men to whom I shall never have any opportunity of making the least direct return. And numberless mercies from God, who is infinitely above being benefited by our services. The kindnesses from men I can, therefore, only return on their fellow-men, and I can only shew my gratitude for those mercies from God, by a readiness to help his other children and my brethren. For I do not think that thanks and compliments, though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, and much less those to our creator. You will see in this my notion of good works, that I am far from expecting, as you suppose, to merit heaven by them. By Heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration: I can do nothing to deserve such rewards. He that for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a good plantation, would be modest in his demands compared with those who think they deserve Heaven for the little good they do on earth. Even the mixed imperfect pleasures we enjoy in this world, are rather from God's goodness than our merit; now much more such happiness of heaven. For my part, I have not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect it, nor the ambition to desire it; but content myself in submitting to the will and disposal of that God who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blessed me, and in whose fatherly goodness I may well confide, that he will never make me miserable, and that even the afflictions I may at any time suffer shall tend to my benefit.

The faith you mention has, doubtless, its use in the world. I do not desire to see it diminished, nor would I endeavour to lessen it in any man. But I wish it were more productive of good works than I have generally seen it: I mean real good works—works of kindness, charity, mercy, and public spirit; not holiday keeping, sermon reading or hearing, performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the deity. The worship of God is a duty, the hearing and reading of sermons may be useful, but if men rest in hearing and praying, as too many do, it is as if a tree should value itself on being watered and putting forth leaves, though it never produced any fruit. Your great master thought much less of these outward appearances and professions than many of his modern disciples. He preferred the doers of the word to the mere hearers, the son that seemingly refused to obey his father, and yet performed his commands, to him that professed his readiness, but neglected the work; the heretical but charitable Samaritan, to the uncharitable though orthodox priest and sanctified Levite: and those who gave food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, raiment to the naked, entertainment to the stranger, and relief to the sick, though they never heard of his name, he declares they shall in the last day be accepted, when those who cry Lord, Lord, who value themselves on their faith, though great enough to perform miracles, but have neglected good works, shall be rejected. He professed he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; which implied his modest opinion that there were some in his time so good, that they needed not to hear him even for improvement; but now a days we have scarce a little parson that does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to set under his petty administration; and that whoever omits them, offends God. I wish to such more humility, and to you health and happiness, being

Your friend and servant,
(Signed)

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

The Balade of Charitie is an imitation of the most beautiful and affecting of our Saviour's parables, the good Samaritan. The poetical descriptions are truly picturesque. We feel the horror of the dark cold night; we see the big drops fall, and the full flocks driving o'er the plain; the welkin opens, and the yellow lightning flies; the thunder's rattling sound moves slowly on, and, swelling, bursts into a violent crash, shakes the high spire, &c. The note which accompanied this pastoral to the publisher of the 'Town and Country Magazine,' is dated Bristol, July 4. 1770, only a month before his death. 'If the glossary annexed to the following piece will make the language intelligible, the sentiment, description, and versification, are highly deserving the attention of the literati.' In addition to the internal proofs that it was a composition of the day, the following stanza, in which he alludes to his own deserted situation, carries melancholy conviction to the mind that it was the composition of Chatterton.

Look in his glommed face, his spright therescanne;
Howe woe-be-gone, how, withered, forwynd, dead!
Haste to thie church-glebe-house, asshrewed manne!
Haste to thie kiste, thie onlie dortoure bedde.
Cale, as the claie whiche will gre on thie hedde,
Is charitie and love aninge highe elves;
Knightis and Barons live for pleasure and themselves.

The smaller pieces are not without merit. There is much elegant satire in the two Epistles to Canynge prefixed to Ælla; and some strokes of pleasantry in the Storie of Canynge.

The poems contained in the Miscellanies and Supplement, acknowledged by Chatterton to be his own composition, have been thought inferior to those which he produced as written by Rowley. If there is any inequality, at least the same hand appears in both. Imagination in a young mind is not always just. Rowley has his faults as well as Chatterton; but both collections contain an imagery of the same sort. If some of Chatterton's avowed pieces are scarcely to be inspected with all the severity of criticism, it should be remembered, that the poems attributed to Rowley are by no means uniformly excellent. It should also be remembered, that Chatterton lavished all his power on the counterfeit Rowley, with whom he intended to astonish or deceive the world; that the pieces he produced as written by him, were composed with one uniform object in view, and in a state of leisure and repose. 'In his own character,' says Mr. Croft, 'he painted for booksellers and bread, in Rowley's for fame and eternity.' Considerable allowance ought to be made for the exercises of his infantine years; for the incorrect effusions of momentary resentment; for a few lines thrown together in a playful mood to please an illiterate female, or to amuse a school-fellow, and perhaps not less for the hasty and involuntary productions of indigence and necessity, constructed for a magazine, and calculated for the sole purpose of procuring a subsistence.

His Miscellanies contain the same even and flowing versification as the others, the same strokes of uncommon spirit and imagination, and, in general, display the same premature abilities. 'Nothing in Chatterton,' says Lord Orford, 'can be separated from Chatterton. His noblest flights, his sweetest strains, his grossest ribaldry, and his most common-place imitations of the productions of magazines, were all the effervescences of the same ungovernable impulse, which,ameleon-like, imbibed the colours of all it looked on. It was Ossian, or a Saxon monk, or Gray, or Smollett, or Junius; and if it failed most in what it affected most, to be a poet of the fifteenth century, it was because it could not imitate what had not existed.'

In the Elegy on Thomas Philips, of Fairford, probably his old master, there are some descriptive stanzas not unworthy of the author of Ælla, and the incomparable chorus of Goddwyn.

Pale rugged winter bending o'er his tread
His grizzled hair bedropt with icy dew;
His eyes, a dusky light, congeal'd and dead;
His robe, a tinge of bright ethereal blue:

His train, a motley'd, sanguine, sable cloud,
He limps along the russet dreary moor;
Whilst rising whirlwinds, blasting, keen, and loud,
Roll the white surges to the sounding shore.

Fancy, whose various figure-tinctur'd vest,
Was ever changing to a different hue:
Her head, with varied bays and flow'rets drest,
Her eyes, two spangles of the morning dew, &c.

That he was capable of writing on a religious subject, with great appearance of devotion, is evident from his Ode on Resignation, first published in 'Love and Madness,' in which we scarcely know, whether most to admire the piety of the sentiments, or the beauty of the poetry. The last stanza is eminently beautiful.

His African Eclogues, though unconnected and unequal, contain some excellent lines; the following occur almost at the beginning of the first, and are animated, expressive, and harmonious:

High from the ground the youthful warriors sprung,
Loud on the the concave shell the lances rung;
In all the mystic mazes of the dance,
The youths of Banny's burning sands advance;
Whilst the soft virgin panting looks behind,
And rides upon the pinions of the wind.

The simile in the second eclogue, beginning, So when arriv'd at Gaigra's highest steep, &c. is not perfectly correct; but the liveliness of the description evinces a most vigorous imagination.

Of the poem On Happiness, inserted in 'Love and Madness,' Mr. Croft tells us, 'that Catcott, talking one day with Chatterton about happiness, Chatterton said, he had never yet thought on the subject; but that he would. The next day he brought Catcott these lines, and told him they contained his creed of happiness.' The poem, consisting of upwards of a hundred lines, is undoubtedly irreligious; but it bears the strongest marks of genius, sagacity, and acuteness, and convinces us of the great extent and variety of his abilities.

The poem, called Apostate Will, written when he was eleven years and almost five months old, appears to have been aimed at somebody who had formerly been a Methodist, and was lately promoted in the Established Church. It shows the early turn and bent of his genius to satire, which was his fort, if any thing can be called his fort who excelled in every thing he undertook; and that he was then no stranger to the works of Bingham, Young, and Stillingfleet, which were probably among the books of divinity, mentioned in his sister's letter.

The Consulad, a political piece, written at Bristol, and in the highest strain of party scurrility, has some strokes of satire in a superior style. The introductory lines are animated and poetical. The Prophecy, written apparently a short time after, is in the best style of Swift, and appears to be the genuine effusion of that enthusiastic love of liberty, which generally takes possession of young and sanguine dispositions.

The satire of Chatterton has the poignancy and sometimes the coarseness of Churchill. Dryden and Pope seem to have been his models for versification; but he has more of the luxuriance, fluency, and negligence of Dryden, than of the terseness and refinement of Pope.

In his Saxon Poems, written in the style of Ossian, he has not improved upon an indifferent model. They are full of wild imagery and inconsistent metaphor, with little either of plot or of character to recommend them.

Of the prose compositions of Chatterton, the Adventures of a Star, the Memoirs of a Sad Dog, the Hunter of Oddities, Tony Selwood's Letter, &c. display considerable knowledge of what is called the town, and demonstrate the keenness of his observation, and his quickness in acquiring any branch of knowledge, or in adapting himself to any situation. A considerable fund of reading in Magazines, Review, &c. which Mr. Warton observes, 'form the school of the people,' had prepared him well to exercise the profession of a periodical writer.

Antiquities, however, constituted his favourite study, and in them his genius always appears to the greatest advantage; even the most humorous of his pieces, Tony Selwood's Letters, derives its principal excellence from his knowledge of ancient customs. In the Christmas Games, which are acknowledged to be his own, and in his Essay on Sculpture, there is much of that peculiar learning in British antiquities, which was necessary to lay the foundation of Rowley's poems. His Will, written before he left Bristol, throws much light on his real character, his acquaintance with old English writers, and his capability of understanding and imitating old French and Latin inscription, not indeed grammatically, but sufficient to answer the purposes to which he often applied this knowledge. From this writing, it appears, that he would not allow David to have been a holy man, from the strains of piety and devotion in his Psalms, because a great genius can affect any thing, that is, assume any character and mode of writing he pleases. This is an answer from Chatterton himself, to one argument, and a very powerful one, in support of the authenticity of Rowley's poems. The pieces signed Asophides, do not appear to be Chatterton's. He almost always signed himself D. B. the initials of his first Latin signature, Dunhelmus Bristolensis. The story of Maria Friendless, which Chatterton himself sent to the 'Town and Country Magazine,' probably for the sake of obtaining an immediate and necessary supply of money, is almost a literal transcript of the Letter of Misella in the 'Rambler.'

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. Swinburne in his amusing, and instructive Travels through Spain, has related an anecdote, which contains a good example of Spanish shrewdness. 'We were dining, during the noon tide hour, under a large tree before the door of one of the Siete molinos by the side of a brook. The miller and his neighbours, were very civil, and furnished us with every thing necessary for our repast, one of the most delicious I ever made. The old and young formed a circle round us, while we devoured our cold ham and turkey. As I perceived one of the young fellows smile and look very arch, I told him I hoped he was not scandalized at our eating meats in Lent, as we were allowed that liberty, as travellers. No, no, replied he, not I indeed; for I know you belong to a happy set of people with—whom to day is always the holiday, and to morrow the vigil and fast.'

The British Critics thus review a catchpenny pamphlet, and employ a style of contempt, which would be very useful in this country, and check perhaps an inundation of nonsense.

A new code for gentlemen, in which are considered, God and Man's natural rights and social duties, will, law, opinion, religion and reason, adversity prosperity; on duelling, marriage and concubinage; gaming and intoxication Politics and eternity; by Dr. Bemetsreider. 8vo. 1s.

All these important subjects are discussed in the space of twenty three pages, and all too for the small price of a Shilling. The author, it seems, has heretofore been a musician; but that failing, he has taken up the trade of an author. We fear he will find the latter quite as poor a business as the former; and we earnestly recommend the said Dr. Bemetsreider to look out for some other employment.

The most striking feature of the face, and that to which we most frequently direct our view, is the eye. This is the chief seat of expression. At this window, the soul is often seen in her genuine character, even when the Porter below, the tongue, is endeavouring to persuade us that she is not within, that is, otherwise employed, or that she is quite a different person. Smiles and sadness display themselves partly at the mouth; the former by raising, the latter by depressing the corners of it; and yet we might in many cases mistake a laughing, for a weeping countenance, if we did not see the eye. Indeed this little organ whether sparkling with joy or melting in sorrow; whether gleaming with indignation, or languishing in tenderness, whether glowing with the steady light of deliberate valour, or sending forth emanations of good will and gratitude is one of the most interesting objects in the whole visible universe. There is more in it, than shape, motion, or colour; there is thought and passion, there is life and soul; there is reason and speech.

King William III, says, Lord Orford, had so little regard for men of letters and wit, that when St. Evremont was introduced to him, the King said coldly 'I think you were a major General in the French service!'

In 'good King Charles's, jovial days,' when the most extravagant wit had like the 'loyalty' of the time 'no harm in't,' it is recorded that when a gentleman drank alady's health as a toast, by way of doing her still more honour, he frequently threw some part of his dress into the flames. In this proof of veneration to the ladies, his companions were obliged to follow him, by consuming the same article, whatever it might be. One of the friends of Sir Charles Sedley after dinner at a tavern, perceiving he had a very rich lace cravat on, when he named the lady to whom honour was due, made a sacrifice of his cravat, and Sir Charles and the rest of the company were all obliged to follow his example. Sir Charles bore his loss with great composure observing, that it was a good joke, but that he would have as good a frolic some other time. On a subsequent day, the same party being assembled, when Sedley had drank a bumper to the health of some beauty of the day, he called the waiter, and ordering a tooth drawer into the room, whom he had previously stationed for the purpose, made him draw a decayed tooth, which had long plagued him. The rules of good fellowship clearly required that every one of the company should lose a tooth also; but they hoped he would not be so unmerciful as rigidly to enforce the law. All their remonstrances, however, were vain, and each of his companions successively, multa gemens, was obliged to put himself into the hands of the operator.

The useful reading of the Editor of the Walpole paper has furnished him with the following sensible extract, which we will insert together with his sensible commentary 'In the life of Akenside, Johnson has given a faithful and correct delineation of a modern democrat.—He certainly retained an unnecessary and outrageous zeal for what he called, and thought Liberty; a zeal, which sometimes disguises from the world, and not rarely from the mind, which it possesses, an envious desire of plundering wealth or degrading greatness; and of which the immediate tendency is innovation and anarchy, an impetuous eagerness to subvert and confound with very little care what should be established!—a more perfect portrait of a Jacobin disorganizer of the present day, can not possibly be drawn than is contained in the above sketch of the character of Akenside.

The celebrated Gifford, the translator of Juvenal, calls the period from the last years of Elizabeth to the death of James, 'the best age of English literature.'—"I know (says he) it is now an inveterate custom to sneer at the name of James; and that every willing thinks himself competent to scoff at his witches, his tobacco blasts, and his dog Stenie: But the age I have mentioned produces something better than all these; and among the rest, great masters of a style, pure, copious, elegant, nervous, flowing, light, airy, and harmonious.'

DOMESTIC DAY OF DRYDEN.

The accurate and laborious Edmund Malone, Esq. in a elaborate life of a great poet, prefixed to a late invaluable edition of his prose writings, after informing us, that even the domestic day of such a man cannot be uninteresting, adds, Dryden usually devoted his mornings to the composition of his various works. The hour of dinner, even in the latest period of his time, did not exceed two o'clock, and plays began at four in the afternoon. Between three and four o'clock, he repaired to the coffee-house, and there a great part of the evening was spent. Addison, says Pope, passed each day alike, and much in the same manner, as Dryden did. Dryden employed his mornings in writing; dined en famille, and then went to Will's; only he came home earlier o' nights. In Addison's time, it was customary, at about seven or eight o'clock, to retire from the coffee-house to the tavern, where wine and frequently pipes and tobacco, were immediately called for; and in an hour or two afterwards they supped, and then again circulated the bottle.

DOMESTIC DAY OF ADDISON.

Addison, as Pope related to Mr. Spence, studied all the morning, then met his party at Button's Coffee-house, dined there, and stayed five or six hours, and sometimes far into the night. I was, says Pope, 'of the company for about a year, but I found it too much for me. It hurt my health and so I quitted it. Addison's chief companions before he married Lady Warwick, were Steele, Budgell, Carew, D'Avenant, and Colonel Brett. He used to breakfast with one or other of them at his lodgings in St. James' place, dine at taverns with them, then to Button's, and then to some tavern again for supper in the evening; and this was the usual round of his life.

A man convicted at the last Surry Assizes, for stealing pewter pots, was sentenced to be publicly whipped from the prison gate Horsemonger-lane, through the Borough, and back again. Having no money to fee the hangman, to soften the lash of justice, he at last hit upon an expedient. In the prison there were several halfquartern gin measures, the tops of which he broke off, and deposited in a leather pocket he had previously cut from his breeches, tied it up, and when the executioner came to conduct him to receive his punishment, the culprit, in his way to the cart's tail, slipped the pretended purse into his hand, exclaiming—'there are nine half crowns, 'tis all I have in the world pray be merciful.' The hangman took the bribe with a smile, and bade him keep up his spirits for he should not be hurt. The cart then proceeded, and the consequence was, that the deceitful returned very little the worse for the flagellation. Upon being delivered into the hands of the prison-keeper, he burst into a loud laugh, and when asked what made him so merry? he related the manner in which he had bribed his chastiser, adding, that it would ever be a subject of mirth, when he reflected how he had outwitted the hangman.

It seems to be proved, by the engravings which the french have lately published from the ruins of Egyptian Thebes, that the elements of the beautiful in Grecian architecture are not so entirely the invention of the Greeks as has been hitherto imagined. The temples of Thebes present bases, shafts and capitals, which the Greeks appear to have only imitated and improved in the Doric, the Ionic, and the Corinthian column. The Egyptians, not the Greeks, were the inventors.

AN ADDRESS TO THE TOOTH ACHE,

(From vol. 4 of Burn's Poems.)

My curse upon your venom'd stang,
That shoots my tortur'd gums along.
And thro' my lugs gies munny a twang,
Wi' gnawing vengeance;
Tearing my nerves wi' bitter pang,
Like reeking engines.
When fevers burn, or ague freezes,
Rheumatics gnaw, or cholick squeezes;
Our neighbour's sympathy may ease us,
Wi' pitying moan;
But thee—thou hell of all diseases.
Ay mocks our groan!
Adown my beard the slavers trickle!
I throw the wee stools o'er the mickle,
As round the fire the gieglets keckle,
To see me loup;
While raving mad, I wish a heckle
Were in their doup.
Of a' the monstrous human dools,
Ill hearts, daft bargains, cutty stools
Or worthy friends rak'd in the mools,
Sad sight to see!
The tricks o' knaves, or fash o' fools,
Thou bear'st the gree
Where'er that place be priests ca' hell,
Whence all the tones of misery yell,
And ranked plagues their numbers tell
In dreadful raw
Thou, Tooth Ache, surely bearst the bell,
Among them a'!
O, thou grim, mischief making chiel,
That jars the notes of discord squeel,
Till daft mankind aft dance and reel
In gore a shoe thick;
Gie a' the faes of Scotland's weal
A towmond's tooth ache.

Some jocular sportsman, in a Charleston, S. C. paper, thus challenges the jockies of the turf. 'Dumbe, an aged horse, will run against any horse mayor or gelding, in the state, up hill, for fifty guineas, provided it be allowed that Dumbe have a hickory after him.'—If the same indulgence be likewise exerted towards the mayor, and the sportsman's horse should have other failings besides being Dumbe, we think the challenger will lose his bet.

A modest Poet who has lately advertised a rhyming pamphlet on some of the political topics of the day, humbly hopes that 'no good patriot will refuse nine pence for his poem.' We think the bard a little too sanguine in his expectations of the patronage of Patriotism. Many a good patriot is not worth nine pence, either morally, or arithmetically considered.

A Mr. Edwards, a respectable Dyer, of Sherard-street, Golden-square, was interred on Tuesday sc'n night at Lambeth Church. By his will he directed that his funeral procession should stop at the Magpies, in Bridge-street, Westminster, and the mourners be regaled with a gallon of porter, which they were to drink at the door of the house; they were then to proceed on a long trot along the bridge to Jolly Sawyers, in Lambeth Walk, there to have another gallon of beer; from thence to the grave, where, after his interment, a pint of gin was to be drank by them over his grave, wishing him a pleasant journey. The request was literally complied with.

[Lon. paper.]

About a fortnight ago, two persons in the neighbourhood of Uindale, near Cockermouth, for a wager of half a crown (with a set of their acquaintances) swallowed (and by fair mastication) thirty six salt herrings, and drank three pecks of ale (Winchester measure) within the space of an hour! N. B. The cook, being a humourist, fried the last moiety of the herrings in half a pound of candles!

LITERARY.

It has long been lamented by the literary world, that the celebrated author of Clarissa and Grandison had forbidden his Correspondence to be published in the lifetime of his children, unless they should be obliged to resort to them as a course of fortune. The recent death of Mrs. Anne Richardson, of Suffolk, having removed the force of that injunction, those interesting remains are now about to meet the public eye, though the medium of Mr. Phillips, who, we understand, has given Mr. Richardson's descendants twelve hundred guineas for the manuscripts.

[Lon. paper.]

The ridiculous affectation of refined humanity, and the monotonous drawl of Charlotte Smith's and Rolin Southey's sonnets are justly laughed at in the following sarcasm.

Poor grunting animal, that all the day,
Plods dull and mopish round my uncles yard
Ah me, it strike's me that thy lot is hard,
For thou dost droop thy care, thy hairs are grey.
Thy humid eyes look wet—Ah wretch ill starr'd—
What sorrowing sadness seems to mark thy way
While every pleasure is from thee debarr'd
Nor frolic rapture bids thy heart be gay.
Poor grunting Swine, full much I grieve to view
Thy groping snout, enslav'd with iron cold,
For thou must feel, and feel with sorrow to
What yet thy peaceful tongue has never told.

Adiau, poor Pork, again I sigh, adieu,
My teare fast fall—they fall, alas, for you.

Waller has written four lines in praise of Tea, which it is strange Dr. Johnson, the greatest tea tippler of his time did not extol.

The muses friend, tea does our Fancy aid
Repress those vapours, which the head invade
And keeps that Palace of the Soul serene
Fit, on her birth day to salute a Queen.

A Painter being employed to represent the Cherubim and Seraphim in a country Church, made them with very long melancholy faces, and being asked the reason for so doing by the rector of the parish, answered, 'I have your own words for the propriety of it, have I not heard you say, a thousand times that Cherubim and Seraphim continually do cry.'

Mr. Malone, in summing up the praises of Sir Joshua Reynolds, has the following memorable passage. "He has one claim to commendation which I think it my duty particularly to mention, I mean the praise to which he is entitled for the Rectitude of his Judgment, concerning the pernicious doctrines, that were made the basis of that Revolution, which took place in France not long before his death. Before the publication of Mr. Burke's Reflections on that subject, he had been favoured with a perusal of that excellent work, and was lavish of his encomiums upon it. He was, indeed, never weary of expressing his admiration of the profound sagacity, which saw in their embryo state all the evils with which this country was threatened by that tremendous convulsion, he well knew how eagerly all the wild and erroneous principles of government attempted to be established by the pretended philosophers of France, would be cherished and enforced by those turbulent and unruly spirits among us, whom "no king could govern and no God could please," and long before that work was written, frequently avowed his contempt for those "Adam wits," who set at nought the accumulated wisdom of ages, and on all occasions are desirous of beginning the world a-new. He did not live to see the accomplishment of almost every one of the predictions of the prophetic and philosophical work alluded to. Happily for himself, he did not live to participate of the gloom, which has saddened every virtuous bosom, in consequence of all the civilized states of Europe being shaken to their foundations, by those 'troublers of the poor world's peace,' whom Divine Providence has been pleased to make the scourge of human kind.

The reason why the name of God is not mentioned in oaths, administered according to the republican fashion, is extremely obvious. It would imply, that government had taken a particular private opinion under its protection, and preferred it to all others, which is inconsistent with the republican principle of the indifference of all opinions. Besides, it would wound the tender consciences of those who chuse to believe, that there are twenty Gods, or no God at all.

The manager of a company of strolling players was once severely reprehending one of his performers for stupifying himself by drinking quart after quart of porter, and threatened, if he did not break himself of the habit, to discharge him, as an unfit person. The man promised he would not be guilty of the like again. However the manager walking out one morning, found his penitent at a little public house, sitting over a glass of ale. 'So, Sir,' lays he, 'I thought you promised me to leave this habit of intoxication.' 'Indeed,' replies the man, 'so I have in a great measure.'

One of the ancients, and certainly not the greatest fool of his tribe, used, whenever he was deliberating on any grave or state affairs, to consult his wife, hear her advice, and then made it an invariable rule to act diametrically opposite to the opinion of the lady. This procedure suggests a good rule for construing the 'Aurora.' Let the good people, who pore, or who yawn over that paper, whenever they have finished their valuable morning's work, believe the very reverse of every Aurora position. There cannot be imagined a shorter, or more direct road to political truth.

A young sophimore, more notorious for his amours than his attention to the muses, courted a fair dame by the name of Sally Love. As soon as this came to his provident guardian's ears, he wrote him an affectionate letter advising him to quit her as soon as he could with honour, and then court an alliance with Sal-lust.

DOMESTIC DAY OF SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The detail of his domestic day, says EDMOND MALONE, will not be unacceptable. He usually rose about 8 o'clock, breakfasted at 9, and was in his painting room before 10. Here he generally employed an hour on study, or on the subordinate parts of whatever portrait happened to be in hand; and from 11, the following five hours were devoted to those, who sat for their pictures: with occasionally short intervals, during which he sometimes admitted the visits of a friend. Such was his love of his art, and such his ardor to excel, that he often declared he had, during the greater part of his life, laboured as hard with the pencil, as any mechanic working at his trade for bread. About two days in each week during the winter, he dined abroad; once, and sometimes oftener, he had company at home by invitation; and during the remainder of the week he dined with his family, frequently with the addition of two or three friends. In the evenings, when not engaged by the academy, or in some public or private assembly, or at the theatre, he was fond of collecting a few friends at home, and joining in a party at whist, which was his favourite game. The marked characters of his table was, that though there was always an abundant supply of those elegancies, which the season afforded, the variety of the courses, the excellence of the dishes, or the flavour of the Burgundy, made the least part of the conversation; though the appetite was gratified by the usual delicacies; and the glass imperceptibly and without solicitation, was cheerfully circulated, every thing of this kind appeared secondary and subordinate, and there seemed to be a general though tacit agreement among the guests, that MIND SHOULD PREDOMINATE OVER BODY; that the honours of the turtle and the haunch, should give place to the feast of wit, and that, for a redundant flow of wine, the flow of soul should be substituted.—Of a table, thus constituted, with such a host and such guests, who would not wish to participate?

ON VISITING DUNDRENNAN ABBEY,*

INSCRIBED TO MISS A. S.

BEGUILING the sorrows of life's chequer'd day,
With toil-beaten footsteps and slow,
O'er the cloud-covered mountains of Scotia I stray,
And mark the sweet scenes as I go.
Enraptur'd, I muse o'er the time-mouldering towers,
Where Valour heroic with beauty was fir'd,
Where music to charm them exhausted her powers,
And the Bard's storied song wing'd with pleasure the hours,
While Nature his numbers inspir'd.
Dundrennan! thy moss-crust'd ruins I hail,
And with reverence enter thy door!—
No longer thy monks with night-vigils are pale,
Instructed in mystical lore.
No longer the song of devotion ascends,
Nor the sigh of repentance is heard thro' the gloom;
Nor the way-weary pilgrim at evening bends,
To give thanks to the Hearer of pray'r who defends
From storms him who has not a home!
Oft have I revolv'd on the days that are gone,
And Time's mouldy records survey'd,
When dread Superstition ascended the throne,
And prostrate the nations obey'd!
In deep leaden slumbers was seal'd Learning's eye;
By Ignorance, Science in fetters was bound;
Truth languish'd; and Genius beheld with a sigh
Her wild flowers expos'd to a cold wintry sky,
Which scatter'd their leaves on the ground!
Yet in midst of the gloom darts a transient ray,
When pity afforded relief;
And wip'd the sad tear of misfortune away,
And sooth'd the pale victim of grief.
These rude-sculptur'd walls once received with a tear
Their Queen, lovely Mary, who fled from the foe
With a heart torn with anguish, an eye wild with fear,
And death close behind her!—a prospect how dread!
To finish her measure of woe!
"Unfortunate Mary! why wilt thou depart?
Why, why to Elisabeth fly?—
Compassion's warm glow never melted her heart,
Nor the sweet tear of pity her eye!
Her cold frozen bosom's the thorn of deceit;
She proffers protection in hopes to betray!
For thee all the woes of confinement await,
And from the damp dungeon thou'rt led to thy fate
From which thou wouldst hurry away!
Now Time's iron hand has demolish'd these walls,
In story so often renown'd;
'Mongst the night-weeds the turreted battlement falls

* It was in this abbey that Mary Queen of Scotland first halted, when flying from the unfortunate battle of Langside.

And Ruin stalks grimly around!—

Here, the ill-boding owl her lone dwelling maintains,

And with her hoarse notes teaches Nature to sigh,

And fills with affright wakeful Silence, who reigns

When night's sable mantle envelopes the plains,

And the star twinkles dim in the sky!

To these scenes, Meditation my wand'ring guide,

Where the daughters of Beauty are laid;

And the brave sons of Freedom, who conquer'd or died,

When the foe dar'd their country invade!—

There Nature proclaims, neither Beauty's bright eye

Nor Valour from death's cruel empire can save!

And the moment is swiftly approaching, when I,

Who now o'er the ruins of Time heave the sigh,

Forgotten shall sleep in the grave!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The subsequent poem, ascribed to Thomas Moore, Esq. is not in any collection of his published works. It is thus introduced by an English friend, and the Editor is highly pleased to present to his readers a beautiful and new acquaintance.]

The invisible girl is an acoustical deception. From a glass globe, suspended in the midst of a room, and having no apparent communication with any thing else, a female conversed with the spectators in four different languages, and played upon the piano forte: her breath might even be felt. Had the ensuing lines no external sign, by which to discover their author, the internal evidence would justify their being ascribed to the elegant translator of Anacreon.]

TO THE INVISIBLE GIRL.

They try to persuade me, my dear little sprite,
That you are not a daughter of Ether and Light,
Nor have any concern with those fanciful forms,
Who dance upon rainbows, and ride upon storms;
That, in short, you're a woman, your lip and your breast

As mortal as ever were tasted, or prest!

But I will not believe it....no, science, to you
I have long bid a last and a careless adieu;
Still flying from nature to study her laws,
And dulling delight by exploring its cause,
You forget how superior for mortals below
Is the fiction they dream to the truth that they know.

Oh! who, that has ever had rapture complete,
Would ask how we feel it, or why it is sweet;
How rays are confin'd, or how particles fly
Thro' the medium refin'd of a glance or a sigh.
Is there one, who but once would not rather have known it,

Than written with Hervey whole volumes upon it?

No, no....but for you, my invisible love,
I will swear you are one of those spirits that rove

By the bank, where at twilight the poet reclines,
When the star of the west on his solitude shines,
And the magical fingers of Fancy have hung
Every breeze with a sigh, every leaf with a tongue:

Oh! whisper him then 'tis retirement alone
Can hallow his harp, or ennoble its tone;
Like you, with a veil of seclusion between,
His song to the world let him utter unseen,
And, like you, a legitimate child of the spheres,
Escape from the eye to enrapture the ears.
Sweet agent of mystery! how I should love
In the wearisome ways I am fated to rove,
Forever to have you invisibly nigh,
Inhaling forever your song and your sigh.

Mid the crowds of the world, and the murmurs of Care,

I could sometimes converse with my nymph of the air,

And turn with delight from the clamorous crew,
To steal in the pauses one whisper from you!

O come and be near me; forever be mine;
We shall hold in the air a communion divine,
As pure, as of old, was imagin'd to dwell
In the grotto of Numa, or Socrates' cell!
And oft at those lingering moments of night,
When the heart is weigh'd down and the eye-lids are light

You shall come to my pillow and tell me of love,

Such as angel to angel might whisper above!

Oh spirit!....and then could you borrow the tone
Of that voice, to my ear so bewitchingly known,
The voice of the ONE upon earth, who has thinn'd
With her essence forever my heart and my mind;
Though lonely and far from the light of her smile,

An exile, and weary, and hopeless the while,
Could you shed for a moment her voice on my ear,

I will think at that moment my Cara is near;
That she comes with consoling enchantment to speak,

And kisses my eye-lid and sighs on my cheek;
And tells me the night shall go rapidly by,
For the dawn of our hope of our heaven is nigh!
Sweet spirit, if such be your magical power,
It will lighten the lapse of full many an hour.
And let Fortune's realities frown as they will,
Hope, Fancy, and Care may smile for me still!

This delicious poem, of which Goldsmith or Sheridan might have been proud, has an additional interest here from this circumstance that the invisible lady is now uttering dulcet breath to the enraptured listeners of Philadelphia. We believe, however, that this is an old device, perhaps, with some new embellishment. In the sixty-second chapter of the second part of Don Quixote, which describes La aventura de la cabeza encantada, there is played off, in the house of Don Antonio Moreno, a similar deception, which cajoles the Don, and almost staggers the Squire. "En esto mandóle la mano Don Antonio se la pasó por la cabeza de bronce, y por toda la mesa, y por el pie de jaspe, sobre que se sostenia, y luego dixo: Esta cabeza, señor Don Quixote, ha sido hecha, y fabricada por uno de los mayores encantadores, y hechizeros, que hatenido el mundo; que creo era Polato de nacion, y discipulo del famoso Escotillo de quien tantas marivallas se cuentan. el qual estuvo aqui en mi casa y por precio de mil escudos, que le di, labró esta cabeza que tiene propriedad y virtud de responder à quanta cosas al oydo le preguntaren: quando rumbos, pinto caracteres, observo astros. miro puntos, finalmente la sacó con la perfeccion que veremos mañana, porque los viernes esta muda y oy que los es nos ha de hazer esperar hasta mañana: en este tiempo podrá vuesa Merced prevenirse de lo que querra preguntar, que por experiencia sé, que dice verdad en quanto responde. Admirado quedo Don Quixote de la virtud, y propriedad de la cabeza y es tuvo por no creer a Don Antonio pero por ver quan poco tiempo avia para hazer la experiencia, no quiso dizerle ostra cosa, sino que le agradecia el averse descubierto tan gran secreto."....See the whole narrative in the immortal work of Cervantes. It will be perceived in the sequel that this sagacious Head, like the Invisible Lady, makes correct responses, apparently without a prompter. The reader will smile at the easy explanation of this necromantic enigma. In the well prepared lessons of the concealed magician, he will perceive the history of juggling in every age, from the oracle at Delphi, to the conjurations of Crabtree in Peregrine Pickle. He will, moreover, enjoy the sly satire of the ironical Spaniard, upon human credulity, and the exquisite sneer at the prudent caution, or habitual bigotry of the officers of the Holy Inquisition.

Mr. OLIVER OLDSCHOOL,

SIR,

In the annexed, We have endeavoured to catch some of the style of Mr. M. G. Lewis, in his ballads. If you think the imitation worthy a place in your paper, please to insert it. "Affairs of this world," take up so much of our attention, that we have hardly time to steal from the "busy stage" long enough to fashion a sentence into rhyme. However, we do not intend becoming bankrupts in verse at present.

Your very humble servants,
DACTYL & COMMA.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. DACTYL AND COMMA.

THE MANIAC.

SAY, who is the man, who on yon dizzy height,
Where rocks upon rocks stretch up from the sight;

As wander'g there lately, I view'd,
His arms o'er his breast, in anguish he press'd
And to the pale moon, rolling o'er, he address'd
His wild eyes, as all frantic he stood.

A skin o'er his shoulders, the maniac had drawn,
And he sought a cold cave at the sight of the dawn.

There alone all the long day to spend.
But when darkness had spread her black veil o'er his head,

Oh! then would he start and leave his rush bed,
His wild steps to the plain would he bend.

There 'mid the dank grass, which wav'd to the breeze,

Would he lay himself down beneath the lone trees,

And gaze on the stream which ran by.
Sometimes he would lave his cold hand in the wave,

Then start at the shriek, which the boding owl gave,
And answer each breeze with a sigh."

His name is mad Osric, when youth smil'd
around,

In gait none could his equal be found,
He welcom'd each morn with a song,
Where'er he appeared, joy and pleasure were heard,

His smiles, and his cheerfulness had him endeared,
To all the gay swains of the throng.

He saw the fair Elfa, the maid soon he lov'd,
She heard his fond vows, his passion approv'd,
And vow'd she would wed him alone:

The friends were invited; the feast was provided,
And at hand was the day which could have decided,
And made him and Elfa but one.

And now, as together they wandered along,
Heard the lark's jocund tune or the thrushes
blythe song,

And gaily the circling hours flew.
Sudden dark gloomy clouds wrapp'd the skies in black shrouds,

And the roaring of thunder a tempest forbodes,
And rudely the whistling winds blew.

Now blacker and blacker, the clouds hover round,
And loud o'er their heads the rough thunders sound,
And the earth wide re-echoes their roar:

As the light'nings now play'd, a flash struck the maid,

The shaft wing'd by fate—but too surely sped
And—repose Osric never knew more.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Though love is a Proteus who from time immemorial has possessed the power of assuming every possible shape, and although lovers and poets seem to have exhausted every resource of nature and art, to exhibit, and even to disguise him under a variety of forms; yet, I think you will acknowledge that in the following lines he has put on a dress entirely new.
An amorous poem in the style and form of a Check upon the Bank, is, I confess, what I never before had had an idea of, until I lately found the following in a collection of Italian songs. It is probably the production of some Genoese or Venetian lover, who had more credit with the bank of Cupid than with that of St. Mark's, or St. George's. In this financial age, it will perhaps, be found to suit the meridian of other countries as well as that of Italy. I therefore take the liberty of sending it to you for publication, together with an attempt at an imitation, which I am sorry does not come up, as much as I could wish, to the spirit of the original.

EULOGIUM ON RUM.

BY J. SMITH.

ARISE! ye pimpled, tipling race, arise!
From ev'ry town and village tavern come!
Shew your red noses, and o'erflowing eyes,
And help your poet chaunt the praise of Rum.
The cordial drop, the morning dram, I sing,
The mid-day toddy, and the evening sling.

Hail, mighty Rum! and by this general name
I call each species....whisky, gin, or brandy:
(The kind is various....but the effect the same;
And so I choose a name that's short and handy;

For, reader, know, it takes a deal of time,
To make a crooked word lie smooth in rhyme.)

Hail, mighty Rum! thy song-inspiring merit
Is known to many a bard in these our days:
Apollo's drink, they find is void of spirit....
Mere chicken broth....insipid as their lays:
And, pleas'd, they'd give a riv'let....aye a sea
Of tuneful water, for one quart of thee!

Hail, mighty Rum! how wond'rous is thy pow'r!
Unwarm'd by thee, how would our spirits
fail,

When Dark December comes, with aspect sour,
And sharp as razor, blows the northern gale!
And yet thour't grateful in that sultry day,
When raging Sirius darts his fervent ray.

* It will be observed that the original is the Gentleman's check in favour of the Lady, and the imitation is the Lady's check, which she gives him in return.

Hail, mighty Rum! to thee the wretched fly:
And find a sweet oblivion of their woes;
Lock'd in thy arms, as in the grave, they lie—
Forget their kindred—and forgive their foes.
And Lethe's stream, (so much extoll'd by some,
In ancient times) I shew'dly guess, was Rum.

Hail, mighty Rum! what can thy power withstand!

E'en lordly Reason flies thy dreadful face:
And health, and joy, and all the lovely band
Of social virtues, shun thy dwelling place:
(For in whatever breast it rears its throne,
Like Turkish monarchs, Rum must rule alone.)

When our bold fathers cross'd the Atlantic waves,

And here arrived....a weak defenceless band...
Pray what became of all the tribes so brave...
The savage owners of this happy land?
Were they sent headlong to the realms below,
"By doom of battle?" friend, I answer no.

Our fathers were too wise to think of war;
They knew the woodlands were not quickly past:

They might have met with many an ugly scar....
Lost many a foretop....and been beat at last.
But Rum assisted by his son, Disease,
Performed the business with surprising ease.

And would our western brethren be less proud, or,

In other words, throw by their gun and drum,
For ducks and squirrels, save their lead and powder,

And send the tawny rogues some pipes of rum....

I dare predict, they all would gladly suck it;
And ev'ry mother's son soon kick the bucket.

But lo! the ingratitude of Adam's race?
Tho' all these clever things to rum we owe....
Gallons of ink are squirted in his face;
And his bruised back is bang'd with many a blow;

Some hounds of note have rung his funeral knell,
And ev'ry puppy joins the gen'ral yell.

So have I been (the simile is fine—
And wonderfully pat....though rather old)
When rising Phœbus shot his rays benign,
A flock of sheep come skipping from the fold;
Some restless sheep cries baa: and all the throng,
Ewes, rams, lambs, wethers, bellowing pour along.

But fear not, Rum, thro' fiercely they assail,
And none but I, the bard, thy cause defend,
Think not thy foes....tho' num'rous....shall prevail,

Thy pow'r diminish, or thy being end.
Tho' spurn'd from table, and the public eye,
In the snug closet safely shalt thou lie.

And oft, when Sol's proud chariot quits the sky,
And humbler Cynthia mounts her one horse chair,

To that snug closet shall thy vot'ry fly;
And, rapt in darkness, keep his orgies there;
Lift the full bottle, joyous, to his head,
Then, great as Cæsar, reel sublime to bed.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

So versatile, so extensive, so commanding was his genius, that he forged history, architecture, and heraldry. He wrote also a 'Manks Tragedy,' which, if his forgeries had met with a more favourable reception than they did, he would doubtless have produced as an ancient composition. With the ardour of true genius, he aspired

—petere inde coronam,
Unde nullæ prius velarint tempora musæ.

The reputation of Chatterton does not rest solely on those works which he acknowledged as his own. His fairest claim to immortality is founded on the poems attributed to Rowley, which it seems now to be generally acknowledged were really of his own composition. The controversy which their publication excited is brought to an issue. The generality of the learned, since they were put in the plain track of inquiry, have acquiesced in the decision of the advocates for Chatterton's title. The conscious silence of the defenders of their antiquity sufficiently shows that little can be opposed to the proofs brought in support of his title to them.

A state of the controversy which, both on account of its novelty and its merit, is the most curious and extraordinary, which, since the days of Bentley and Boyle, has divided the literary world, claims a place in the life of Chatterton; and the reader will not be inclined to consider it as unimportant, nor deem it unworthy of such particular and elaborate discussion, when he peruses a list of the publications on both sides, and perceives that it has been honoured with the attention of gentlemen of the first erudition in the republic of letters, and reflects, that its determination affects not only the reputation of Chatterton, but 'the great lines of the history of English poetry.'

On the side of the question which asserts the authenticity of the poems, are the names of Langhorne (Monthly Review, 1777), Milles (Commentary, &c. 1782), Bryant (Observations, &c. 1782), Greene (Strictures on Malone, Warton, &c. 1782), Matthias (Essay on the Evidence, &c. 1782), and the author of 'Observations on Rowley, and Remarks on Tyrwhitt's Appendix,' 1782. The Gentleman's Magazine, 1777, was on the same side. The Critical Review, 1777, gave extracts, but no opinion. Dr. Gregory (Life of Chatterton, 1789), gives an abstract of the arguments on both sides, but no verdict of his own. He leans to the same side; but his candour and modesty exempt him from being considered as a partizan.

The publications of Dr. Milles and Mr. Bryant have been justly considered, not only as the most voluminous, but as the first, in point of earning and ingenuity, on this side of the question. Langhorne himself, a poet, 'on first opening his poems,' concluded 'that they were mock ruins.' Upon the testimony of Mr. Catcott, &c. he pronounced them 'the original productions of Rowley, with many alterations and interpolations by Chatterton.' Mr. Matthias has delineated the leading objects of the controversy with great accuracy, perspicuity, and elegance. Though he himself espouses the authenticity of the poems, yet his book, having so strongly and faithfully represented the arguments on the other side of the question, is more calculated to overthrow than to confirm his own opinion. The objection is too forcible for the answer.

The arguments which the advocates of Rowley advance, are the asseverations of Chatterton, whom they themselves calumniate as 'unprincipled,' and who indeed contradicted himself in the very outset of his adventure; the testimonies of his friends, who thought him incapable of writing the poems; partial quotations from the poems, for a display of antiquated words and obscure expressions; quotations, still more partial, from one or two old English poets, in order to show how possible it was for them to produce now and then an harmonious coincidence of words; and the incompetency of Chatterton, to both as his genius and acquired knowledge, to this literary fraud.

'They who are willing, says Dr. Milles, to think Chatterton's time and abilities equal to all that is attributed to him, must consider the great compass and variety of knowledge necessary to qualify him for so extensive a forgery. He must have been conversant, to a certain degree, with the language of our ancient poets, with the meaning and inflexion of their words, and with the rules of grammar which they observed. He must have formed a vocabulary from their books, which must have been previously read and understood by him, as the groundwork of his imitation, and undoubtedly the most difficult part of the undertaking.'

To the truth of these observations an advocate for Chatterton may in a great degree subscribe, without being convinced that he was unequal to the task in question. Chatterton was an extraordinary instance of prematurity of abilities, such as Wotton, Barretier, Psalmanazer, Crichton, Servin, &c. Common glossaries and dictionaries, Speght, Kersey, Bailey, &c. furnished him with most of the obsolete terms which he has introduced, and common histories, Geoffry of Monmouth, Hollinshed, Fox, Fuller, Camden, &c. with most of the facts he has alluded to.

The leading object of Mr. Bryant's work is to prove, that Chatterton could not be the author of the poems; because, in a variety of instances, he appeared not to understand them. There is something specious in this plea; but the learned writer has egregiously failed in his proofs. He has invented 'meanings never meant,' and discovered allusions never intended; and, deluded by his own fancy, has made the most whimsical hypothesis the ground of his argument; so that because Chatterton did not anticipate his conjectures, he must be ignorant of Rowley's meaning! This is to make the error, in order to correct it. Chatterton undoubtedly mistook the meaning of several words; but the mistake equally concerns the poet and the glossarist. Mr. Bryant would confine every mistake, both as to words and things, to the last; and put a list of upwards of fifty terms to 'demo.' his proposition; but his reasonings, in almost every instance, are futile, and his inferences forced and unnatural. Speght, Kersey, and Bailey, in whom Chatterton confided, will explain the whole.

The observations of Mr. Matthias on the power of genius, and what he calls the capability of the English language, carry little force or conviction with them. His example is Homer. The case of Rowley and Homer is exceedingly different. We have real ground to proceed on when we speak of the poetry of Rowley's age; but nothing better than imaginary, when speaking of the age of Homer. The ancients were convinced that Homer had some models to guide him; and it is highly reasonable to suppose it. But the point in dispute is not, whether Rowley might not have been superior to every other poet of his day, but whether there is any ground in reason to suppose, or whether experience will warrant the supposition, that he should be essentially and almost totally different in language, in mode of composition, in harmony, in metre, in allusions, in references, in observations, in sentiment, and in every thing that falls within the compass of what is called taste, from not only a few, but from all the writers of his own and of every preceding age? The defenders of Rowley must assent to this proposition in its fullest extent; a proposition to which the mind almost instinctively revolts, and which the experience of mankind universally contradicts.

Among the advocates of Chatterton are the names of Tyrwhitt (Appendix to the octavo edition of Rowley, 1777, and Vindication of the Appendix, 1782), Croft (Love and Madness, 1780), Scott (Gentleman's Magazine, 1777, and Poetical Works, 1782), the Earl of Orford (Two Letters printed at Strawberry-hill, 1779), Badcock (Monthly Review, 1782), Warton (History of English Poetry, vol. 2. and Inquiry, &c. 1782), Malone (Cursory Observations, 1782); Gray, Mason, Hayley, Pye, Preston, Percy, Mickle, Headly, Johnson, Knox, Dyer, &c. The Critical Review, 1782, and Gentleman's Magazine, 1782, joined the party, which denies the authenticity of the poems.

The publications of Mr. Warton, Mr. Tyrwhitt, Mr. Malone, and the masterly critique of Mr. Badcock, have deservedly been considered as the first, in point of consequence, on this side of the question, and indeed decisive of the controversy.

'Insignificant as it may seem, says Mr. Warton, the determination of this question AFFECTS THE GREAT LINES OF THE HISTORY OF POETRY,

AND EVEN OF GENERAL LITERATURE. If it should at last be decided that these poems were really written so early as the reign of King Edward IV, the entire system that hath been framed concerning the prepossession of poetical composition, and every theory that has been established on the gradual improvement of taste, style, and language, will be shaken and disarranged.

The first serious objection which occurs against the authenticity of the poems, is, that Chatterton never could be prevailed upon to produce more than four of the originals, the Challenge to Lydgate, the Song to Ælla, and Lydgate's answer, contained in one parchment, and the account of W. Canynge's Feast, the Epitaph on Robert Canynge, and part of the Story of W. Canynge; the whole not containing more than 124 verses. If he had been in possession of the original manuscripts of Ælla, Battle of Hastings, &c. what should have hindered his producing them? If he wished to give credit to his pretensions, how could he better have effected his purpose than by showing his originals? What could have been his motive for destroying them, upon the supposition of his having possessed them? This question was never answered. The fact was, Chatterton confined his attempts at forging manuscripts to smaller pieces; but in these he failed. How much more would he have failed in poems of any considerable length? The attempt was too daring even for his adventurous pen.

The first parchment, containing 66 verses, has since been lost, but there can be no difficulty in pronouncing it a forgery, as the correspondence itself, between Lydgate and the supposed Rowley, is plainly fictitious. Dr. Milles says, 'that the hand in which the story of Canynge is written is somewhat different from the Account of Canynge's Feast,' and Mr. Tyrwhitt adds, 'that the hand in which the Epitaph on Robert Canynge is written, differs entirely from both.' They could not both, therefore, have been written by Rowley. The archetype of the fac simile of Canynge's Feast is evidently a forgery. It contains no species of hand-writing that ever existed in any age, and could only have been read by the person who wrote it.

The very existence of any such person as Rowley is questioned, and upon good grounds. He is not so much as noticed by William of Wyrcestre, who lived about the supposed time of Rowley, was himself of Bristol, and makes frequent mention of Canynge. 'Bale, says Lord Orford, who lived near two hundred years nearer to Rowley than we, and who, by unwearied industry, dug a thousand bad authors out of obscurity,' has never taken the least notice of such a person; nor yet Leland, Pitts, or Tanner, nor indeed any other literary biographer. That no copies of any of his works should exist, but those deposited in Redcliffe church, is also an unaccountable circumstance not easy to be surmounted. The manner in which they are said to have been preserved is improbable. That title deeds, relating to the church, or even historical records, might be lodged in the muniment room of Redcliffe church is sufficiently probable; but that poems should have been consigned to a chest with six keys, kept in a private room, with title deeds and conveyances, and that these keys should be intrusted, not to the heads of a college, or any literary society, but to aldermen and church-wardens, is a supposition replete with absurdity; and the improbability is increased, when we consider that these very papers passed through the hands of persons of some literature, of Chatterton's father in particular, who had a taste for poetry, and yet without the least discovery of their intrinsic value.

No writings, or chest, deposited in Redcliffe church, are mentioned in Mr. Canynge's will, which has been carefully inspected; nor any books, except two, called 'Ligers cum integris legenda,' which he leaves to be used occasionally in the choir, by the two chaplains established by him.

MISCELLANY.

PECULIARITIES OF THOMAS DAY, ESQ.

[Miss Anna Seward, to whom the lovers of polite literature, are indebted for many elegant specimens of poetry, has recently been employed in prose composition, and has written a biography of the late Dr. Darwin, and a criticism upon the most popular of his poems. Among many interesting anecdotes, in the front pages of this biography, we find some curious circumstances relative to the life and philosophic adventures of Thomas Day, the eccentric author of Sandford and Merton. With a distinct voice, we call the attention of our readers to this article, because it artlessly describes the ridiculous and pernicious effects of those wilful systems, which have of late been so much admired by all the atheists, deists, jacobins, innovator philosophic jugglers, and desperate projectors of the new school. It shows, with the force of mathematical demonstration, that all their whimsies are not only at warfare with common sense and continued experience, but with private and public felicity. Their schemes of education ossify the heart, and pollute the imagination. They make men rogues, and women whores. Their short cut to morality is only a new, and more direct road to the gallows; and as for their maniac Politics, whether they appear simpering in the hypocritical shape of democratic constitutions, or ferocious and bloody, like the grim Moloch of Jacobinism, they are of so low, so flagitious, so abominable a character, that a constant combat should be maintained against them, not only with the force of argument, but with the force of the valiant, with all the poignancy of pens, and ALL THE SHARPNESS OF SWORDS.]

About the year 1765, came to Lichfield, from the neighbourhood of Reading, the young and gay philosopher, Mr. Edgeworth, a man of fortune, and recently married to a Miss Ellars of Oxfordshire. The fame of Dr. Darwin's various talents allured Mr. E. to the city they graced. Then scarcely two and twenty, and with an exterior yet more juvenile, he had mathematic science, mechanic ingenuity, and a competent portion of classical learning, with the possession of the modern languages. His address was gracefully spirited, and his conversation eloquent. He danced, he fenced; and, winged his arrows with more than philosophic skill; yet did not the consciousness of these lighter endowments abate his ardour in the pursuit of knowledge.

After having established a friendship and correspondence with Dr. Darwin, Mr. Edgeworth did not return to Lichfield till the summer of the year 1770. With him, at that period, came the late Mr. Day, of Bear-hill, in Berkshire. These young men had been fellow-students in the university of Oxford. Mr. Day was also attracted by the same celebrated abilities, which, five years before, had drawn his friend into their sphere. He was then twenty-four, in possession of a clear estate, about twelve hundred pounds per annum.

Mr. Day looked the philosopher. Powder and fine clothes were, at that time, the appendages of gentleman. Mr. Day wore not either. He was tall and stooped in the shoulders, full made, but not corpulent; and in his meditative and melancholy air a degree of awkwardness and dignity were blended. We found his features interesting and agreeable amidst the traces of a severe small-pox. There was a sort of weight upon the lids of his large hazle eyes; yet when he declaimed,

....."Of good and evil
"Passion, and apathy, and glory, and shame,"

very expressive were the energies gleaming from them beneath the shade of sable hair, which, Adam-like, curled about his brows. Less graceful, less amusing, less brilliant than Mr. E. but more highly imaginative, more classical, and a deeper reasoner; strict integrity, energetic friendship, openhanded bounty, sedulous and diffusive charity, greatly overbalanced, on the side of virtue, the tincture of misanthropic gloom and proud contempt of common-life society, that marked the peculiar character, which shall unfold itself on these pages. In succeeding years, Mr. Day published two noble poems, The Dying Negro, and The Devoted Legions; also Sandford and Merton, which by wise parents is put into every youthful hand.

Mr. Day dedicated the third edition of the Dying Negro to Rousseau. That dedication has every force and every grace of eloquence. The sentiments are strongly characteristic of their writer except in the philippic against American resistance just commenced when the address to Rousseau was composed. Generous indignation of the slave trade, practised without remorse in the southern colonies of North America, induced Mr. Day to refuse them all credit for the patriotic virtue of that resistance to new and unconstitutional claims which threatened their liberties.

In the course of year 1770, Mr. Day stood for a full-length picture to Mr. Wright of Derby. A strong likeness and a dignified portrait were the result. Drawn as in the open air, the surrounding sky is tempestuous, lurid, and dark. He stands leaning his left arm against a column inscribed to Hamden. Mr. Day looks upwards, as enthusiastically meditating on the contents of a book, held in his dropped right hand. The open leaf is the oration of that virtuous patriot in the senate, against the grant of ship-money demanded by king Charles the first. A flash of lightning plays in Mr. Day's hair, and illuminates the contents of the volume. The poetic fancy, and what were then the politics of the original, appear in the choice of subject and attitude. Dr. Darwin sat to Mr. Wright about the same period. That was a simple contemplative portrait, of the most perfect resemblance.

The circumstances of Mr. Day's disposition, habits, and destiny were so peculiar, as to justify digression from the principal subjects of these pages.

Their author would deem it inexcusable to introduce any thing fabulous; to embellish truth by the slightest colouring of fiction, even by exaggerating singularity, or heightening what is extraordinary;....but when realities are of a nature to interest and to amuse in a collateral branch of the memoir, the reader will not be displeased to turn from its principal personage, distinguished rather by wonderful endowment than by uncommon occurrences, while the picture of his friend's more eventful story passes before their eyes.

Mr. Day's father died during his infancy, and left him an estate of twelve hundred pounds per annum.

Soon after his mother married a gentleman of the name of Philips. The author of this narrative has often heard Mr. Day describe him as one of those common characters, who seek to supply their inherent want of consequence, by a busy, teizing interference in circumstances, with which they have no real concern.

Mrs. Philips, jointured with three hundred pounds a year out of her son's estate, was left his sole guardian, or united with another person in the trust, whom she influenced. Herself, influenced by such a husband, often rendered uncomfortable the domestic situation of a high-spirited youth of genius. We may well suppose he impatiently brooked the preceptive impertinence, and troublesome authority of a man whom he despised, and who had no claim upon his obedience, though he considered it as a duty to pay some outward respect to the husband of his mother.

She frequently repined at the narrowness of her jointure, and still oftener expressed solicitude lest Mr. Philips, who had no fortune of his own, should lose in the decline of life, by losing her, all comfortable subsistence. It was Mr. Day's first act on coming of age, and into possession of his estate, to augment his mother's jointure to four hundred, and to settle it upon Mr. Philips during his life. This bounty to a man who had needlessly mortified and embittered so many years of his own infancy and youth, evinced a very elevated mind. That mind also had been wounded by the caprice of a young lady, who 'claimed the triumph of a lettered heart,' without knowing how to value and retain her prize. Before her fickleness became indisputable, he wrote the following beautiful elegy,

Yet once again in yonder myrtle bowers,
Whence rose-lipp'd zephyrs, hovering shed perfume,
I weave the painted radiance of the flowers,
And press coy Nature in her days of bloom.

Shall she, benignant, to the wondering eyes
Of the lone hermit all her charms unfold?
Or, gemm'd with dew, bid her gay florets rise
To grace the rustic master of the fold?

Shall these possess her bright, her fragrant store,
These snatch the wreath, by plastic Nature wove?
Ner wanton summer yield one garland more
To grace the bosom of the nymph I love!

For she shall come; with her each sister grace,
With her the kindred powers of harmony,
The deep recesses of the grove shall trace,
And hang with flowers each consecrated tree.

Blithe Fancy too shall spread her glittering plumes
She loves the white cliffs of Britannia's isle,
She loves the spot, where infant Genius blooms,
She loves the spot, where peace and freedom smile,

Unless her aid the mimic queen bestow,
In vain fresh garlands the low vales adorn;
In vain with brighter tints the florets glow,
Or dewdrops sparkle on the brow of morn.

Opens not one blossom to the spicy gale,
Throws not one elm its moss-wreath'd branches wide;
Wanders no rill through the luxuriant vale,
Or, glist'ning, rushes down the mountain side,

But thither, with the morning's earliest ray,
Fancy has wing'd her ever-mazy flight,
To hymn wild carols to returning day,
And catch the fairest beams of orient light.

Proud of the theft she mounts her lucid car,
Her car the rainbow's painted arch supplies;
Her swift wing'd steeds unnumber'd loves prepare,
And countless zephyrs waft her through the skies.

There while her bright wheels pause in cloudless air,
She waves the magic sceptre of command,
And all her flattering visions, wild as fair,
Start into life beneath the potent wand.

Here, proudly nodding o'er the vale below,
High rocks of pearl reflect the morning ray,
Whence gushing streams of azure waters flow,
And tinge the trickling herbage on their way.

These, cull'd from every mountain every plain;
Perennial flowers the ambient air perfume;

Far off stern Boreas holds his drear domain,
Nor chains the streams, nor blights the sacred bloom.

Through all the year, in copse and tangled dale,
Lone Philomel her song to Venus pours,
What time pale Evening spreads the dewy veil,
What time the red Morn blushes on the shores.

Illusive visions! O, not here—not here,
Does Spring eternal hold her placid reign;
Already Boreas chills the altering year,
And blasts the purple daughters of the plain.

So fade my promis'd joys!—fair scenes of bliss,
Ideal scenes, too long believ'd in vain,
Plung'd down and swallow'd deep in Time's abyss!
So veering chance and ruthless fates ordain.

Thee, Laura, thee, by fount, or mazy stream,
Or thicket rude, unpress'd by human feet,
I sigh, unheeded, to the moon's pale beam;
Thee, Laura, thee, the echoing hills repeat.

O! long of billows wild, and winds the sport,
Seize, seize the safe asylum that remains!
Here truth, love, freedom, innocence resort,
And offer long oblivion to thy pains.

When panting, gasping, breathless, on the strand
The shipwreck'd mariner reclines his breast,
Say, shall he scorn the hospitable hand,
That points to safety, liberty and rest?

But thou, too soon forgetful of past woe,
Again would'st tempt the winds, and treacherous sea;
Ah! shall the raging blast forget to blow,
Shall every wintry storm be hush'd for thee?

Not so! I dread the elemental war,
Too soon, too soon the calm, deceitful flies;
I hear the blast come whistling from afar,
I see the tempest gathering in the skies.

Yet let the tempest roar!—love scorns all harms,
I plunge amid the storm, resolv'd to save;
This hour, at least, I clasp thee in my arms,
The next let ruin join us in the grave.

The above verses imply some perfidy, or disappointment experienced by the lady to whom they are addressed. She probably accepted Mr. Day's addresses in resentment, and afterwards found she had not a heart to give him. This is no uncommon case; and it is surely better to recede, even at the church-porch, than to plight at its altar the vow of unexisting love, which no effort of the will can implant in the bosom. It has been observed, that marriage is often the grave of love, but scarcely ever its cradle; and what hope of happiness, what hope of a blessing on nuptials, which commence with perjury!

Even at that period, 'when youth, elate and gay, steps into life,' Mr. Day was a rigid moralist, who proudly imposed on himself cold abstinence, even from the most innocent pleasures; nor would he allow an action to be virtuous, which was performed upon any hope of reward, here, or hereafter. This severity of principle, more abstract and specious, than natural or useful, rendered Mr. Day sceptical towards revealed religion, though by no means a confirmed deist. Most unlike Doctor Johnson in those doubts, he resembled him in want of sympathy with such miseries as spring from refinement and the softer affections; resembled him also, in true compassion for the sufferings of cold and hunger. To the power of relieving them he nobly sacrificed all the parade of life, and all the pleasures of luxury. For that mass of human character which constitutes polished society, he avowed a sovereign contempt; above all things he expressed aversion to the modern plans of female education, attributing to their influence the fickleness which had stung him. He thought it, however, his duty to marry; nursed systematic ideas of the force of philosophic tuition to produce future virtue, and loved to mould the infant and youthful mind,

Ever despicable in Mr. Day's estimation were the distinctions of birth, and the advantages of wealth; and he had learnt to look back with resentment to the allurements of the Graces. He resolved, if possible, that his wife should have a taste for literature and science, for moral and patriotic philosophy. So might she be his companion in that retirement, to which he had destined himself; and assist him in forming the minds of his children to stubborn virtue and high exertion. He resolved also that she should be simple as a mountain girl, in her dress, her diet, and her manners; fearless and intrepid as the Spartan wives and Roman heroines.... There was no finding such a creature ready made; philosophical romance could not hope it. He must mould some infant into the being his fancy had imaged.

With the late Mr. Bicknel, then a barister, in considerable practice, and of taintless reputation, and several years older than himself, Mr. Day lived on terms of intimate friendship. Credentials were procured of Mr. Day's moral probity, and with them, on his coming of age, these two friends journeyed to Shrewsbury, to explore the hospital in that town for foundling girls. From the little train, Mr. Day, in the presence of Mr. Bicknel, selected two of twelve years each; both beautiful; one fair, with flaxen locks, and light eyes; her he called Lucretia. The other, a clear, auburn brunette, with darker eyes, more glowing bloom, and chusnut tresses, he named Sabrina.

These girls were obtained on written conditions, for the performance of which Mr. Bicknel was guarantee. They were to this effect; that Mr. Day should, within the twelve-month after taking them, resign one into the protection of some reputable tradeswoman, giving one hundred pounds to bind her apprentice; maintaining her, if she behaved well, till she married, or began business for herself. Upon either of these events, he promised to advance four hundred more. He avowed his intention of educating the girl he should retain, with a view to making her his future wife; solemnly engaged never to violate her innocence; and if he should renounce his plan, to maintain her decently in some creditable family till she married, when he promised five hundred pounds as her wedding portion.

Mr. Day went instantly into France with these girls; not taking an English servant, that they might receive no ideas, except those which himself might choose to impart.

They teized and perplexed him; they quarrelled, and fought incessantly; they sickened of the small-pox; they chained him to their bed-side by crying, and screaming if they were ever left a moment with any person who could not speak to them in English. He was obliged to sit up with them many nights; to perform for them the lowest offices of assistance.

They lost no beauty by their disease. Soon after they had recovered, by crossing the Rhone with his wards in a tempestuous day, the boat overset. Being an excellent swimmer he saved them both, though with difficulty and danger to himself.

Mr. Day came back to England in eight months, heartily glad to separate the little squabblers. Sabrina was become the favourite. He placed the fair Lucretia with a chamber milliner. She behaved well, and became the wife of a respectable linen-draper in London. On his return to his native country, he intrusted Sabrina to the care of Mr. Bicknel's mother, with whom she resided some months in a country village, while he settled his affairs at his own mansion-house, from which he promised not to remove his mother.

It has been said before, that the fame of Dr. Darwin's talents allured Mr. Day to Lichfield. Thither he led, in the spring of the year 1770, the beauteous Sabrina, then thirteen years old, and taking a twelve month's possession of the pleasant mansion in Stowe Valley, resumed his preparations for implanting in her young mind the characteristic virtues of Arria, Portia, and Cornelia. His experiments had not the success he wished and expected. Her spirit could not be armed against the dread of pain, and the appearance of danger. When he dropped melted sealing-wax upon her arms she did not endure it heroically, nor when he fired pistols at her petticoats, which she believed to be charged with balls, could she help starting aside, or suppress her screams.

When he tried her fidelity in secret-keeping, by telling her of well-invented dangers to himself, in which greater danger would result from its being discovered that he was aware of them, he once or twice detected her having imparted them to the servants, and to her play-fellows.

She betrayed an averseness to the study of books, and of the rudiments of science, which gave little promise of ability, that should, one day, be responsible for the education of youths, who were to emulate the Gracchi.

Mr. Day persisted in these experiments, and sustained their continual disappointment during a year's residence in the vicinity of Lichfield. The difficulty seemed to lie in giving her motive to exertion, self-denial, and heroism. It was against his plan to draw it from the usual sources, pecuniary reward, luxury, ambition, or vanity. His watchful cares had precluded all knowledge of the value of money, the reputation of beauty, and its concomitant desire of ornamented dress. The only inducement, therefore, which this artless girl could have to combat and subdue the natural preference, in youth so blossoming, of ease to pain, of vacant sport to the labour of thinking, was the desire of pleasing her protector, though she knew not how, or why he became such. In that desire, fear had greatly the ascendant of affection, and fear is a cold and indolent feeling.

Thus, after a series of fruitless trials, Mr. Day renounced all hope of moulding Sabrina into the being his imagination had formed; and ceasing to behold her as his future wife, he placed her at a boarding school in Sutton-Coldfield, Warwickshire. His trust in the power of education faltered; his aversion to modern elegance subsided. From the time he first lived in the Vale of Stowe, he had daily conversed with the beautiful Miss Honora Sneyd of Lichfield. Without having received a Spartan education, she united a disinterested desire to please, fortitude of spirit, native strength of intellect, literary and scientific taste, to unswerving truth, and to all the graces. She was the very Honora Sneyd, for whom the gallant and unfortunate Major Andres's inextinguishable passion is on poetic, as his military fame and hapless destiny are on patriot, record. Parental authority having dissolved the juvenile engagements of this distinguished youth and maid, Mr. Day offered to Honora his philosophic hand. She admired his talents; she revered his virtues; she tried to school her heart into softer sentiments in his favour. She did not succeed in that attempt, and ingenuously told him so. Her sister, Miss Elizabeth Sneyd, one year younger than himself, was very pretty, very sprightly, very artless, and very engaging, though countless degrees inferior to the endowed and adorned Honora. To her the yet love-luckless sage transferred the heart, which Honora had with sighs resigned. Elizabeth told Mr. Day she could have loved him, if he had acquired the manners of the world, instead of those austere singularities of air, habit, and address.

He began to impute to them the fickleness of his first love; the involuntary iciness of the charming Honora, as well as that for which her sister accounted. He told Elizabeth, that, for her sake, he would renounce his prejudices to external refinements, and try to acquire them. He would go to Paris for a year, and commit himself to dancing and fencing masters. He did so; stood daily an hour or two in frames, to screw back his shoulders, and point his feet; he practised the military gait, the fashionable bow, minuets, and cotillions; but it was too late; habits, so long fixed, could no more than partially be overcome. The endeavour, made at intervals, and by visible effort, was more really ungraceful than the natural stoop, and unfashionable air. The studied bow on entrance, the suddenly recollected assumption of attitude, prompted the risible instead of the admiring sensation; neither was the showy dress, in which he came back to his fair one, a jot more becoming.

Poor Elizabeth reproached her reluctant but insuppressive ingratitude, upon which all this labour, these sacrifices had been wasted. She confessed, that Thomas Day, blackguard, as he used jestingly to style himself, less displeased her eye than Thomas Day, fine gentleman.

Thus again disappointed, he resumed his accustomed plainness of garb, and neglect of his person, and went again upon the continent for another year, with pursuits of higher aim, more congenial to his talents and former principles. Returning to England in the year 1773, he saw that spring, Miss Honora Sneyd united to his friend Mr. Edgeworth, who was become a widower; and in the year 1780, he learned that his second love of that name, Miss Elizabeth Sneyd was also, after the death of Honora married to Mr. Edgeworth.

It was singular that Mr. Day should thus, in the course of seven years, find himself doubly rivalled by his most intimate friend; but his own previously renounced pursuit of those beautiful young women, left him without either cause or sensations of resentment on their account.

From the year 1773 this hitherto love-renounced philosopher resided chiefly in London, and amid the small and select circle which he frequented there, often met the pretty and elegant Miss Esther Mills of Derbyshire, who, with modern acquirements, and amongst modish luxuries, suited to her large fortune, had cultivated her understanding by books and her virtues by benevolence. The again unpolished stoic had every charm in her eyes,

"She saw Othello's visage in his mind."

But from indignant recollection of hopes so repeatedly baffled, Mr. Day looked with distrust on female attention of however flattering semblance; nor was it till after years of her modest, yet tender devotion to his talents and merit, that he deigned to ask Miss Mills, if she could, for his sake, resign all that the world calls pleasures; all its luxuries, all its ostentation. If, with him, she could resolve to employ, after the ordinary comforts of life were supplied, the surplus of her affluent fortune in clothing the naked, and feeding the hungry; retire with him into the country, and shun, through remaining existence, the infectious taint of human society.

Mr. Day's constitutional fault, like poor Cowper's, seemed that of looking with severe and disgusted eyes upon those venial errors in his species which are mutually tolerated by mankind. This stain of misanthropy was extremely deepened by his commerce with the world, restrained as that commerce had ever been. Satious, and discerning, it was not easy to deceive him, yet in a few instances, he was deceived by the appearance of virtues congenial to his own:

"For neither man, nor angel can discern
"Hypocrisy, the only evil that walks
"Invisible, except to God alone."

To proposals so formidable, so sure to be rejected by a heart less than infinitely attached, Mr. Mills gladly assented; but something more remained. Mr. Day insisted, that her whole time should be settled upon herself, totally out of this present or future controul; that if she grew tired of a system of life so likely to weary a woman of the world, she might return to that wild any hour she chose, fully empowered to resume its habits, and its pleasures.

They married, and retired into the country about the year 1780, according to the best recollection of the author of these memoirs. No carriage; no appointed servant about Mrs. Day's person, no luxury of any sort. Music, in which she was a distinguished proficient, was deemed trivial. She banished her harpsichord and music-books. Frequent experiments upon her temper, and her attachment, were made by Mr. Day, whom she lived but to obey and love. Yet these she often wept, but never repined. Her wife, bound in the strictest fetters, as to the incapacity of claiming separate maintenance, or made more absolute sacrifices to the most imperious husband, than did this lady, whose independence had been secured, and of whom nothing was demanded as a duty.

Thus Mr. Day found, at last, amid the very class he dreaded, that of fashionable women, a part whose passion for him supplied all the requisites of his high-toned expectations.

Some eight or ten years after his marriage, the life of this singular being became, in its meridian, a victim to one of his uncommon systems. He thought highly of the gratitude, generosity, and sensibility of horses; and that whatever they were disobedient, unruly, or vicious, it was owing to previous ill usage from men. He had reared, fed, and tamed a favourite foal. When it was time it should become serviceable, disdaining to employ a horse breaker, he would use it to the bit and the burden himself. He was not a good horseman. The animal disliking his new situation, heeded not the soothing voice to which he had been accustomed. He plunged, threw his master, and then, with his heels, struck him on the head an instantly fatal blow. It was said that Mrs. Day never afterwards saw the sun; that she lay in bed, into the curtains of which no light was admitted during the day, and only rose to stray alone through her garden, when night gave her sorrows congenial gloom. She survived this adored husband two years, and then died, broken-hearted, for his loss.

Ere the principal subject of this biographic tract is resumed, the reader will not be sorry to learn the future destiny of Sabrina. She remained at school three years; gained the esteem of her instructress; grew feminine, elegant, and amiable. This young woman proved one of many instances that those modes of education, which have been sanctioned by long experience, are seldom abandoned to advantage by ingenious system-mongers.

When Sabrina left school, Mr. Day allowed her fifty pounds annually. She boarded some years near Birmingham, and afterwards at Newport, in Shropshire. Wherever she paid visits, she secured to herself friends. Beautiful and disinterested, she passed the dangerous interval between sixteen and twenty-five, without one reflection upon her conduct, one stain upon her discretion. Often the guest of Dr. Darwin, and other of her friends in Lichfield, esteem and affection formed the tribute to her virtues.

Mr. Day corresponded with her parentally, but seldom saw her, and never without witnesses. Two years after his marriage, and in her twenty-sixth year, his friend, Mr. Bicknel, proposed himself; that very Mr. Bicknel, who went with Mr. Day to the Foundling Hospital at Shrewsbury, and by whose suretyship for his upright intentions the governors of that charity permitted Mr. Day to take from thence that beautiful girl, and the young Lucretia.

Mr. Bicknel, high in practice as a barrister, was generally thought an advantageous match for Sabrina. More from prudential, than impassioned impulse, did she accept his addresses, yet became one of the most affectionate, as well as the best of wives. When Mr. Day's consent was asked by his protegee, he gave, it in these ungracious words: 'I do not refuse my consent to your marrying Mr. Bicknel; but remember you have not asked my advice.' He gave her the promised dower, five hundred pounds.

Mr. Bicknel, without patrimonial fortune, and living up to his professional income, did not save money. His beloved wife brought him two boys. When the eldest was about five years old, their father was seized with a paralytic stroke, which, in a few weeks, became fatal. His charming widow had no means of independent support for herself and infants. Mr. Day said he would allow her thirty pounds annually, to assist the efforts which he expected she would make for the maintenance of herself and children. To have been more bounteous must surely have been in his heart, but it was not in his system. Through the benevolent exertions of Mr. Harding, Solicitor General to the Queen, the sum of eight hundred pounds was raised among the gentleman of the bar for Mrs. Bicknel and her sons; the interest to be the mother's during her life, and the principal, at her decease, to be divided between her children.

OBITUARY.

Died, on the 19th instant, William Savery, a much esteemed member of the Society of Friends. He was a man, whom the most censorious could not censure, whose manners, mild and affable, endeared him to his friends; whose dignified, yet unassuming, deportment, rendered him respectable among his contemporaries, and whose talents, stimulated by a laudable zeal for the welfare of his fellow creatures, frequently gained him the applause of admiring crowds. Endowed with a mind noble and generous, possessing too a heart of philanthropy, he was peculiarly useful during the calamities occasioned by the Yellow Fever in Philadelphia; with undaunted serenity he visited the haunts of contagion, sought out distress, and endeavoured, by disinterested exertion, to calm the tide of woe. The sick he comforted with Christian counsel, and the poor he relieved from a fund committed to his care by the humanity of his fellow-citizens. He lived till the age of 55, a character of exemplary piety, a preacher and practiser of Christian principles. Great and many were his exertions for the diffusion of the Gospel, not only in this, but in foreign countries. His loss will be lamented as long as his name shall be remembered.

Why grieve ye thus? ye who his loss deplore;
Is he not gone from wretchedness and pain?
Lo! happy now in you empyreal heav'n,
Loudly his maker's goodness he adores.
Is it not folly then to weep his exit?
And long, with heartfelt unavailing sighs,
Mourn a friend gone, for whom death had no terrors!

Save, save your grief for those who need it more,
And weep, if you must weep, when sinners die;
Virtue no sobbing needs, she was his friend:
Each day, each hour, she hope and comfort gave,
Richly rewarding his laborious care,
Year after year to spread her influence far. H

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Children begin among themselves with a democracy, where every one is master. Immediately and naturally quarrelling with one another, they soon acquiesce in a Monarchy. One distinguishes himself from the rest either by greater genius, strength, or dexterity, in their little diversions. To him many submit, and hence an absolute, or energetic government.

The Spaniards have a very curious proverb, which forcibly expresses their love, or their fear of Great Britain,

Con todo el mundo guerra
Y paz con Ynglaterra.

Which, as our Bible translators say, 'being interpreted' signifies Peace with England and war with all the world.

At Oviedo, says an elegant writer and observing traveller through Spain, I went into the cell of father Feyjoo, and conversed with those who had revered him living. I examined the features of his bust, but this having been taken when the clay was no longer animated, it was from his works alone that I could form any judgment of his mind. All who are conversant with these, will agree with me in thinking him, for general literature, the first writer in the Spanish nation.

Shakspeare composed his comedies with the carelessness of a gentleman who wrote at his ease, and gave his audience the first flowings of his fancy, without any dread of criticism. Those were times, in which the poet indulged his genius without restraint; he stood alone, and supereminent, and wanted no artificial scaffold to raise him above the heads of his contemporaries.

Shakspeare might vault his Pegasus without a rein; mountains might rise, and seas roll in vain before him; nature could neither stop nor circumscribe his career.

Duane has been labouring, for some years, to find an individual of the Jacobin Genus, who can write. His efforts, far from being successful, are so abortive, that but few of his retainers can even read.

In the novel of "Mordaunt" the ingenious Dr. Moore, observes, in his wonted happy manner, that 'Those who marry, in spite of dislike, or difference will frequently by habit acquire a kind of affection for each other, just as those, who cannot afford claret, take port, or perhaps porter; which though unpalatable at first, becomes less and less so by patience and perseverance, and at last tolerably suits their taste.

Those, on the other, hand, who despising all other considerations, marry from love, and separate soon after from hatred, may be compared to people, who are so fond of claret, that, without thinking of the price, indulge in excesses, which create disgust and remorse.

But the author adventurously adds, I am so framed that if I should venture on matrimony at all, I am convinced I would choose to risk the fate of the claret drinkers.

The present fashionable criterion for judging of the moral and intellectual qualities of a man, is not his countenance but his dress. There goes a sly close dog, (says one) his hands are always in his pockets. That's an open-hearted generous fellow, (says another) he never buttons his waist-coat.

David, the celebrated French painter, has realized a fortune of 20,000*l*. This is the true mode of substantiating shadows.

The battle of Monmouth is fresh in the memory of every one. General LEE, who commanded the advance of the American army, from some cause, not yet developed, had beaten a retreat, and met the intrepid WASHINGTON, marching to his support, with the whole line of the army. General WASHINGTON, with surprise, immediately accosted him with, "What is the reason of this extraordinary retreat?" "Sir, replied LEE, your troops will not fight British Grenadiers." WASHINGTON immediately retorted, "Sir, you never tried it."

The Duchess of Devonshire, while waiting in her carriage one day in the streets of London, observed a Dustman, with a short pipe in his hand, looking at her. Having gazed a few seconds with intenseness, he broke into a smile, and said 'Lord love your Ladyship, I wish you would let me light my pipe at your eyes.' Her grace took it in good part, and was so pleased with the whimsical frankness of the compliment, that when any thing civil is said to her, she often remarks 'Very well; but nothing like the Dustman.'

The following Parody was written before Mr. Jefferson sent for Tom Paine from France; and at a time when, from his extreme intemperance it was supposed he would soon become a victim to disease. We have copied it from a Newburyport Herald, printed in the year 1801. [Repertory.

ANTICIPATED ELEGY.

A parody on Tom Bowline.

The following elegiac stanzas are supposed to be sung at Paris, by one of Tom Paine's brother Bacchanalians, soon after the philosopher sinks into his 'eternal sleep.'

Here the fam'd sot lies—poor Tom Ranter,
The darling of our crew!
No more he'll hug his dear decanter,
For brandy brought him too!

His face was of the manliest beauty,
With carbuncles beset;
Faithful with us he did his duty,
And kept his ashes wet.

Tom never from his club departed,
His prowess was so rare,
Tho' often led, or homeward carted,
In toping he was fair.

And then he'd swear and write so clever!
Sedition was his fort;
But Common Sense is fled forever,
Since Tom is turn'd to dirt!

Yet shall poor Tom not be forgotten,
For Monticello's sage
Shall rank him, though with tipplers rotting,
The wisest of the age.

Thus brandy has in vain consign'd him
To death's unkind arrest—
For, while an infidel's behind him,
His memory will be blest!

The known shortness of life, as it ought to moderate our passions, may likewise, with equi-propriety, contract our designs. There is not time for the most forcible genius, and active industry, to extend its effects, beyond a certain sphere. To project the conquest of the world is the madness of mighty princes; to hope for excellence in every science, has been the folly of literary heroes; and both have found at last, that they have panted for a height of eminence, denied to humanity, and have lost many opportunities of making themselves useful and happy, by a vain ambition of obtaining a species of honour which the eternal laws of Providence have placed, beyond the reach of man.

It is always pleasing to observe how much more our minds can conceive, than our bodies can perform; yet it is a duty, while we continue in this complicated state, to regulate one part of our composition, by some regard for the other. We are not to indulge our corporal appetites with pleasures, that impair our intellectual vigor, nor gratify our minds with schemes, which we know our lives must fail in attempting to execute. The uncertainty of our duration ought at once to set bounds to our designs, and add incitement to our industry; and when we find ourselves inclined either to immensity in our schemes, or sluggishness in our endeavors, we may either check or animate ourselves, by recollecting, with the father of physick, that art is long, and life is short.

Tune—'THE ISLAND.'

If the French have a notion
Of crossing the ocean,
Their luck to be trying on dry land;
They may come, if they like,
But we'll soon make 'em strike
To lads of the tight little Island.
Huzza for the boys of the Island—
The brave volunteers of the Island!
The fraternal embrace
If foes want in this place,
We'll present all the arms in the Island!

They say we keep shops,
To vend broad cloth and slops,
And of merchants they call us a sly land;
But, tho' war is their trade,
What BRITON'S afraid
To say he'll ne'er sell 'em the Island?
They'll pay pretty dear for the Island;
If fighting they want in the Island,
We'll shew 'em a sample,
Shall make an example,
Of all who dare bid for the island.

If met they should be
By the boys of the sea,
I warrant they'll never come nigh land;
If they do, those on land
Will soon lend 'em a hand
To foot it again from the Island.
Huzza! for the King of the Island;
Shall our father be robb'd of his Island?
While his children can fight,
They'll stand up for his right,
And their own, to the tight little Island.

EPIGRAM.

Imitated from the French, by Mr. P. Dodd.

ON THE DEATH OF A SPENDTHRIFT.

His last great debt is paid—poor Tom's no more!
Last debt! Tom never paid a debt before.

A Parody on Parodies.

.....I do remember a Poet;
At this chandler's shop he dwells; whom late I noted,
With many a pilfer'd line, and quaint conceit,
 wooing Apollo; haggard were his looks.
Pale want and misery had skeleton'd his bones,
And in his garret hung some ballads new,
A Grub-street elegy, and dying speech,
Most pitifully worded; on a scarce propp'd shelf
A Shakspeare mutilated, old magazines,

Pamphlets, reviews, a mort of newspapers,
Newfangled epigrams, impromptus, satire sharp,
A vast collection of spoil'd printer's sheets,
Lay, without order, yet made up a show.
Noting this mixture strange, to myself I said,
An if a man did lack a birth-day ode,
Or Sonnet pen'd to his mistress's e. e. brow,
That well might wake the critic's sharp belay,
Here lives a half starv'd wight would do it him;
Not being Sunday, he is sure at home.

The modern French style of writing is totally different from those pure models, which are to be found in her early writers. Fustian nonsense and bombast are the natural language of upstarts, mountebanks, ruffians and pillagers. The new men of regicide naturally talk in the tone of butchers, shoe blacks, chimney sweepers, and lacqueys, because each individual, whether a murderous Marat, or a limping Le Paux, whether a three coloured director, or a Harlequin First Consul must use the gross gibberish, the mother tongue of every low bred rebel. Nothing can be truer than the assertion of a great Statesman on this subject. Edmund Burke, whose political truths will 'flourish in immortal youth' when cart-loads of French, Jacobin Constitutions have been projected in vain, assures us 'that State Papers in the modern style of French bureaux are mere fanfaronades, things, which have much more the air, and character of the saucy declamations of their clubs, than the tone of regular office.'

In Carlyle's specimen of Arabian Poetry, may be found the following odd thought at the expense of an Invalid, too solicitous for the preservation of his health.

ON A VALETUDINARIAN.

So careful is Isa and anxious to last,
So afraid of himself is he grown
He swears, through two nostrils the breath goes too fast
And he's trying to breath through but one.

ODE TO EVENING.

Hail, meek eyed maiden, clad in sober grey,
Whose soft approach the weary woodman loves;
As homeward bent, to kiss his prattling babes,
Jocund, he wistles thro' the twilight groves!
When Phœbus sinks behind the gilded hills,
You lightly o'er the misty meadows walk,
The drooping daisies bathe in dulcet dews,
And nurse the nodding violet's tender stalk.
The panting Dryads, that in day's fierce heat
To inmost bow'rs and cooling caverns ran,
Return to trip in wanton ev'ning dance;
Old Sylvan too returns, and laughing Pan.
To the deep wood the clam'rous rocks repair,
Light skims the swallow o'er the wat'ry scene;
And from the sheep coat and fresh furrow'd field
Stout Ploughmen meet to wrestle on the green.
The Swain that artless sings on yonder rock,
His supping sheep and length'ning shadow spies,
Pleas'd with the cool, the calm refreshing hour,
And with hoarse humming of unnumber'd flies.
Now ev'ry passion sleeps; desponding Love,
And pining Envy, ever restless Pride;
And holy Calm creeps o'er my peaceful soul,
Anger and mad ambition's storms subside.
O modest evening! oft let me appear
A wand'ring vot'ry in thy pensive train;
List'ning to ev'ry wildly warbling note
That fills with farewell sweet thy dark'ning plain.

A FRAGMENT,

[Addressed to James Corrie, Esq. of Liverpool, on his edition of the works of Robert Burns, for the benefit of the widow and family of that immortal Bard.]
See plenty exults, in her green waving blade,
As the light breeze sweeps gently along,
And labor reclines in the soft easy shade,
Where the Redbreast awakes his sweet song.

How beauteous the landscape, when summer is drest
With a census of roses so gay;
But ah! when shall Scotia with pleasure be blest,
Since her Burns sleeps so cold in the clay!
Expands not thy breast, when the sounds of delight
Are heard in the still hour of eve;
When the villagers sport by the moon's silver light,
The day's wasting cares to relieve?
His too was the rapture such scenes could impart,
As the rustic maids chaunted his lay,
For benevolence strung the fine cords of his heart,
But that heart now lies cold in the clay!
From his country's blue hills, while the sun's golden beam
Gives life to all nature around,
Or thro' her lone glens winds the serpentine stream,
Shall the voice of the poet resound:
When love, with light heart, steals unseen to the bower,
His strains shall fresh transport convey;
For his spirit shall reign in that dear blissful hour,
Tho' his body lies cold in the clay!
Fancy wove the rich web of his vision divine,
With the rays of the soft blushing morn;
His path nature strew'd with her wild flow'rs so fine,
And the dew, trembling, hung on the thorn.
The painted trout leapt from the smooth gliding Ayr,
The lambskins danc'd sporting away,
While his lyre breath'd the notes that the soul could ensnare—
But now he lies cold in the clay!
And still o'er the mountain, and through the deep vale,
As he sung of his Scotia so dear,
Want hung by his footsteps, to tell her sad tale
For his Jane and her offspring were near.
Ye fathers who feel, and ye sons who can love,
Your regard to his orphans display;
And with Corrie's warm heart your kind sympathy prove,
Since the Minstrel sleeps cold in the clay.

WHIMSICAL POETICAL CROSS-READINGS.

The candles purloined last Saturday night—
Tis shrewdly suspected will all come to light.

A good dose of salts and a gentle rotation—
To take out the stains—in a soil'd reputation.

Return'd from their travels to see foreign parts—
Fresh oysters and lobsters transported in carts.

Two hampers of porter, five casks of salt petre—
Set to music by Handel, in excellent metre.

My servant took with him when he ran away—
Ten acres of woodland, besides corn and hay.

Fine fat and sleek cattle are seen in each street—
In climbing a wall, they lost all their feet.

Restorative Balsam with Essence of Mustard—
May be had gratis—in exchange for good custard.

To be let, or sold, in a fine situation—
My own dearest jewel—with a lost reputation.

A snow storm, with thunder and lightning, 'tis said—
Fell down the chimney, and roll'd into bed.

Good Rock and Turk's Island salt may be had—
To keep in his senses, a man who's run mad.

One morning, a cabbage appeared to my view—
Full three yards and a half—I think it was blue.

In our paper of Monday, we said in great haste—
A fire broke out which consum'd all our paste.

A pedlar came travelling by with his pack—
Containing ten white men, a squaw, and a black.

The speaker did say, but not in his chair—
You dunces attend to the chaplain at prayer.

Mr. Hayley has announced a life of Romne the painter, to be compiled from materials bequeathed to him by that gentleman for that purpose.

Temperance is a virtue, which the Spaniards show with other southern nations, for wine is so inflammatory in regions exposed to the heat of the sun, that, instead of an agreeable warmth and a flow of ideas, it would produce fever, misery and madness. In these countries, the body is so much exhausted by the influence of heat, that the siesta or short sleep in the middle of the day becomes a necessary resource of nature, and is by habit continued even in winter.

The following extract exhibits a beautiful picture of the amiable temper of ADDISON, and an enchanting specimen of his sweetest stile.

When I look into the frame, and constitution of my own mind, there is no part of it which I observe with greater satisfaction than that tenderness and concern, which it bears for the good and happiness of mankind. My own circumstances are indeed so narrow and scanty that I should taste but very little pleasure, could I receive it only from those enjoyments, which are in my own possession; but by this great tincture of humanity, which I find in all my thoughts and reflections, I am happier than any single person can be, with all the wealth, strength, beauty and success, that can be conferred on a mortal, if he only relishes such a proportion of these blessings, as is vested in himself, and in his own private property. By this means, every man, that does himself any real service does me a kindness. I come in for my share in all the good that happens to a man of merit and virtue, and partake of many gifts of Fortune and Power that I was never born to. There is nothing, in particular, in which I so much rejoice as the deliverance of good and generous spirits out of dangers, difficulties and distresses. And because the world does not supply instances of this kind to furnish out sufficient entertainments for such an humanity and benevolence of temper, I have ever delighted in reading the history of ages past, which draws together in a narrow compass the great occurrences and events, that are but thinly sown in those tracts of time, which lie within our own knowledge and observation. When I see the life of a great man who has deserved well of his country, after having struggled through all the oppositions of Prejudice and Envy, breaking out with lustre and shining forth in all the splendor of success, I close my book and am an happy man for a whole evening.

'Qui n'a pas vue Paris n'a rien vu!' 'He that has not seen Paris has seen nothing!' So said M. du Hautpas, speaking in the triumph of his heart, as he approached his window, in the Cul-de-sac des Babillardes, to take in the chemise his wife had hung out to dry!

An Englishman is surprised to see the show which a Frenchman can make with a little money. Give a poor fellow, who has neither coat, shoe nor stocking, a few livres, and he will make himself a beau for the Boulevards.

A person, who related it to me, witnessed the following scene:

One evening, company came in unexpectedly at the lodgings of an officer. 'Bless me,' exclaimed the mistress of the house, 'what shall I do—they are my intimate friends. I know they will expect to stay to supper, and I have absolutely nothing to give them.'

A maid, who had lived with her from infancy, which, as a result of the feudal system used to be common in France, seeing the distress of her mistress, and possessing, in a high degree, the faculty of making much of a little, asked her mistress what money she had? 'Oh,' replied the lady, 'none scarcely: I have only a fifteen

Sous piece, and three liards: less than ten pence. 'Give it me quickly,' said the maid.

Away the girl went, and presently the table was brought, the clean cloth was spread, the silver forks and spoons arranged, bread, butter, a Neufchatel cheese, a salad, two plates thinly strewn with strawberries, and a ragout of something like bare bones covered the board. The show was quite respectable, an appearance of many things though there was nothing to eat; and the girl, with great apparent vexation, blamed herself for her negligence: 'she had been so forgetful and the shops were now all shut: it was shameful of her! Her lady was the most hospitable lady on earth: it was no fault of hers, for her strict orders were to be always well provided.'

GAZETTES OR NEWSPAPERS.

Monsieur de Saintfoix, in his historical Essays on Paris, gives this account of their introduction.

Theophrastus Renaudot, a physician of Paris, picked up news from all quarters, to amuse his patients; he presently became more in request than any of his brethren; but as a whole city is not ill, or at least don't imagine itself to be so, he began to reflect at the end of some years, that he might gain a more considerable income by giving a paper every week, containing the news of different countries. A permission was necessary; he obtained it, with an exclusive privilege, in 1632. Such papers had been in use for a considerable time at Venice, and were called Gazettes, because a small piece of money, called Gazetta, was paid for reading them. This is the origin of our Gazette and its name. About ten years afterwards, they were common in England by the name of Mercuries.

Mr. Gifford we understand is engaged in writing a life of Buonaparte.

TRUE RESIGNATION.

WHEN Colin's good damè, who long held him a tug,

And defeated his hopes by the help of the jug,
Had taken too freely the cheeruping cup,
And repeated the dose till it laid her quite up;
Colin sent for the doctor; with sorrowful face,
He gave him his fee, and he told him her case,
Quoth Galen, I'll do what I can for your wife;
But indeed she's so bad, that I fear for her life.
In counsel there's safety—e'en send for another;
For if she should die, folks will make a strange
pother,

And say that I lost her, for want of good skill—
Or of better advice—or, in short, what they will.
Says Colin, your judgment there's none can dispute;

And if physic can cure her—I know your's will do't.

But if, after all, she should happen to die,
And they say that you kill'd her—I'll swear 'tis
a lie;

'Tis the husband's chief business, whatever ensue,
And whoever finds fault—I'll be shot if I do.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'M' is solicited to crop frequently the flowers of Poetry. In the intervals of domestic duty it is more illustrious for a woman to peruse the brilliant and the useful, than to flaunt in public places, or to cheapen fans.

Ah, friend, to dazzle let the vain design,
To raise the thought and touch the heart be thine.

It is the constant endeavor of the Editor that this paper should abound with original communications, and he is always as studious as possible of variety. But it is impossible always to be new and various. Readers must remember the infant state of letters in this country; that many tastes are to be gratified, and that numerous and often jarring articles press upon the printer. The statesman looks for official documents and political arguments; the quidnunc for news, the poet for harmonious verse, the Lounger for paragraphs, the moralist for REASON, TRUTH and NATURE, and the wit for MERRIMENT. All these expectants cannot be gratified at once. But each in order shall find something adapted to his particular taste or habits. Let him, therefore, who is disappointed this week, wait till the next, and, peradventure, we may make him atonement. Let him remember, with a slight variation of the words of Lord Coke, that 'albeit he cannot at any one day, do what he can, reach the particular object of his curiosity, yet at some other day, in some other place, his wishes may probably be realized.'

We are happy to comply with the request of H. The memorial of Talents and Worth is always precious to the Editor.

'A Fragment' in the manner of STERNE is under consideration. The author has certainly much of the quaintness, wit, and eccentricity of the original. Of the fire of fancy, and brightness, without smoke, he makes a brilliant display. But we fear that some licentious allusions will offend 'their worships and their reverences,' yet though prudes would at least pretend to be offended with his sauciness, yet they could not deny him the praise of humour, and they would exclaim with Pope upon Sir John Vanbrugh.

'How Van wants grace, who never wanted wit.'

ORIGINAL POETRY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO A ROSE-BUD.

Ah why so tardy, timid Rose!
Thy opening beauties to display?
Ah why within their mossy cell
So long thy shrinking petals stay?

Full many a morn, and many an eve,
Thy gently swelling bud I've seen,
And fondly strove, with many a kiss,
To wake thee from thy bad so green.

When scarcely form'd you first appear'd,
I mark'd thee with a lover's eye,
And doom'd thee to an envied fate—
On Delia's breast to live and die.

Spring's gladd'ning smile now gilds the plain,
And chases Winter's frowns away,
To thee, O Rose! she fondly calls,
And pours on thee her warmest ray.

Already doth her gladd'ning smile
My Delia's glowing beauties grace,
Already hath her pencil bright
Ting'd with its radiant hue her face.

With that same hue, O happy Rose!
She longs thy velvet leaves to tip,
And breathe on them the same perfume
She breath'd on Delia's dewy lip.

Near thee the lately waken'd bees,
Anxious to taste thy fragrance, stay,
With me thy promis'd bloom they wait,
And murmur chide thy long delay.

Then haste, and with impatient step,
When next to mark thy growth I walk,
Then let me see thy blushing head
Bend with its dewy weight thy stalk. Q. V.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
TO A CARVER.

BARILLA.

Skillin, lo! a belle of taste
Seems along the street to haste;
Shall I stop her, while you strike,
If not exactly, something like?
"If you please, but she's a wit,
Extremely difficult to hit;
A thing that varies every tide,
And chiefly to the moody side.
She calls, and, faith I don't know how,
Smooths every wrinkle on my brow;
Begs me to rest, the chissel takes,
Touches and such expression wakes,
That, baffled in my fav'rite art,
I take new lessons from her heart.

She gives each feature of her face
A most inimitable grace,
Whene'er her favourites appear
Within her humour's atmosphere.
With care, when arrogance is nigh,
Unsheaths the satire of her eye;
And darts such ridicule around,
That every hypocrite confounds.

Invite her home, such sport and laughter!
The ceiling cracks, and shakes the rafter.
In merry mood quick fly her jokes,
Rebounding thro' the room of folks;
With such an uproar of high glee,
Of mirth, and jest, and jollity,
Just as she please to give the pitch,
That each old knitter drops a stitch;
The workmen run, the tools all drop,
The fire goes out, the jack-wheels stop.

So lovely, yet so strange a creature,
The woman love, yet long to beat her;
Conceive her frolics are improper,
Yet know not how the deuce to stop her;
For she will, whene'er she please,
Set every woman more at ease;
And when a thousand pictures shown,
Make each enamour'd of her own.
Are follies by her hand uncover'd?
A thousand beauties are discover'd;
For she will sponge the peccant part,
And touch no fibre of the heart.

She oft, where sober maidens spend
The Sunday night by candle-end
Will sit, while half an hour goes round,
Some text of Scripture to expound;
With saintly visage thence retire
To some mean hovel's charcoal fire,
Undress the children, tend the sick,
Recruit and trim the watcher's wick.
At midnight contemplative walk,
With lovers, kittens, planets, talk,
Then, so unruffled glide to bed,
That spiders weave around her head.
Now, just for exercise and air,
To full assemblies will repair;
Be flutter'd round by belles and beaux,
And dance till Peter's herald crows.
Then, when she meditates no harm,
Take some young fellow by the arm,
When he begins to sigh and pray,
Pities and puffs the fool away;
Whips in the stage, and takes a jaunt
To some delightful country haunt;
Passes an hour among the grain,
And whirls a comet back again.

If hundreds do her form adore,
Her wit demands a thousand more;
And other thousands will confess
Her sweet, bewitching, soft address;

Assert she is, what none denied,
Good-humour's self, personified;
And place a million round her stand,
She thrills electric through the band;
Nay, circle men from pole to pole,
She'd mesmer-magnetise the whole.

Grave sages, if she pass the door,
Spring from their metaphysic lore,
Throw out a signal for her wit,
(Forever ready, ever light),
To flash among the mystic haze,
And kindly light them thro' the maze.
If, on some classic work intent,
His stock exhaust, invention spent,
She bursts upon him ere he think,
Upsets his pipe upon his ink,
Pats with familiar hand his cheek,
And joins the hearty laugh at Greek:
Or, not to dissipate his theme,
Threadles her needle, mends a seam,
Brushes the cobwebs from the tome,
And is, in every sense, at home.

For poets, thoughts and words combines,
Faster than they can shape their lines;
Teaches them curiously to match
In various tissue every patch;
Cover each bare thread with a gem,
Gloss o'er the whole, and fringe the hem;
That when they think the suit complete,
Polish'd and graceful, fine and neat,
Moves her magnetic fingers o'er it,
It looks, as tho' a critic tore it,
For every spangle seeks its kind,
And leaves a cavity behind.

Angelo's genius, howe'er great,
To wood could ne'er her form translate;
And 'twere an easier task to grave
A Phryne rising from the wave.
For as her motion, so her mein,
Extremes will seldom fix between;
For with the scene her humours change,
Adjust her features or derange;
And, catch them steady by surprise,
Her soul comes peeping thro' her eyes,
And, still resolv'd to disappoint,
Puts the whole figure out of joint;
With grave or mimic air untwines
The whole geometry of lines.
So let her pass—a jolly wench!
The next may sit upon the bench,
Rest easy, be at leisure view'd,
While every lineament is hew'd;
For no man, till her spirit's fled,
Will dare to carve Barilla's head.

ANALASKI.

SELECTED POETRY.

[In looking into 'Ellis's Specimens,' we find among the minor poems of Sir John Davies, the following good likeness of a Lounger. Human nature is nearly the same in every age. Fuscus in the reign of JAMES, and Pope's Paridel in that of Queen Anne, are twin brothers of a yawning family. Mental vacancy is as common on the banks of the Schuylkill, as on the banks of the Thames; and every reflecting reader, as he peruses the following extract from an obsolete poet, will imagine that he is describing the life and adventures of some of the young men of Philadelphia.]

Fuscus is free, and hath the world at will,
Yet, in the course of life, that he doth lead,
He's like a horse, which turning round a mill,
Doth always in the self-same circle tread.

First, he doth rise at ten; and at eleven
He goes to Gyl's, where he doth eat till one;
Then sees a play till six, and sups at seven;
And after supper straight to bed is gone.

And there till ten next day he doth remain;
And then he dines; and sees a comedy;
And then he sups, and goes to bed again:
Thus 'round he runs, without variety:
Save that, sometimes, he comes not to the play,
But falls into a brothel by the way.

HORACE BOOK I. ODE 22.

TO ARISTIVS FUSCUS.

The guiltless life, the unsullied heart,
Need not the dire envenomed dart
That speeds from Moorish bows,
Whether o'er Caucasus we stray,
O'er torrid Syrtes take our way,
Or where Hydaspes flows.

For late, when through my Sabine shade,
In careless mood too far I stray'd,
By gentlest passions charm'd,
And sung of Lalage and love,
A wolf rush'd swiftly from the grove,
But fled me, though unarmed.

Such his dread form, portentous size,
None like in martial Daunia lies,
Where ample forests spread;
None fiercer springs from Juba's land,
Where, nurtur'd in the parching sand,
The prowling Lion's bred.

Then place me where no Summer breeze
Cheers the dull soil, revives the trees,
Or in the pathless wilds
Where Phebus darts his fiercest fire;
Still shall my heart the nymph admire,
Who sweetly speaks, and sweetly smiles.

SONNET.

From the Portuguese of Camoens.

Lives there a wretch who would profanely dare
On Love bestow a tyrant's barbarous name,
And, foe to every soft delight, proclaim
His service slavery; its wages care?
Forever may he prove it so, and ne'er
Feel the dear transports of that generous flame,
For him no maiden smile, nor melting dame
The silent couch of midnight bliss prepare.
For much he wrongs the gentlest best of pow'rs,
Whose very pangs can charm, and torments
please,
Whom long I've known, and in whose angriest hours
Such rapture found, as I would not forego,
No, not forego, for all the dead cold ease
Which dull Indifference could e'er bestow.

* This is a strong phrase to express the wearisome sameness of lazy life. To toil after pleasure, which is not relished when caught; to pace, like a blind ass in an olive mill, the insipid round of fashion; to go into company, and yet be in solitude; and to gaze at the most interesting objects with a foolish face of apathy, are the characteristics of many an 'Ennui.'

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

OF the many endowments, which nature has bestowed on man, I know of none which is productive of more real delight, and which, therefore, ought to inspire more gratitude, than a taste for reading. The author of the quotation, which introduces this essay, seems to have enjoyed this pleasure in no common degree, for he has more than once expressed his feelings and his wishes with all the eloquence of a Roman. Thus he thinks if the Gods will only grant him health, and sufficient fortune to secure him from anxiety as to the hour which is passing over him, his books will give him contentment and equanimity. The austere Christian may condemn the presumption of him, who supposes tranquillity of mind to be in his own power. It certainly does militate somewhat against the doctrines of Christianity, but it is consonant with the principles of the age in which Horace flourished, and appears, particularly, to be a tenet of the sect to which he belonged. As far, however, as human agency can avail, books will be found to possess great efficacy in dispelling the gloom of discontent, in brightening the brow with cheerfulness, in lifting up the discontented countenance, and in solacing the pungency of grief. Every profession, however laborious, must have some intervals of leisure, and I envy not the disposition of him who must spend his time in perfect indolence. We learn from Locke, and every one's experience will confirm the truth of the remark, that the mind of a waking person is never wholly vacant—that it always thinks. But what can be the employment of him who has not previously stored his mind with proper materials of thought by reading? He must be confined, like philosopher Godwin's 'dull man,' to mere observation of the shops he sees in walking, and the acquaintance he meets. So negative a kind of existence we might presume every one would wish to avoid. Yet how many (ne pour la digestion, as Bruyère would call them) do we daily see, who, after finishing the business of the day, very contentedly sit down to dissipate the time which intervenes before the morrow in cards and frivolous conversation with uneducated girls, or quickly retire to that state which the ancients wisely supposed to be not very remote from death. When we know how fruitful a resource we possess against an ennui so distressing, an indolence of mind so degrading, is it not wonderful to reflect how few there are who enjoy it?

Books are not only valuable as a source of amusement, but they may be esteemed as our best instructors, next to experience, in life. Oral advice loses its influence by a variety of causes. The teacher's delicacy too often prompts him to spare the feelings of him who has rendered himself obnoxious to reproof; and the pupil, in return, will condemn the precepts of one, whose moral character he may not think superior to his own. But that advice which is presented to us by the pen of the moralist is divested of all personal considerations. He need not be penurious of reproof, who knows not whom it will offend, nor will his pride be wounded, who, in the obscurity of his closet, has none to witness his disgrace. Ethological works constitute a sort of altar, before which the student may confess himself, and no one will know his frailties; if he turn not away from the vestibule, he may become virtuous before the world shall know he was vicious.

He who has a taste for literature, and a 'copia librorum,' may be said to possess an extensive circle of acquaintance. He has it in his power to select his company from all parts of the world, and even, like the wandering Jew, unite the most distant ages. He may enjoy the bliss of Paradise, and sail in the holy ark of Noah, or the magnificent barge of Cleopatra. He may be free and equal, and experience disgrace and neglect, such as Socrates did in the democracy of Athens; or he may enjoy honour and patronage with Horace and Virgil under the Monarchy of Augustus. He may talk of fanaticism and bigotry, rebellion and murder, with Cromwell and Hamden, or of Honour, Loyalty, and Patriotism with Falkland and Montrose. His power, like that of the magician, is unbounded. His friends will come with alacrity at his call; nor will they be displeased if they be dismissed with the most frigid indifference. They will converse with him on any subjects, and inform him on all.

It is the peculiar advantage of this enjoyment that it is not indebted to either time or place for the fascination it possesses. Whether the student trim his midnight lamp amid the tumult and smoke of the city, or his pleasure is still the same.

I cannot but laugh at the weak mind which affects to be governed either in the disposition to read, or the facility to compose, by the vicissitudes of the atmosphere. I may be told that Milton, and other equally celebrated authors, will become the subject of this ridicule. Far be it from me to arrogate to myself this unpleasant office. All men have their little affectations and foibles, and literary men are not exempt from the common condition of humanity. But I cannot admit that the genius of these men was either elevated by a clear sky, or depressed by a clouded one. Some of their most valued productions may have been inspired at particular seasons,* and they have thence believed, or their biographers have endeavoured to impress upon the world the opinion, that those seasons were most propitious to the exertion of their intellect.

In order to increase not only the benefit, but the pleasure of reading, every student should be tolerably skilled in criticism. It is a false notion that the art of criticism is the art of discovering faults—it is that which enables us to discern and relish the beauties of an author. Let the student peruse with attention the critical works of Johnson and Blair, (quales et quantos viros!) and he will afterwards read with increased pleasure.

Much has been said of the pernicious effects of novels; but I am not inclined to join in the popular clamour against these elegant offsprings of the imagination. I would suffer all young persons, nay encourage them, in reading novels, until about the age of seventeen or eighteen. About this time the judgment has arrived at such a state of maturity, as to be able to discern the imperfections, and reject the pernicious doctrines with which, it is to be lamented, these works do too plentifully abound. By first putting these fascinating works into his hand, which enchain the attention, without fatiguing the mind, the student will insensibly acquire a taste for reading, which he will never lose. I have no fear that this sort of reading will induce him to neglect all others. I repeat, that time will alter it. Besides, the pages of many of our novelists are so many mirrors of nature,† in which every one who reads may see himself reflected—they will aid him to correct his faults, and cherish his latent virtues.

I had intended to introduce some remarks on the danger of reading in a desultory manner, and without reflection, but I will content myself with referring those, who may feel interested in the subject, to the essay which was given in the 24th number of the Port Folio, and close this with a short quotation, which will have more weight than any thing I could say.

Milton, although a republican, and a subverter of order in government, was yet a poet, and well knew the value of order and reflection in study. His opinion of the value of the incessant perusal of books, without exercising the mind in digest-

* Milton himself seems to allude to this disposition of the mind in his elegy, 'In adventum veris,' which has lately been well translated by one of the correspondents of the Editor of the Port Folio:

.....an at nobis redeunt in carmina vires,
Iugenique mihi munere veris adest?

† To such men as Richardson, Fielding, and Smollet, how justly may we apply the words of Suidas, in his treatise de vet. auct. 'He was the scribe or secretary of nature, dipping the pen into mind.'

in their contents, is thus expressed in his Paradise Regained:

"A many books,
Wise men have said, are wearisome; who reads
Incessantly, and to his reading brings not
A spirit and judgment equal or superior,
Uncertain and unsettled still remains,
Deep vers'd in books, and shallow in himself,
Crude or intoxicate, collecting toys,
As children gathering pebbles on the shore."

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

To account for Chatterton's extensive acquaintance with old books, out of the line of common reading, Mr. Warton observes, that the Old Library at Bristol, was, during his life-time, of universal access, and Chatterton was actually introduced to it by the Rev. Mr. Catcott, who wrote on the Deluge, the brother of Mr. George Catcott, the pewterer. He adds, that Mr. Catcott, the clergyman, always looked on Chatterton's pretensions with suspicion, and regarded the poems, which he attributed to Rowley, as the spurious productions of his own pen.

Chatterton's account of Canynge, &c. as far as it is countenanced by William of Wrycester, (that is, as far as it respects his taking orders, and paying a fine to the King), may be found in the epitaph on Master Canynge, still remaining to be read by every person, both in Latin and English, in Redcliffe church; which, indeed, appears to be the authority that William of Wrycester himself has followed.

Chatterton's account also of Redcliffe steeple, is to be found at the bottom of a print of that church, published in 1746, by one John Halfpenny, 'in which, says Mr. Tymwhitt, was recounted the ruin of the steeple in 1446, by a tempest and fire.'

As to the old vellum, or parchment, on which Chatterton transcribed his fragments, Mr. Malone observes, that 'at the bottom of each sheet of old deeds, (of which there were many in the Bristol chest), there is usually a blank space of about four or five inches in breadth; and this exactly agrees with the shape and size of the longest fragment which he has exhibited, viz. eight and a half inches long, and four and a half broad. Mr. Ruddall attests that Chatterton practised experiments to give the ink and parchments which he produced the colour and the stain of antiquity.'

In point of style, composition, sentiment, and versification, the poems of Rowley are infinitely superior to every other production of the century which is said to have produced them.

It was easy for Chatterton to copy ancient words, but it was by no means so easy for him to copy ancient style. Here lies the main defect in the imposition; and by this, and this alone, the controversy may be fairly decided to the satisfaction of every person of taste and judgment. The old words, thickly laid on, form an antique crust on the language, which at first view imposes on the view; but which, on examination, appears not to belong originally to it. It was on the better to cover the imposition; but, in the process of imposition, it is overloaded with disguise, and discovers itself by the very means which were designed to hide it. The language is too ancient for the date of the poems. It is only necessary to refer the reader to the 'Paston Letters,' published by Sir John Fenn, to the 'Nut-brown Maid,' to the 'Prophecies,' printed at London in 1533, all works coeval with the supposed Rowley, to convince him that the language was at that time completely different from Chatterton's forgery. The papers of state in the reign of Henry VI, are as modern and good English as those of Henry VIII. It is not the language of any particular period, or particular province. The words are Saxon and Anglo-Saxon, and Scottish and English. We have provincial terms of the north and of the south; we have Chaucer, and Pope, and Skelton, and Gray, and that frequently within the short compass of a single verse. The diction and versification are at perpetual variance. He borrowed his ancient language, not from the usage of common life, but from lexicographers, and copied their mistakes. He has even introduced words which never made a part of the English language, and which are evidently the coinage of fancy, analogy, or mistake.

The style is evidently modern. Our old English poets are minute and particular; they do not deal in abstraction and general exhibition, but even in the course of narration or description dwell on realities. But the counterfeit Rowley adopts ideal terms, and artificial modes of telling a fact, and too frequently falls into metaphor, metaphysical imagery, and incidental personification. The poems of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries abound in unnatural conceptions, strange imaginations, capricious extravagancies, and even the most ridiculous inconsistencies. But Rowley's poems present us with no incongruous combinations, no mixture of manners, constitutions, usages, and characters. They contain no violent or gross improprieties. One of the striking characteristics of old English poetry is, a continued tenor of disparity. In Gower, Chaucer, and Lydgate, elegant descriptions, ornamental images, &c. bear no proportion to pages of languor and mediocrity, affected conceits of expression, dull and trite reflections, or tedious and unadorned narratives. The poems of Rowley are uniformly good. They are the productions, not only of genius, but of taste; a taste which could not possibly have been acquired of a sudden, or by any spontaneous efforts, or by a penetration or feeling which anticipated the improvements of a polished age, but by an intimate acquaintance with the manners and sentiments of the present times, and a diligent study of the best productions of our modern poets.

'These poems exhibit, says Mr. Warton, both in connection of words and sentences, a facility of combination, a quickness of transition, a rapidity of apostrophe, a frequent variation of force and phrase, and a firmness of contexture, which must have been the result of a long establishment of the arts and habits of writing. The versification is equally vigorous and harmonious; and is formed on a general elegance and stability of expression. It is remarkable that whole stanzas sparkle with that brilliancy which did not appear in our poetry till towards the middle of the present century. The lines have all the tricks and trappings, all the sophistications of poetical style, belonging to those models, which were popular when Chatterton began to write verses.'
